BEAN v. STEINMAN et al. (No. 19,396.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 10, 1894.)

In bank.

On rehearing. Denied.

For opinion on appeal, see 37 Pac. 777.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the order denying a rehearing of this cause; but, as the latter part of the opinion heretofore filed is capable of misconstruction, I wish to explain that I do not understand it to decide that the largest augmented head of water to which the plaintiff is entitled is to be measured by a cumulation of his two-fortieths for 10 days. Under the covenant of Stoneman, the plaintiff's predecessors had the right to demand water for irrigation as often as once in 10 days, but they were not bound to take it that often; and if it appears that the practice has been to take it at longer intervals, and in correspondingly larger heads, and if it also appears that by so doing the plaintiff can irrigate to greater advantage, and without laying an unjust burden upon the defendant, the plaintiff should be allowed to take the water in the manner most beneficial to him, and the defendant is bound to provide the means of discharging into the head of the ditch the larger augmented head required.

ROYAL v. DENNISON et al.¹ (No. 19,482.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1894.)

EXCHANGE OF LAND — ASSIGNMENT OF CONTRACT — DEFECT IN TITLE — EVIDENCE — TENDER OF DEED.

1. One to whom a person has agreed to convey land is entitled to a deed from such person, and need not accept a deed from a stranger to the contract.

2. Where, in a contract for the exchange of land, the values of the respective parcels have been fixed, a party to the contract, who had no title to the land he contracted to convey, and who has placed himself in such a position that he cannot acquire title, cannot object to the tender of the deed by the other party because made on condition that he pay the amount fixed by the contract as the value of the land to be conveyed by him.

3. In ejectment, where defendant claims that plaintiff agreed to convey him the land in exchange for other land, the judgment roll in a creditors' action against defendant to have a deed by him of his land declared void is admissible to show that defendant is unable to convey his land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Aaron W. Royal against G. L. Dennison and others. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. C. Bower, for appellants. Geo. W. Knox, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. In ejectment to recover possession of a certain house and lot in the city of Los Angeles. The answer, after denying the averments of the complaint, for a separate answer and equitable defense alleged, in substance, that in August, 1887, the defendant G. L. Dennison purchased the demanded premises from the plaintiff, and as the consideration thereof agreed to convey to the plaintiff four certain lots in or near the city of Pasadena, and prior to the commencement of the action had tendered to plaintiff a deed for said lots, and demanded from plaintiff a deed of the demanded premises, and prayed for a specific performance of the agreement. The action was tried by the court. Findings were duly filed, and judgment for the plaintiff was entered thereon, and this appeal is by the defendants from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The findings are very full, and cannot be inserted in this opinion, but an outline of the facts found may be thus stated: In August or September, 1887, the plaintiff and the defendant G. L. Dennison made a verbal agreement whereby plaintiff agreed to sell to Dennison a house and lot on Courthouse street in the city of Los Angeles, at a valuation of $1,000, to be paid for by the conveyance of four lots in "Dennison's subdivision of Fair Oaks Avenue Park tract, in the Rancho San Pasqual," said lots to be taken at a valuation of $1,000 each. Dennison shortly afterwards went into possession of the house and lot. At the time of the agreement the survey and subdivision of Dennison's land had not been completed, but in January, 1888, plaintiff selected and marked upon the map the four lots described in the answer. No time was ever agreed upon when the mutual conveyances were to be made. At the time said agreement of exchange was made G. L. Dennison did not have title to said four lots, but held a contract of purchase of a larger tract of which they were a part, upon which he had made one payment, and was to obtain a deed only upon full payment; that he never made any other payment, but on October 30, 1888, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in said premises to Lucius Dennison, who afterwards—but at what date does not appear, except that it was prior to July 8, 1890—procured title to the tract of which these lots were a part; that between December, 1887, and the last of May, 1889, the plaintiff obtained from G. L. Dennison $750 as loans, to be secured on said lots; that on July 8, 1890, plaintiff tendered to defendant G. L. Dennison a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of the house and lot, and demanded of Dennison payment of $3,250, being the agreed value of the property, less $750, the amount of said loans. Dennison refused to make such payment, and at the same time tendered to plaintiff a deed of conveyance of said four lots, executed by Lucius Dennison, but which deed the plaintiff refused to accept, the grantor therein being a stranger to the contract or agreement between plaintiff and G. L. Dennison. It was further found that on May 6, 1890, a judgment was rendered in the superior court of Los Angeles county against G. L. Dennison for $20; that on September 25, 1890, one Marriner obtained a money judgment in said court against said G. L. Dennison for $2,500; that on December 23, 1888, F. K. and O. M. Harriman foreclosed in said court a certain mortgage against said G. L. Dennison, and on March 29, 1889, a deficiency judgment therein was docketed against said Dennison for $2,174.55; that on September 27, 1890, in an action brought by said Harrimans in said court against said G. L. Dennison and Lucius Dennison, a decree was entered adjudging the said conveyance so made by said G. L. Dennison to said Lucius Dennison of said tract embracing said four lots to be fraudulent as to creditors, and subjecting the same to the lien of said deficiency judgment. Lucius Dennison, the father, and Robert Dennison, the brother, of G. L., were occupants of the demanded premises with G. L., and were made defendants.

Respondent contends that he was not bound to accept a conveyance of the four lots from a stranger to the contract; that G. L. Dennison, by the conveyance of the lots in question to his father, put it out of his power to fulfill his contract with the plaintiff; that such conveyance was made without his consent; that under section 1457 of the Civil Code "the burden of an obligation may be transferred with the consent of the party entitled to its benefits, but not otherwise * * *;" that by section 1731, Id., "an agreement to sell real property binds the seller to execute a conveyance * * *;" that, unless it was part of the agreement that it should bind the assigns of the parties, it could not bind them, and was merely a personal contract which could not pass to their assigns except by mutual agreement. In support of this contention respondent cites La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 281, 24 Pac. 72. That case, however, clearly holds the general rule to be that contracts are assignable unless the contract provides otherwise, though the nature of some contracts may show that they cannot be assigned, though there is no language showing such intention, instances of which are stated in that case at page 285, 84 Cal., and page 72, 24 Pac. Of course, Dennison could not free himself from the burden or obligation of making a conveyance of these lots to the plaintiff without the plaintiff's consent, though either party could assign to another any benefit he was entitled to under the contract; that is, the plaintiff could assign to another his right to receive a conveyance of the four lots, and the defendant could assign his right to receive a conveyance of plaintiff's house and lot. The burden or obligation of each to make the conveyance may, however, be transferred or performed by another only with the consent of the party who is to receive such performance or conveyance. The reason therefor can be illustrated by this case. At the time the exchange of property was agreed upon, G. L. Dennison did not have the legal title to these lots. He had contracted for their purchase, and was to receive a conveyance upon making full payment therefor. Before obtaining title, he conveyed them, with other property, to his father, and thereafter the payments were completed, and the property was conveyed to his father. A deficiency judgment was afterwards docketed against G. L., and a suit was commenced against him and his father to cancel or set aside said conveyance as fraudulent and void as against the creditors of G. L., and a decree was granted declaring such conveyance void as against said creditors. The implied covenants in a grant, bargain, and sale deed from the father to the plaintiff would only reach to incumbrances done, made, or suffered by the father, the grantor therein, and would not protect the plaintiff against incumbrances or liens suffered by G. L. Dennison, and the plaintiff was entitled to this implied covenant. Civ. Code, § 1113. No time having been fixed for the mutual conveyances to be made, the conveyance of these lots by G. L. Dennison to his father was not necessarily an abandonment of his contract with the plaintiff. He offered to prove that he had an agreement with his grantee that he, Lucius Dennison, would carry out the agreement with the plaintiff, and convey the four lots to the plaintiff. The plaintiff objected, and the objection was sustained. It does not appear that this agreement was communicated to the plaintiff, or that he assented thereto in any manner. The evidence was properly excluded, as was also the deed from Lucius Dennison to the plaintiff, upon the ground hereinbefore stated. Subsequently the defendant G. L. Dennison, during the trial, on the 7th of May, 1891, wrote upon said deed and executed and acknowledged the following: "I, G. L. Dennison, of said county and state, do hereby go in with the grantor herein in the written deed to A. W. Royal, of said county and state, and do by these presents grant, bargain, and sell to A. W. Royal all my right, title, and interest in and to the property described in the within deed, in consideration of exchange for house and lot No. 215 Court street, Los Angeles city and county." Whether this instrument was effectual for the purpose of binding G. L. Dennison by the implied covenants of a grant, bargain, and sale deed, it is not necessary to inquire, since, on the 27th of September preceding, the conveyance made by him to his father was adjudged fraudulent as against the plaintiffs therein, and the property was thereby made subject to the lien of the deficiency judgment hereinbefore noted, and which is not shown to have been satisfied. Whether the court erred in excluding the deed with the additional instrument executed by G. L. Dennison, at the stage of the case at which it was offered, need not be decided, inasmuch as the decree above referred to being afterwards introduced rendered the exclusion, if it was error, harmless.

Appellants contend, however, that plaintiff's tender of a conveyance was not sufficient to put Dennison in default, because the tender was made upon the condition that he pay plaintiff $3,250 in money; that under section 1494 of the Civil Code "an offer of performance must be free from any conditions which the creditor is not bound, on his part, to perform;" and that he was not bound to pay for the property in money. But Dennison was not at the time of the tender by plaintiff, nor, indeed, had he ever been, the owner of the legal title to these lots, and therefore could not have complied with a demand for a conveyance of them. Under such circumstances we think he cannot object to the form of the tender, or the condition attached to it, since he was not injured by the condition. His right to insist that the plaintiff should accept a conveyance of the lots was not affected by the fact that he did not have the legal title at the time he made the contract, nor by the fact that he afterwards conveyed his equitable title to his father, provided he had procured the legal title before he was required to perform his contract by a conveyance. This case does not come within the case of Burks v. Davies, 85 Cal. 110, 24 Pac. 613, where the defendant had no title to a part of the property, nor any contract for the purchase of it under which he could have compelled the owner to convey the title to him. The distinction between that case and the case at bar is clearly pointed out in Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal., at page 315, 27 Pac. 280, as well as by the remark of Mr. Justice Paterson in the former case, where it was said: "If, though he be not the absolute owner, it is in his power by the ordinary course of law or equity to make himself such owner, he will be permitted within a reasonable time to do so." Whether, if Dennison in this case had acquired the unincumbered legal title to these lots before the trial, he could have compelled a specific performance by the plaintiff, we need not consider, since the title was shown to have been subject to the judgment of Harriman, if not of others.

It is contended that these judgment rolls were improperly admitted. We think not. It was competent for the plaintiff to show that the title was not free from incumbrances. This was certainly the case as to the Harriman judgment, and if the conveyance by G. L. to Lucius Dennison was fraudulent as to one creditor it was presumably so as to all; or, if that be not the case, since one was competent and material, and would have been entirely sufficient to justify the plaintiff in refusing to accept the title, the introduction of the others could not prejudice the defendants. The date of the commencement of the Harriman suit against G. L. and Lucius Dennison, as well as of the other actions, must have been shown by the judgment rolls which were put in evidence, but by a singular omission the date at which these several actions were commenced, and especially of the Harriman suit to set aside the conveyance, nowhere appears in the record, since the commencement of that action was a direct attack upon the title of Lucius Dennison to these lots. Every point made by appellant in his attack upon the findings has been sufficiently covered by what has been said. The findings are justified by the evidence, and support the judgment. We find no error in the record which would justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from, and advise that they be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BANK OF MARTINEZ v. ZEISING. (No. 15,749.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1894.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF CASE.

Where, pending an appeal, appellant pays respondent a sum of money in settlement of the suit, on an agreement that he is to be released from the judgment, the appeal will be dismissed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action by Bank of Martinez against Zeising. Pending an appeal, appellant made a settlement with respondent, and moves to have the appeal dismissed. Motion granted.

Otto Tum Suden, for appellant. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. The moving papers upon which the motion to dismiss the appeal herein is based show that the appellant has paid to the respondent the sum of $200 to be released from the judgment from which this appeal is taken, and that the respondent has accepted said sum, and in consideration thereof has released the appellant from all liability thereunder. The motion was resisted by the opposing affidavit of the attorney of record for the appellant, but, as there is nothing contained therein that is at all material to this proceeding, it is not necessary to be considered. As the controversy arising out of this action was terminated by the settlement agreed upon between the parties thereto, there is nothing for this court to decide. It therefore follows that the motion to dismiss the appeal should be granted. So ordered.

PEOPLE v. CONNELLY. (No. 21,272.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1894.)

EMBEZZLEMENT—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENSES.

1. On a trial for embezzlement, where no request is made to limit evidence of similar embezzlements by defendant to proof of criminal intent, a voluntary instruction that defendant is not on trial for embezzling any other sum than that charged in the information is not prejudicial because it fails to make such a limitation.

2. The fact that an appropriation of an employer's money was made without attempt at concealment is no defense to a charge of embezzlement.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Patrick Connelly appeals from a conviction of embezzlement, and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Lawler & Gray, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The information charges that defendant embezzled $89.78, the property of M. Goodwin, which he had received from Vincent Leguns as the agent and collector of said Goodwin.

1. On the trial, evidence was introduced on the part of the people, without objection, to prove that defendant had embezzled other sums of money which he had collected for Goodwin, amounting to more than $5,000. As to this the court was not asked by either party to instruct the jury, but, of its own motion, instructed as follows: "Now, with reference to the matters outside,—the five or six thousand dollars that has been spoken of,—I charge you that the defendant here is not accused or on trial for embezzling any other sum than this money that was collected from Leguns; and, if you find that the defendant embezzled that money, why then you will find him guilty, and by your verdict you must state the amount." The verdict was that defendant was guilty of embezzling $78.43. It is admitted that evidence of the embezzlement of other sums was properly admitted for the purpose of showing criminal intent, as was held in the case of People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 Pac. 240. Nor is there any objection on the ground that the court voluntarily instructed on that point. But it is contended that the court erred in that it did not add to the instruction given that the evidence of other like embezzlements could be considered only for the purpose of proving the fraudulent or criminal intent with which the money received from Leguns was converted. If the instruction is defective in this respect, it is so to the advantage of the defendant, for the reason that the jury may have understood that they were instructed not to consider the evidence as to other embezzlements for any purpose, and could not otherwise have understood the instruction to the prejudice of the defendant. It seems to have been intended for the benefit of defendant, and, so far as it went, surely was so. If the defendant desired any addition to the instruction, he should have asked it.

2. The venue was sufficiently proved. The evidence contained in the bill of exceptions tends to prove that the money was received and converted by the defendant in the city and county of San Francisco, and should be deemed sufficient. People v. Marks, 72 Cal. 46, 13 Pac. 149; People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 117, 19 Pac. 254; People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 154, 22 Pac. 129; People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 279, 22 Pac. 678.

3. It is claimed that defendant was working for one-half of the profits on the sales made by him, and not for a definite commission, and therefore was interested in the business as a partner, and there was some evidence to this effect. But Mr. Goodwin testified positively that: "He was not working on profits at all. He was working on commissions on the amount sold. I am positive of that. The percentage of sales which he got as commission was 17 per cent. * * * In estimating the amount of his commission, I did not take the cost price of the goods. It did not make any difference what the goods cost. We allowed him his commission of just 17 per cent."

4. It is further claimed that the undisputed testimony of defendant was that he was authorized to spend money at his discretion to build up the trade, but this is a mistake. He did not say he was authorized to spend money for that or any purpose. He simply said: "The money, if any, that I was short was spent for the benefit of the house,—building up the trade. I collected the money from Leguns on that bill. Q. Did you ever account to Mr. Goodwin for the money you had spent building up the trade? A. Oh, yes; what I would be short. What I was short when I would turn in,—supposed to turn in,—I would say, 'Charge so much to my account.' Can't remember whether I told them to charge the Leguns money to my account, or whether I paid it in."

5. It is further contended that the money was appropriated by defendant openly, and without secrecy or concealment. While secrecy or concealment may be evidence tending to show a criminal intent, yet, if the evidence shows that the criminal acts constituting embezzlement were committed by the defendant, it is no defense that they were committed openly. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. SMITH. (No. 18,162.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1894.)

VENUE IN CIVIL CASES — HOW DETERMINED — LOCAL CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. The nature of a cause of action, so far as it determines the venue, must be ascertained from the complaint alone, without considering any amendment which plaintiff may intend to make.

2. A complaint asking that it be adjudged that certain deeds of land are mortgages, and that they have been paid, and that, if it be found that any part of the debt remains unpaid, plaintiffs be admitted to redeem, and that they be let into possession, states a local cause of action, which should be brought in the county in which the land lies.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by E. H. Smith and others against Cyril C. Smith. From an order denying a change of venue, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Law (James H. Budd, of counsel), for appellant. J. C. Campbell and F. D. Nicol, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to change the venue from Tuolumne county, where the action was commenced, to the county of Merced, where the defendant resided at the time the action was commenced, to wit, July 20, 1892. A former action by the same plaintiffs against the same defendant for the same and additional relief, and founded on the same and an additional cause of action, was commenced in Tuolumne county on July 20, 1891, in which defendant's motion to change the venue of that action to the county of Merced was denied, and upon appeal from the order denying the motion this court reversed the order, and directed the court below to grant the change (Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. 356); but before the change of venue was granted by the lower court the plaintiffs dismissed that action, and thereafter commenced the action in which was made the order from which the present appeal was taken.

It is contended by appellant that substantially the same grounds for a change of venue appear to exist in this case as in the former, and that upon the authority of the decision of this court in the former case the order denying a change of venue in this case should be reversed. The substance of the complaint in the former action is stated in the opinion of the court on the appeal from the order in that action (88 Cal. 573, 26 Pac. 356), whereby it appears that that complaint stated both a local and a transitory cause of action,—a cause of action to compel the defendant to convey to plaintiffs certain lands situate partly in Tuolumne county and partly in the county of Merced, and a cause of action to compel the defendant to account for money and other personal property alleged to have been received by him as partnership property of a firm composed of himself and one D. G. Smith, deceased, under the latter of whom the plaintiffs claimed an interest in the partnership property by inheritance. It was held on that appeal that, inasmuch as the complaint stated a transitory as well as a local cause of action, the defendant was entitled to a change of venue to the county of Merced, in which he resided, the court saying: "The plaintiff cannot, by uniting in his complaint matters which form the subject of a personal action with matters which form the subject of a local action, compel the defendant to have both those matters tried in a county other than that in which he resides. It is only when real estate alone is the subject-matter of the action that the provisions of section 392, Code Civ. Proc., can be invoked against a defendant who resides in a county different from that in which the land is situated." The respondents claim that real estate alone is the subject-matter of this subsequent action, from the order in which this appeal was taken; that the facts constituting a personal or transitory cause of action in the complaint considered on the former appeal are entirely absent from the complaint involved in this appeal. The substance of the complaint in this action is that on July 29, 1876, D. G. Smith, under whom plaintiffs claim by inheritance, was the owner of several thousand acres of land, of the value of $200,000, situated partly in each of the counties of Tuolumne, Merced, and San Luis Obispo, and was then indebted to defendant in the sum of $31,000, and to other persons in the sum of $33,000; that for the sole purpose of securing the payment of such indebtedness he then conveyed all said lands by deeds absolute on their face to the defendant, under a contemporaneous agreement with defendant that the deeds should be considered only mortgages; that defendant should take possession of the mortgaged property, and manage the same, and pay all the indebtedness to secure which the deeds were executed, and when all such indebtedness should be paid the defendant should reconvey to him (D. G. Smith) all said mortgaged real property; that all said deeds were made at the same time, and as one transaction; that no other consideration passed between the parties than said agreement; that D. G. Smith died intestate February 2, 1883, and all the debts of his estate, including the debts of decedent to defendant and others to secure which said deeds were executed, have been fully paid and discharged; that ever since the 29th day of July, 1876, the defendant has had, and still has, the exclusive possession of said mortgaged lands, and during all that time has received all the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and that no part thereof has been administered upon as the estate of D. G. Smith, deceased; that defendant did not reconvey to D. G. Smith said mortgaged property, nor any part thereof, and upon their demand has refused to convey to the plaintiffs the undivided five-sixths thereof, to which they are entitled, or to admit them to the possession as tenants in common with him; and that the value of said mortgaged property is $300,000. Allegations not pertinent to the question of venue, including those showing the heirship of the plaintiffs, are omitted. The prayer of the complaint is substantially that it be adjudged that said deeds are mortgages, and that they have been paid and satisfied; that plaintiffs are owners of five-sixths of the mortgaged land, and that they be let into possession as tenants in common with defendant; that, should it be found that any part of the mortgage debts remain unpaid, plaintiffs be permitted "to redeem from the mortgages simultaneously with the execution of conveyances of said real property to them by defendant;" and that plaintiffs have such other and further relief as may be proper.

By comparing this complaint with that in the former action it will be seen that all the facts of that complaint held to constitute a transitory cause of action have been omitted from this complaint, and this is admitted by counsel for appellant. But they claim that the affidavit of the defendant on which the motion was made shows that plaintiffs intend so to amend their complaint in this action that they may introduce proof of all the facts alleged in their former complaint. They say: "We do not claim that under the present form of the complaint in this action, without any amendment thereto, that plaintiffs could introduce such proofs." That affidavit, among other things, contains the following: "That the complaint in this action was drawn and this action commenced in its present form with the intent of preventing a transfer of this action to Merced county, and with the purpose of litigating and determining in this action under said complaint or amendments thereto all questions and matters that might have been litigated under the former complaints in the dismissed actions aforesaid. And it is plaintiffs' purpose to have litigated and determined in this action under the allegations of the complaint herein, or an amendment to the complaint herein, all the questions as to the transfer of the afore-mentioned personal property from D. G. Smith to C. C. Smith, and the management thereof by C. C. Smith, that might have been or could be determined or litigated under a complaint in form of action No. 636 aforesaid." As to those statements in defendant's affidavit there was no counter affidavit, and it is therefore claimed by appellant that defendant's affidavit must be taken as true. Whether the affidavit is true or not, I think the nature of the cause of action, so far as it affects or determines the place of trial, must be ascertained from the complaint alone. Nor are the cases cited by appellant's counsel opposed to this view. In each of those cases, viz. Creditors v. Welch, 55 Cal. 469; Hastings v. Keller, 69 Cal. 606, 11 Pac. 218; McSherry v. Mining Co., 97 Cal. 637, 32 Pac. 711,—the affidavits related to the place of residence of the defendant, which constitutes no part of a cause of action. I think the complaint in this case states only a local cause of action, which cannot be distinguished from that stated in the case of Baker v. Insurance Co., 73 Cal. 182, 14 Pac. 686, which case was not overruled by the case of Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. 356; and the lower court did not err in denying the motion to change the venue. What would be the effect of such an amendment of plaintiffs' complaint as anticipated by defendant is a question not involved in this appeal. Should it arise in the court below hereafter, it must be presumed that that court will properly dispose of it. I think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

BRUCH v. COLOMBET. (No. 15,597.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1894.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LOCAL AND SPECIAL LEGISLATION—MANAGEMENT OF COMMON SCHOOLS.

Pol. Code, § 1543, subd. 3, establishing different custodians for the funds of school districts having boards of education and those not having them, violates Const. art. 4, § 25, which prohibits local and special laws in the management of common schools.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Application by Louis Bruch for a writ of mandamus to compel J. F. Colombet to pay a warrant drawn upon him as city treasurer. A writ was granted, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Morehouse & Tuttle, for appellant. Wilcox & Patton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an agreed case. It is stipulated that the school district of San José is a quasi municipal corporation, and that it embraces the same territory as the city of San José; that the school district has a board of education; that plaintiff possesses all the qualifications prescribed by law, or the rules and regulations of the county board of education for Santa Clara county, to teach in the grammar and primary schools of said district, and July 5, 1893, was employed by the said board of education as principal of a school in said district at a salary of $120 per month, and immediately entered upon such service, and therefore was entitled to receive as his salary for the month of November, 1893, the sum of $120; that, during all of said time, defendant was treasurer of the city of San José; that the state school fund was duly apportioned among the counties, and Santa Clara county received its portion, of which $11,747.40 was apportioned to the school district of San José; that July 17, 1893, the said board of education drew an order upon the county superintendent in favor of the treasurer of the city of San José for said sum, which order was presented by defendant, as treasurer of the city, to the county superintendent, who thereupon drew his requisition upon the county auditor against the said state school fund so apportioned to the school district; that the auditor thereupon drew his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of the city treasurer for said amount, and said city treasurer received the said money in pursuance thereof, and placed the same in the city treasury; at divers times the board of education drew warrants against the same, which warrants were paid as drawn, until only $852 of said funds now remain in the treasury; that plaintiff duly procured a warrant in his favor for the said amount due him as salary, and presented the same to defendant, as city treasurer, and demanded payment of the same, which defendant refused. Wherefore, he demands a peremptory writ of mandate.

In the affidavit attached to the agreed statement, it is said that the treasurer has been in the habit of paying warrants drawn upon the money apportioned to the district by the county superintendent from the state and county school funds; that in March, 1893, the supreme court decided that under the law as it then existed the custody of state and county school funds belonged to the county treasurer; that subsequently to said decision the legislature passed an act making the city treasurer the custodian of state and county school moneys apportioned to school districts within municipalities, and having boards of education; that in consequence of said decision a controversy has arisen as to the legal custodian of such state and county school money, and this proceeding is instituted in good faith to determine the rights of the parties and such controversy; that there is now in the county treasury $17,000 belonging to said school district, but, owing to the uncertainty of the law, "no one knows who is entitled to the custody of said moneys."

The doubt whether the amended statute is valid arises from the fact that it establishes a different rule in regard to the custody of the moneys belonging to school districts within municipalities, and having boards of education, from that prevailing in those in which there are no such boards. The amendment referred to is of subdivision 3 of section 1543, Pol. Code, by the legislature of 1893. It is as follows: "Third. (1) On the order of the board of school trustees, to draw his requisition upon the county auditor for all necessary expenses against the school fund of any district, or of any city or town which has not a board of education. The requisitions must be drawn in the order in which the orders therefor are filed in this office. Each requisition must specify the purpose for which it is drawn; but no requisition shall be drawn unless the money is in the fund to pay it; and no requisition shall be drawn upon the order of the board of school trustees against the funds of any district, except for teachers' salaries, unless such order is accompanied by an itemized bill showing the separate items, and the price of each, in payment for which the order is drawn; nor shall any requisition for teachers' salaries be drawn unless the order shall state the monthly salary of the teacher, and name the months for which such salary is due. Upon the receipt of such requisition the auditor shall draw his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of the parties for the amount stated in such requisition. (2) On the order of the board of education of any city having a board of education, the county superintendent shall draw his requisition upon the county auditor in favor of the city treasurer of said city for all state and county moneys, and for all other moneys apportioned by the said superintendent to said city. Upon the presentation of said requisition the county auditor shall draw his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of the treasurer of said city for the amount stated in said requisition. It shall be the duty of the county treasurer to pay the amount stated in the warrant of the county auditor to the treasurer of said city; and it shall be the duty of the treasurer of said city to receive and safely keep all moneys so received, and to pay the same out upon the order of the board of education of said city, which order must be issued by said board of education as provided in division (1) one of this subdivision of section one thousand five hundred and forty three of the Political Code." It is contended that this is special and local legislation. The constitution provides (section 5, art. 9): "The legislature shall provide for a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year, after the first year in which a school has been established."

In regard to this section, it was said in Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558: "The term 'system' itself imports a unity of purpose as well as an entirety of operation, and the direction to the legislature to provide 'a' system of common schools means one system which shall be applicable to all the common schools within the state." The constitution also provides (section 25, art. 4) that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws providing for the management of common schools, nor in any case where a general law can be made applicable. Also, section 11, art. 1: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." Section 22, art. 1, makes the provisions of the constitution mandatory and prohibitory, unless expressly otherwise provided. The legislature has practically classified the school districts throughout the state into (1) school districts not having boards of education; and (2) school districts having boards of education. The laws make many and important differences in the management of these two classes. Of course, as has been frequently decided, the prohibition of special and local laws cannot be evaded by arbitrary classification. In fact, a special law—special, as opposed to general laws on one hand and private acts on the other—classifies the subjects of the law for the purpose of the special provisions. This classification is the very thing prohibited by the constitution. In Earle v. Board of Ed., 55 Cal. 489, it is said by Myrick, J.: "A special law is one referring to a selected class, as well as to a particular object. This act refers to a selected class, viz. teachers in cities of one hundred thousand inhabitants." The act was held void, as special legislation. Of course, the legislature may classify for the purpose of legislation where there is some intrinsic reason why the law should operate upon some and not on others, or should affect some differently from its effect upon others. This has been often expressed, and with particular care in City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604. It is there said: "The conclusion is that, although a law is general and constitutional when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction, it is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions, in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." I think this a very good statement of the rule, so far as it goes, and it was sufficient for the purposes of the case in which it was laid down. I think, however, one purpose of the inhibition of special and local legislation was to make as many as possible interested in every act passed. As a rule, the entire effect of an act of the legislature cannot be foreseen, and those seeking vicious legislation have often succeeded in covering their designs under apparently harmless provisions. It was easier to do this in special or local bills, in which few were interested. This, I think, was the principal consideration which moved the convention and the people of the state in adopting the provision. It was to make all the members of the legislature responsible so far as possible, and therefore alert as to all legislation. I think, therefore, special legislation is prohibited even when we can see, or think we can, that special privileges are given to no one. It is obvious, however, that what may be called the extreme view in regard to these limitations cannot prevail; otherwise, the legislature would be shorn of all power to adapt its laws to differing conditions. An efficient system of common schools must differ in some respects in its details as to schools in sparsely-settled districts and in towns. No absolute, inflexible rule has ever been formulated, and probably never will be, by which to determine what departure from uniformity is permissible and what will be fatal. The courts must determine each case as it arises, presuming in favor of the rightful exercise of the legislative power. Yet the inhibition should be enforced unless there is discoverable some reasonable ground for a distinction.

In Kennedy v. Miller, supra, it is said that the constitution imposed upon the legislature the duty of establishing a uniform system of school districts; that, nevertheless, boards of education were created in local laws for the incorporation of cities, and in the law concerning municipal corporations. It is suggested that boards of education perform nearly the same functions as trustees of school districts, and the question is reserved as to whether the laws are valid which impose different duties upon the two sets of officers. The school law seems to have been drafted without much regard to the constitutional requirement of uniformity, but we have here to consider only this one provision in regard to the custody of state and county school moneys. Now the fact that the money for school districts having boards of education can all be drawn out of the county treasury on one requisition, and not as required for school necessities, does make a difference for which I can discover no reason in the nature of things. By the first subdivision of the same section, in which this requisition is authorized, the school superintendent is required to apportion the school moneys to each school district four times a year. For this purpose he may require a report from the county auditor of the amount of school moneys on hand, and whenever an excess of money has accumulated to the credit of a school district, by reason of a large census roll and a small attendance, beyond a reasonable amount necessary to maintain a school for eight months in such district for the year, the superintendent of schools shall place such excess of money to the credit of the unapportioned school funds of the county, and shall apportion the same as other school funds are apportioned. The county auditor cannot keep such an account as will show whether funds have accumulated to the credit of districts having boards of education or not, and, if the superintendent can ascertain the facts in any other way, I can discover no mode in which the funds can be replaced in the county treasury. See Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 221, 33 Pac. 66. I find also a provision in the same act, in a subsequent section, which seems inconsistent with the provision requiring the state and county school moneys to be deposited in the city treasury. Subdivision 2, § 1617, directs both trustees of school districts and boards of education to pay all moneys collected by them from any source whatever for school purposes into the county treasury, to be placed to the credit of the special fund of their districts. This would imply that there is kept in the county treasury a special fund for the districts having boards of education, and that all moneys collected by the board shall be deposited there by them. I think the law authorizing the city treasurer to have the custody of state and county school money is invalid because it violates the requirement of uniformity, and the provisions prohibiting special and local laws in the management of common schools, and that the writ should be denied.

COUNTERCLAIM—CROSS COMPLAINT—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. A holder of a junior judgment lien sold the land at judicial sale, subject to the senior lien, and bid it in himself. Subsequently the senior lienor sold the land, and bid it in, but before receiving a deed agreed to pay the junior lienor a certain sum for the latter's rights in the land. Held, in an action by the senior against the junior lienor to recover possession of the land, that a counterclaim for the sum agreed to be paid was not a demand arising out of the transaction set out in the complaint or connected with the "subject of the action."

2. Neither did the demand of the junior lienor affect the property to which the action relates so as to permit it to be set up in a cross complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

Action by Vicente Yorba against Shirley C. Ward to recover land. From the judgment plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Smith & Winder, for appellant. Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley C. Ward, in pro. per., for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. There is considerable conflict in the evidence, but, stating the facts as strongly as possible for the defendant, I think even then the judgment in his favor cannot be maintained. Omitting immaterial matters, defendant's theory as to the facts is about as follows: Plaintiff and defendant each had a money judgment against the same person. Both judgments were liens upon the demanded premises, but plaintiff's lien was prior to defendant's. Defendant, however, caused the land to be first sold, and was purchaser at the sale. Plaintiff also caused the land to be sold and purchased under his judgment. Defendant received a deed upon the expiration of the time for redemption. While defendant was thus the owner of the premises, subject to the prior lien of plaintiff and plaintiff's rights as purchaser, as stated, the parties entered into an agreement by which plaintiff agreed to purchase defendant's right to the premises, and pay him $4,750 therefor. One hundred dollars was paid in cash, and 30 days' credit given for the balance. Nothing was said in the agreement in regard to the possession of the premises, nor does it appear whether defendant was at that time in possession or not. The agreement simply fixes the amount to be paid for defendant's rights, and the time of payment. The time allowed for redemption under the sale had about expired, and plaintiff soon received his deed from the sheriff. He then commenced this suit against defendant to recover the premises. Defendant, in a cross complaint, set up his claim for $4,650, which was still due him on the agreement mentioned, and asked that the agreement be specifically enforced, and for general relief. The plaintiff demurred to the counterclaim or cross complaint on the ground that the facts stated did not constitute a counterclaim, or the proper subject of a cross action. He also moved to strike it out as redundant and immaterial matter. The court overruled the demurrer, and denied the motion. After trial, judgment was rendered that defendant recover from plaintiff the sum of $4,650, and that, if the same be paid, defendant execute to plaintiff a deed for the demanded premises, and that thereupon plaintiff be let into possession. In other words, the judgment is that he shall not recover possession except upon condition that he pay the sum agreed upon to the defendant. The court found, however, that plaintiff is the owner of the land.

Plaintiff's title does not come through defendant, although, even if it did, and defendant had a vendor's lien upon the land, plaintiff would still be entitled to possession according to his title. According to defendant's claim, both parties knew the true condition of the title; that defendant had no right save the right to redeem, which had nearly expired; that when plaintiff received his deed his title would be absolute, and his right to immediate possession undoubted. Their contract left this state of things as it was, plaintiff promising to pay defendant $4,750 not to redeem. Certainly his rights under the deed which he received from the sheriff do not depend upon his paying his debt to defendant. Although he may never be able to pay his debts, he is entitled to possession of the land. This being so, the facts stated in the cross complaint do not constitute a counterclaim. The relief sought will not to any extent defeat, overcome, or affect plaintiff's cause of action, nor lessen, modify, or interfere with the relief to which plaintiff is entitled. Pom. Code Rem. § 745. Nor does defendant's demand arise out of the transaction set out in the complaint. The only transaction there set out—if it could be so denominated—is that defendant withholds from plaintiff the demanded premises, claiming some title to it. The cross complaint does not show any right or title to the demanded premises in defendant. By it defendant asserts no rights with reference to the land, nor any claim save his alleged right to demand from plaintiff $4,650. This demand is not connected with the "subject of the action," however that phrase be defined. Nor is defendant's demand one which can be set up in a cross action under section 442, Code Civ. Proc. The relief sought by defendant does not affect the property to which the action relates. An action enforcing specific performance of a contract to pay $4,650 is merely an action for so much money. Plaintiff cannot compel defendant to convey to him his claim to the land unless he pays the money, but plaintiff is not estopped from setting up a right derived from an independent source. He did not purchase the land from defendant, as already stated. Defendant's theory is that plaintiff bought knowing that his right was prior to defendant's, and that defendant was only a redemptioner. In other words, that upon receiving his deed his title would be complete without any conveyance from defendant. Except that there is no vendor's lien, the situation is exactly as it would have been if defendant, being the owner of the land, had conveyed to plaintiff, and had taken his promissory note as payment. In such case the purchaser's right to possession would not depend upon the payment of the note. I think the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

FEALEY v. FEALEY. (No. 15,494.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1894.)
ALLOTMENT OF HOMESTEAD — ANNULLING ORDER.

An order allotting a homestead to a widow on her false allegation that the property belonged to the community cannot be annulled at the instance of an heir at law of decedent, whose guardian knew of the application for a homestead, and did not contest it, because ignorant that the property belonged to decedent's separate estate.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by the guardian of Mrs. Fealey, mother of William Fealey, deceased, to annul an order allotting a homestead to Mrs. Fealey, widow of deceased. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Gesford & Thompson, for appellant. A. J. Hull, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant is the widow of William Fealey, deceased, and this action is brought for the purpose of annulling an order of the superior court of Napa county setting apart to her a homestead out of the estate of said deceased. The complaint alleges that the property so set apart was the separate property of the deceased, and that the defendant here, with knowledge of this fact, and for the purpose of deceiving the court in which the administration proceedings were pending, filed a petition in which she falsely alleged that such property was community property, and asked that the same be set apart to her absolutely as a homestead; and that, upon the hearing of the application, she was a witness, and testified that the statement in her petition in relation to the character or title of such property was true. The complaint further alleges that this testimony was willfully false, and that it was given by the defendant for the purpose of deceiving the court, and that by reason thereof the court was in fact misled and deceived, and induced to make the order granting the prayer of defendant's petition, and to set apart to her the land therein described as a homestead for her sole use and benefit. The order is set out in the complaint, and it appears from its recitals that the court found, "from the papers on file in the said matter and other evidence introduced," that the property so set apart was community property. The complaint also shows that the deceased died intestate, and that the plaintiff, who is his mother, and the defendant are his only heirs at law; and it is further shown that, prior to the making of the order sought to be annulled, the plaintiff was adjudged an incompetent person, and a general guardian—the same person who brings the present action in her behalf—had been appointed to manage her estate. The complaint alleges that this guardian had actual notice of the proceeding upon the part of the defendant to obtain the order setting apart the homestead, and that he consulted certain lawyers in relation to the rights of plaintiff, and, upon the facts which he laid before them, was by them advised that the defendant was entitled to the order asked for in her petition, and that it would subject the plaintiff to useless expense to contest the right of defendant to have the land therein described set apart to her absolutely; but in this connection the complaint alleges that said guardian did not learn the true facts concerning the title to such land until after the entry of the order here assailed. The complaint also contains an averment that there was community property belonging to the estate of the deceased, Fealey, out of which a homestead could have been set apart, and that the existence of this property was fraudulently concealed by the defendant. This latter averment adds no strength to the complaint, and need not be further considered by us. The defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled by the court; and, the defendant declining to answer, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. This ruling of the court presents the only question arising upon this appeal.

The demurrer to the complaint ought to have been sustained. The fraud which is set forth as the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action relates to the alleged falsity of defendant's statement made in her petition for the homestead, and again repeated in her testimony upon the hearing of such petition, concerning the nature of the title to the land set apart to her as a homestead; but the question thus presented and sought to be litigated in this action was necessarily involved in the proceeding to set apart the homestead, and the order or judgment of the court therein was a determination that the allegation of defendant's petition in regard to the nature of the title to the land so set apart was true, and that her testimony relating to the same matter given upon the trial of that proceeding was also true. The plaintiff had notice of the pendency of that proceeding, and no fraud was practiced upon her by which she was prevented from appearing therein and contesting the allegation of defendant's petition, and showing that the testimony given by her was unworthy of credit. Under these circumstances, that judgment is conclusive upon the plaintiff, and she cannot be permitted to bring into litigation the same matters therein involved and settled by that judgment. The case made by the complaint here falls exactly within the rule declared in U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61; In re Griffith's Estate, 84 Cal. 113, 23 Pac. 528, and 24 Pac. 381; and Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, and 27 Pac. 537. In the first of these cases it was said by Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the court, that "the acts for which a court of equity will on account of fraud set aside or annul a judgment between the same parties, rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, have relation to fraud extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the first court, and not to a fraud in a matter upon which the decree was rendered." And in Pico v. Cohn the question was very carefully considered, and this court announced the same rule, saying: "The reason of this rule is that there must be an end to litigation; and when the parties have once submitted a matter, or have had an opportunity of submitting it, for investigation and determination, and when they have exhausted every means of reviewing such determination in the same proceeding, it must be regarded as final and conclusive, unless it can be shown that the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon, or that the prevailing party, by some extrinsic or collateral fraud, has prevented a fair submission of the controversy. * * * Endless litigation, in which nothing was ever finally determined, would be worse than occasional miscarriages of justice; and so the rule is that a final judgment cannot be annulled merely because it can be shown to have been based on perjured testimony; for, if this could be done once, it could be done again and again, ad infinitum." These cases are, we think, conclusive of the one now before us. So far as concerns the question here presented, there is no difference in principle in the nature of the judgments under review in the above-cited cases and the order here sought to be annulled. The order setting apart the homestead to defendant (no homestead having been declared during the lifetime of the deceased) operated to vest in the defendant a title to the land so set apart (Estate of Boland, 43 Cal. 640; Estate of Moore, 96 Cal. 522, 31 Pac. 584); and such order was in the nature of a judgment in rem (Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15

Pac. 769); and, the court having jurisdiction to pronounce it, it is conclusive upon plaintiff and all persons interested in the estate, and can only be successfully attacked in equity upon the same grounds upon which a judgment in personam may be annulled.

The conclusion we have reached in this case is not at all in conflict with Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 338. The action in that case was brought by a creditor of the deceased to annul the order of the probate court setting apart a homestead to the widow of the deceased, the complaint alleging, in substance, that, prior to the death of deceased, he and his wife entered into a written agreement for a separation and division of the community property, and that such agreement was completely performed, and that deceased and his wife were at the time of his death living separate and apart, in accordance with the terms of said agreement. Under this state of facts, the widow was not entitled to a homestead out of the estate of her deceased husband (Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. 287); but the complaint in that action further alleged that in the petition which the widow filed, asking the court to set apart such homestead for her use, she did not disclose the fact of the existence of the agreement made between herself and husband for a separation, and that she and the deceased were not living together as husband and wife at the time of his death. It was held in that case that this omission, relating, as it did, to a material fact which ought to have been brought to the attention of the court, and submitted to its judgment, was such a fraudulent concealment as would justify a court of equity in annulling the order setting apart the homestead; but it is clear that the fraud which was made the basis of the action and judgment in that case was extrinsic to the judgment or order annulled. In the original proceeding for a homestead under review in that case the court did not even indirectly pass upon the question of the existence or non-existence of the agreement for separation, and that matter, not being before the court, was not concluded by the judgment or order in that proceeding; but, as we have seen, the direct question sought to be litigated here, viz. whether the land set apart to defendant as a homestead was or was not community property, was put in issue in the homestead proceeding, resulting in the order here assailed; and the court, upon the evidence submitted to it at the time of making that order, found the fact adversely to the plaintiff's present contention, and this marks the important distinction between the present and the case of Wickersham v. Comerford. Nor can the case of Bergin v. Haight, 99 Cal. 52, 33 Pac. 760, be regarded as an authority sustaining the complaint in this action. There the court expressly held that there was "nothing upon the face of the proceedings to indicate a fraudulent collusion between the administrator and his attorney," and that "there was no opportunity to determine any issue of fraud in the probate court." This being so, it was necessarily held that the fraud alleged and found in that action was extrinsic and collateral to the questions determined by the probate court when it confirmed the sale of the land in controversy there. The case of Dunlap v. Steere, 92 Cal. 341, 28 Pac. 563, comes nearer supporting the contention of plaintiff, and yet does not do so. In that case the plaintiff was only constructively served with summons, and had no actual notice of the pendency of the action in which the judgment there annulled was given; and referring to the rule above quoted from U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, to the effect that a judgment will not be set aside for false testimony given in relation to a matter upon which the judgment was rendered, it was held that such rule was only applicable "where the former judgment was the result of a trial between the parties, or where the one against whom the judgment was rendered had actual notice of the pendency of the action, and neglected to submit his proofs." It is alleged in the complaint here that the plaintiff was an incompetent person when the order sought to be annulled was made, and so it may be said that in one sense she had no personal knowledge of its pendency or comprehension of the matters involved in that proceeding; but it also appears from the complaint that her general guardian did have such knowledge, and, as the law devolved upon him the duty of protecting her rights in that proceeding, the case is not within the reason of the rule declared in Dunlap v. Steere. The plaintiff did have all the notice which it was possible for her to have, and had the full benefit of all the safeguards which the law deemed necessary for her protection in that proceeding, or which the law deems necessary for the protection of any incompetent person from unjust or fraudulent judgments.

Judgment reversed, with directions to the superior court to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

Ex parte FREDERICKS.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1894.)
APPEAL IN CAPITAL CASE—EFFECT ON SENTENCE.

Pen. Code, § 1243, provides that an appeal to the supreme court from a conviction in a capital case stays the execution of judgment. Held, that the warden of the state prison need not, on such an appeal by the prisoner, deliver him to the sheriff of the county where he was tried.

In bank.

Application for a writ of habeas corpus by William Fredericks to secure his release from the custody of W. E. Hale, warden of the state prison. Denied.

G. E. Coldwell, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner, having been convicted of murder in the first degree, was, on the 7th of May, 1894, sentenced to be hanged at the San Quentin prison, and on the same day a warrant was delivered to the sheriff, in obedience to which he immediately delivered the petitioner to the warden of said prison, by whom he is still detained. On the 23d of May, 1894, the petitioner appealed to this court from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial. Afterwards a certified copy of his notice of appeal was served on the warden, with a demand for the return of the prisoner to the custody of the sheriff, which was refused. The imprisonment of the petitioner is not unlawful. It is true that by section 1243 of the Penal Code it is provided that an appeal to the supreme court from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases. But the intention of the legislature in adopting this provision was merely to prevent the infliction of the death penalty pending the appeal, and it has not acquired any different meaning or effect since or by reason of the change of the law by which in capital cases the prisoner is confined in the state prison pending the execution of the sentence of death. Even if this imprisonment is to be regarded as a part of the penalty, it stands upon the same grounds as other judgments of imprisonment. It is not stayed without a certificate of probable cause for the appeal, and no such certificate has been granted in this case. Writ denied.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RELIEF ON THE GROUND OF MISTAKE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, allowing three years within which to bring an action on the ground of mistake, and providing that the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the mistake by the aggrieved party, a merchant, more than three years after the settlement of an account, cannot recover an overpayment caused by a mistake of his bookkeeper, which he might have discovered at any time on investigation.

2. The fact that the person receiving the overpayment knew of the mistake at the time is immaterial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene K. Garber, Judge.

Action by Shain, assignee of a claim of J. Ivancovich & Co., against Sresovich, to recover an overpayment made to defendant by a mistake of plaintiff's assignors. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In 1886, J. Ivancovich & Co., plaintiff's assignors, had a joint venture with the defendant in the importation and sale of some oranges; and on the 1st of July of that year they presented to the defendant a statement and account of the transactions relating to the venture, showing that they were indebted to him in the sum of $2,063.51, and paid him that sum of money. These accounts were kept by the plaintiff's assignors in one of their firm books, in which were also placed an account of importation of oranges by themselves on their own account. The statement of the account which was given to the defendant was prepared by the bookkeeper of Ivancovich & Co., who had been in their employ for many years, and who continued to remain as their bookkeeper for several years thereafter, and who was a competent bookkeeper, and entitled to full confidence for carefulness and accuracy. About the end of the year 1886 the book in which these accounts had been entered was stored away by the firm, and was not again examined until the latter part of 1890. In February, 1891, the firm made an examination of this book, and found that the account rendered to the defendant was erroneous, and that, owing to a mistake therein, they had paid him $630.25 too much. Thereupon they assigned the claim to the plaintiff herein, who brought this action May 5, 1891, to recover the amount of said former payment, alleging in his complaint the foregoing facts. The court below found that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

It is contended by the appellant that he has a right to maintain the action by virtue of section 338, Code Civ. Proc., subdivision 4 of which allows three years within which to bring "an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake. The cause of action in such case not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake." Fraud and mistake are, by the above provisions of the statute, placed in the same category, and the rules applicable to the one must govern the other. Although the provision with reference to fraud, or one similar thereto, is found in the statute of nearly if not all of the states, we are not aware that a similar provision with reference to "mistake" exists in any of the states. The rule is well established that the means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge, and that a party who has the opportunity of knowing the facts constituting the fraud of which he complains cannot be supine and inactive, and afterwards allege a want of knowledge that arose by reason of his own laches or negligence. Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 135; Ware v. Galveston City Co., 146 U. S. 115, 13 Sup. Ct. 33. The question has usually arisen in determining whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show due diligence, or to take the case out of the statute of limitations, but the same rule is to be applied to the facts as found after a trial.

Applying the above rule to the present case, we are of the opinion that the plaintiff's assignors had, at all times after the payment to the defendant, such means of information with reference to the account between them and him, and of the mistake in the payment, that their failure to avail themselves of it charged them with the same result as though they had actual knowledge thereof. The accounts were kept under their supervision, or by their bookkeeper. The statement was made out by him. The book in which the account was kept, and from which the statement was presumably made, was retained by them, and was afterwards used by them, in which to place their own individual transactions, and was afterwards stored away by them. It is not claimed that the defendant ever saw the book, or took any part in the preparation of the statement, or that he sustained any relation to them which entitled them to rely upon any statement of his, or that he made any statement or did any act which induced them to make the payment. Under these circumstances they are not entitled to claim that the "discovery" of the mistake was within three years of the commencement of the action. If they could maintain the action under these circumstances, there is no limit to the time in which it might be commenced. It would be a new proposition in mercantile life, as well as in law, if we should hold that if a merchant, many years after he had retired from business, on looking over his account books through curiosity, should find that his bookkeeper had made a mistake in the account of one of his customers, he could recover from the customer for the merchandise that had been omitted from his account through such mistake, or get back from him the money which he had paid upon a settlement with him. "Statutes of limitation are vital to the welfare of society, and are favored in the law. They are found and approved in all systems of enlightened jurisprudence. They promote repose, by giving security and stability to human affairs. Important public policy lies at their foundation. They stimulate to activity and punish negligence. While time is constantly destroying the evidence of rights, they supply its place by a presumption which renders proof unnecessary. Mere delay, extending to the limit prescribed, is itself a conclusive bar." Wood v. Carpenter, supra.

The finding of the court that the defendant knew of the mistake and overpayment at or near the time the account was rendered, but never informed the firm thereof, does not add to the strength of the plaintiff's claim. It is not a finding that the payment was made to him with the knowledge on his part that it was a mistake, or that he contributed to the mistake; and, even if it had been, he had the right to rely upon the statute of limitations, if an action therefor was not brought within three years after Ivancovich knew, or had the means of knowing, of the mistake. The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1894.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALUITY.

An assignment of real and personal property for the benefit of creditors, which is recorded in a miscellaneous book of records, is valid as to creditors, though it might be avoided by a bona fide purchaser of the land for failure to record it in the deeds record.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Action by C. G. Watkins against R. E. Wilhoit and others to subject land to the payment of a judgment. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. For commissioners' decision, see 35 Pac. 646.

John B. Hall, for appellant. F. T. Baldwin, P. S. Wilkes, and J. C. Campbell, for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This action is of the nature of a creditors' bill in equity to subject property in the hands or under the control of the defendants Wilhoit and Langford to the payment of a judgment at law against defendant Bryant in favor of the plaintiff. A demurrer to the complaint having been sustained, and the plaintiff having declined to amend his complaint, judgment passed for defendants. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll, containing a bill of exceptions showing that the demurrer was sustained on the grounds "that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the action is barred by this statute of limitations."

The complaint shows that on June 2, 1890, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against Bryant for the sum of $2,342.60 on a promissory note made by the latter to the former on January 17, 1885, and that no part of the judgment has been paid. That before and on February 16, 1886, said Bryant was indebted to others besides the plaintiff, and was then, and ever since has been, insolvent, though he was then the owner of considerable real and personal property in the county of San Joaquin, where he resided. That on said 16th day of February, 1886, he executed to defendants Wilhoit and Langford and one Charles Bamert a deed purporting to convey to them all his real and personal property, except such as was exempt from execution, in trust for the benefit of all his creditors, without preference to any, except as provided by law, "to sell and dispose of said real estate and personal property, and to collect the said book accounts and choses in action, using a reasonable discretion as to the times and modes of selling and disposing of said estate as it respects making sales for cash or on credit, at public auction or by private contract or sale, with the right to compound for the said book accounts and choses in action, taking a part for the whole where and when the trustees deem and decree it expedient so to do;" then, after applying the proceeds to the payment of his debts according to law, to pay the surplus, if any, to him, Bryant. This instrument, with an inventory of the property thereby assigned attached thereto and made a part thereof, and the written acceptance of the trust by Wilhoit and Langford, are fully set out in the complaint. It is next alleged that said instrument has never been recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county in any book of records therein of grants, deeds or transfers of real estate, or in any book kept in said office for the recordation of conveyances or mortgages of either real or personal property, or otherwise or elsewhere recorded in said office, save and except that the instrument was, on the 16th day of February, 1886, transcribed into a book kept in said office, labeled "Book G, Miscellaneous." That within 30 days after the date of said instrument, pursuant to an order of a judge of the superior court, Wilhoit, Langford, and Bamert executed a bond with sureties for the faithful discharge of the trust as required by section 3467 of the Civil Code, and thereupon took possession of all the property described in said instrument, claiming title thereto as assignees. The complaint contains other allegations material to the cause of action, but not material to the points to be decided here.

The plaintiff contends that on the facts alleged the assignment of Bryant to Wilhoit and others was void as to him and other non-consenting creditors, and his principal point is that it was void because it was never properly recorded. The argument is that since the assignment embraced real property it was subject to the provisions of article 4 of the chapter on recording transfers (Civ. Code, §§ 1213-1217, 3466); and that, never having been transcribed by the recorder into the proper book of records, in compliance with the provisions of chapter 4, it remained totally void as to all nonconsenting creditors. But conceding, for the purposes of this case, everything for which the plaintiff contends, as to the futility of filing a conveyance in the recorder's office, where such filing is not followed up by transcription into the proper book of records in due time, his conclusion that this assignment was void as to nonconsenting creditors does not follow. The whole object of article 4 of the chapter on recording transfers is to prescribe the effect of recording or failing to record upon subsequent purchasers or mortgagees. An assignment of real property for the benefit of creditors ought to be subject to these provisions as much as any other transfer of real property, because it as much within the policy of the statute as any other transfer of such property. Subsequent purchasers and mortgagees are entitled to the same notice in one case as in the other, and have a right to rely on the same means of knowledge as to the true state of the title when parting with value on the faith of the apparent ownership. But with respect to creditors of the assignor who do not part with anything the case is totally different, and they are not within the policy of these provisions. A transfer may be valid as to them although void as to subsequent purchasers in good faith and for value. To determine the validity of an assignment as to creditors, we look to the title "On Assignments for the Benefit of Creditors" (Civ. Code, § 3449 et seq.). Such assignments must be acknowledged or proved and certified like transfers of real property, and they must be recorded (section 3458); not, however, as prescribed in chapter 4, supra, but in accordance with sections 3463, 3464, of the Civil Code, neither of which, by its letter or spirit, requires transcription into any book of records in order to effect a complete transfer of the property to the assignee as against creditors. The object of recording, so far as they are concerned, seems to be to make the assignment public and irrevocable, and when that object is accomplished the creditors are fully protected. All are placed upon an equal footing. So far as creditors are concerned, the law is satisfied if the assignment is recorded in the county where the debtor resides, but to be effective against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees it must (under chapter 4, supra) be recorded in every county where any of the real property is situated, and it must be so recorded as to give them constructive notice. To determine what will give such constructive notice we look to section 1213 et seq., Civ. Code, but to determine what is recording without reference to the question of notice to subsequent purchasers we look to section 1170, Id. "An instrument is deemed to be recorded when, being duly acknowledged or proved and certified, it is deposited in the recorder's office with the proper officer for record." The complaint shows that this section was fully complied with. The assignment was recorded, and became binding and irrevocable as to the assignor and all creditors. True, it was subject to chapter 4 of the article on transfers, and if it was not recorded as that chapter requires it may be questioned by a subsequent purchaser or mortgagee; but the plaintiff in this case is not in that position.

The other objections to the assignment do not appear to merit particular discussion. The assignment was valid and effective, and the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

DOW v. NASON et al. (No. 19,329.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1894.)

PROMISSORY NOTE — PAYMENT BY PAYEE — EFFECT ON MAKER'S LIABILITY.

The payee of a note, in order to be able to have it discounted, induced another person to indorse it. An extension note, which was signed by the surety, but not by the maker, was paid, for the benefit of the surety, by the payee of the original note; and both notes were marked "Paid," and delivered to him. Held, that such payment did not extinguish the original maker's liability, as it was not by a mere volunteer.

In bank.

On petition for a rehearing. Denied.

For opinion on appeal, see 37 Pac. 656.

BEATTY, C. J. In his petition for a rehearing, counsel for appellant complains that his position has been misunderstood, and his points left undecided. As the opinion of the department is extremely brief, it will not be improper for me to state somewhat more fully the grounds upon which I concur in the order denying a rehearing. There is perhaps a slight verbal inaccuracy in that part of the opinion which states that the principal point in the case is whether the notes of H. W. Nason were paid. The question is rather whether they were so paid as to extinguish the indebtedness of H. W. Nason, and to restore to the plaintiff, as receiver of his estate, the ownership of the $5,000 note, by which they were partly secured. The superior court found that they were not paid, but were assigned to the Pamo Water Company, with their collateral. In order to support the judgment, it is not necessary that the evidence should sustain this finding, in the broadest sense of its terms. It is sufficient if there is evidence to show that, although the notes were paid, they were paid under such circumstances as to work an assignment to the water company; and I think the evidence does fully sustain the finding, in this sense. These are the facts: Nason bought from the water company 1,000 shares of its stock, and, in payment therefor, executed to Robinson, the president and trustee of the company, his note for $7,500, pledging the $5,000 note, which is in controversy here, as collateral security. The water company, being desirous of raising money, applied to the California National Bank of San Diego to discount Nason's note, which the bank agreed to do, but only on condition that Wood and Jones, members of the corporation, should indorse the note as sureties. This they did for the benefit of the company, and the bank took an assignment of the note, with its collateral. Nason did not pay it when it became due, but, by consent of the bank, renewed it several times; the accrued interest being added to the principal, and Wood and Jones signing as sureties. The last of these renewal notes was signed by Wood and Jones as sureties, but, owing to the temporary absence of Nason from the state, was not signed by him. Pending his return the bank retained possession of it and the previous renewal note. Before Nason had an opportunity of signing the last note, the bank went into the hands of a receiver, and this accounts for the existence of two notes for the same indebtedness. One of the points contended for by appellant was that one payment of this indebtedness extinguished both notes, and he complains that this point was overlooked. It was not necessary to notice this point, for the simple reason that there appears to be no controversy as to the fact that both notes were paid in the same sense. But the question, and the only material question, in the case, is whether they were so paid as to extinguish the indebtedness of Nason. Payment was made by the water company to the receiver of the bank. Both notes were marked "Paid," and delivered to the water company by the receiver, who at the same time transferred to the company the $5,000 note held as collateral. The contention of appellant is that the water company made this payment as a mere volunteer, and that the effect was to extinguish the indebtedness of Nason. He bases this contention upon the legal proposition that no man can be made debtor for money paid to his use unless he has requested the payment. But the fault in this argument is that the water company was not a volunteer. The sureties on the notes had become such for its benefit and accommodation. It was under a moral obligation certainly, and perhaps legally bound, to protect or reimburse them; and the circumstances under which it paid the notes fully warrant the conclusion that the payment was made in their behalf, and for their benefit. It was payment by one who was virtually, though not nominally, Nason's surety; and neither he nor his successor has any right to question the arrangement under which the company has merely discharged its own obligation, for really there is no substantial merit or equity in the claim of appellant, seeking, as he does, to reap where he has not sown, or, in other words, to subject another to loss in order that he may gain. In this view the findings of the superior court as to nonpayment and assignment of Nason's notes are fully sustained. They were paid as to the bank, but not as between Nason and the water company. They were not assigned to the water company by the receiver of the bank, but the water company was subrogated to the rights of the bank, and the collateral security transferred by the statute. Civ. Code, § 2349. This being so, the question as to the authority of the bank's receiver to assign the note becomes wholly immaterial.

ROGERS v. CADY, Sheriff, et al. (No. 18,296.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1894.)

JUDICIAL NOTICE—COURTS—JURISDICTION—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. Courts will take judicial notice of the boundaries of a county, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, providing that the courts will take judicial notice of "whatever is established by law."

2. A government survey of public lands is a public, official act of the executive department of the United States, within the meaning of Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, providing that courts shall take judicial notice of such acts.

3. Under Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that all actions to recover possession of real estate, or for quieting title thereto or enforcing liens thereon, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate is situated, the superior court of Lassen county has no jurisdiction of an action to foreclose a mortgage on land situated in Shasta county.

4. Where a judgment for foreclosure of a mortgage on land was rendered in the county of S., while the land was situated in L. county, the mortgagor, in an action to enjoin the sheriff from proceeding with the foreclosure sale, is not estopped from denying the jurisdiction of the court by a false recital in the judgment that the land was in S. county.

5. A court cannot, by rendering a decision in a cause, acquire jurisdiction of the subject-matter, denied it by the constitution.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. T. Masten, Judge.

Action by Rogers against Cady, sheriff of Lassen county, and others, to enjoin a foreclosure sale of lands situated in Shasta county. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Shinn & Shinn and S. Solon Holl, for appellants. Spencer & Raker, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In 1884 the plaintiff executed to one Stanton a mortgage upon certain lands which are situate in Shasta county, but which were described in the mortgage as being in Lassen county, and the mortgage was recorded in Lassen county. In 1889 an action was commenced in Lassen county by the defendant Russell, as administrator of Stanton, to foreclose the mortgage, and in the complaint in this action the property sought to be foreclosed was described as follows: "The southeast quarter of northwest quarter, and lots 1 and 2 in section 31, township 37 north, range 6 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, containing 116 97-100 acres, according to government surveys." Service of the summons was had upon the defendant in the action (plaintiff herein), and, upon his failure to appear or answer the complaint, his default was entered, and judgment rendered August 26, 1889, foreclosing the mortgage, and directing a sale of the premises by the sheriff of Lassen county. An order of sale was issued upon this judgment October 5, 1892, by virtue of which the defendant Cady, as sheriff of Lassen county, was proceeding to sell the premises, when the plaintiff instituted the present action to enjoin him from making such sale. The case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, as prayed for. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the defendants have appealed from both the judgment and order.

It is urged in support of the appeal that, by the judgment in the foreclosure suit, it was determined that the mortgaged premises are situated in Lassen county, and that by reason of this judgment the plaintiff herein is estopped from showing that said premises are not situated in that county. The lands affected by the foreclosure proceedings are clearly and distinctly described in the complaint therein, and in the judgment, by reference to the section and township of the government survey. The plaintiff was not required to introduce any evidence at the trial in support of his averment that these lands are situated in Shasta county. The county in which lands so described are situated is a matter within the judicial knowledge of the court, and is to be determined by it in the same manner as a legal proposition, and cannot be made an "issue" between the parties, to be determined by the court, in each case, upon conflicting evidence presented in that case. For the purpose of informing itself the court might inquire of others, or refer to books or documents, or any other source of information which it might deem authentic, but its action in this respect is not a part of the trial of issues in the action. Matters of which a court takes judicial knowledge are uniform and fixed, and do not depend upon uncertain testimony, and the failure or refusal of a trial court to take such notice does not prevent the appellate court from giving proper effect thereto. See Hunter v. Railroad Co., 116 N. Y. 615, 23 N. E. 9. Every court, by virtue of its organization, takes judicial knowledge of the extent and boundaries of the territory within which it can exercise jurisdiction, as well as the subject-matter over which jurisdiction has been conferred upon it. Section 1875, Code Civ. Proc., declares: "Courts take judicial notice of the following facts: * * * (2) Whatever is established by law. (3) Public and private official acts of the legislative, executive and judicial departments of this state and of the United States." The boundaries of Lassen county are "established by law" (Pol. Code, § 3912); and the government surveys of the public lands are "public, official acts of the executive department of the United States," and are matters of official record. It was therefore a matter for the court to determine, either from the personal knowledge of the judge, or from an examination by him of those records, whether any of the sections in township 37 N., range 6 E., M. D. M., were situated in Lassen county or not. Smitha v. Flournoy, 47 Ala. 348; Devine v. Burleson, 35 Neb. 238, 52 N. W. 1112; People v. Wood, 131 N. Y. 617, 30 N. E. 243; Fackler v. Wright, 86 Cal. 210, 24 Pac. 996; Cole v. Seagraves, 88 Cal. 103, 25 Pac. 1109.

The judgment in the foreclosure proceedings did not estop the plaintiff herein from asserting that the mortgaged premises are situated in Shasta county. That judgment merely declared that the plaintiff herein had mortgaged "the southeast quarter of northwest quarter, and lots 1 and 2 in section 31, township 37 north, range 6 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, containing 116 97-100 acres, according to government surveys." In view of the fact that the court below, as well as this court, takes judicial knowledge that these sections are not within Lassen county, the further recital in the judgment that they are "situated in the county of Lassen" may be likened to a false call in a deed of conveyance. The lands which the court adjudged had been mortgaged were the designated sections, and the further inconsistent declaration by it that they are situated in Lassen county must yield to the determination of their particular situation.

Even if the language used by the court could be regarded as an express adjudication that the lands are within Lassen county, it would not estop the plaintiff from asserting that the court was without jurisdiction to render such judgment. The judgment of a court may always be impeached for want of jurisdiction, and, when the judgment is upon a subject-matter over which the court could under no circumstances have any jurisdiction, the objection may be taken at any time when such judgment is invoked. A judgment of one of the former district courts in this state, admitting a will to probate, or a judgment of one of the present superior courts in this state, convicting a person of smuggling, or enjoining a defendant from infringing a copyright, would have no validity, under any circumstances, for the reason that the subject-matter of such judgment was never within the jurisdiction of the court. There is no occasion in the present case to invoke a presumption of jurisdiction from the fact of its exercise. The want of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the judgment. By section 5 of article 6 of the constitution, an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon lands in Shasta county could not be commenced in the superior court of Lassen county; and, when it appeared from the description of the lands set forth in the complaint that they were not within Lassen county, the proceeding should have been dismissed. Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. 867. A court cannot, by any decision that it may make, either implied or direct, acquire jurisdiction over a subject-matter that has been denied to it by the constitution; and, whenever it appears upon the face of a judgment that it was rendered upon a subject over which the court could have no jurisdiction, such judgment has no validity. The constitution denied to the superior court of Lassen county any jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the foreclosure proceedings, and, as it never had any jurisdiction to entertain the action, its determination upon any question arising in this proceeding cannot have any authority. There are certain cases in which the jurisdiction of a court depends upon the existence of some quasi jurisdictional fact necessary to be proven in order to authorize the court to act, and which it must itself determine from evidence before it can have jurisdiction to determine the controversy. Brittain v. Kinnaird, 1 Brod. & B. 432, is a leading illustration of this principle; and in Noble v. Railroad, 147 U. S. 174, 13 Sup. Ct. 271, may be found reference to a number of cases of the same character. But the present case does not fall within this principle. As we have seen above, there was no question of fact to be determined by the trial court. When the subject-matter upon which the jurisdiction of a court rests is limited by the constitution, the court looks to that instrument for its jurisdiction, and cannot, by its mere decision, acquire jurisdiction over a matter therein denied to it. The plaintiff herein did not take any step in the foreclosure proceedings which could be regarded as an estoppel on his part, or a waiver of his right to object to the jurisdiction of the court. The first step taken by him was to make this objection, and he made it as soon as the plaintiff attempted to enforce the judgment. As the plaintiff did not attempt to enforce the judgment until more than three years had elapsed after its entry, he ought not to complain if in the meantime he has lost any rights by reason of his inaction. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1894.)
MARINE INSURANCE — ACTION ON POLICY — EVIDENCE — BARRATRY OF MASTER — UNNECESSARY SALE OF GOODS — STATEMENTS OF AGENT — ADMISSIBILITY.

1. In an action on a marine policy on merchandise, the question whether a sale by the master of the merchandise was due to the perils of the sea depends on whether a reasonably prudent man would, under the circumstances, have deemed it necessary to sell the goods.

2. In an action on a marine policy insuring merchandise against the barratry of the master, evidence that much of the cargo was sold, some of it beyond its original price, before it was discharged, and before the damage to the vessel was ascertained; that the cost of repairing the vessel was trifling, and occupied only a few days; that the master, a part owner of the vessel, though knowing the owner, failed to notify him either of the damage to or sale of the cargo; and that soon after the repair of the vessel he abandoned the voyage, and sailed to another, distant port,—is sufficient to sustain a verdict that the sale was barratrous.

3. The fact that the master of a vessel is also a part owner does not incapacitate him to commit barratry as to the cargo.

4. Where, at the instance of the insurer, a member of the Board of Underwriters, a telegram is sent to the board's agent at the port where an insured cargo was sold, such agent's letter to the board in answer thereto, in regard to the loss and sale, is admissible against the insurer, though it is not entirely responsive to the telegram, it being in the nature of a report to his principal by an agent, and therefore equivalent to admissions by the principal.

5. A letter by such agent to a reinsurer is not competent evidence against the insured, as it is merely a statement to a third party, with whom the insured has no relation.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Meyer and others against the Great Western Insurance Company. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Milton Andros (E. W. McGraw, of counsel), for appellant. Page & Eells and Pillsbury & Blanding, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The defendant issued its policy of insurance to the plaintiffs in the sum of $9,500, against an actual total loss of certain merchandise, consisting of coke, coal, soda crystals, and soda ash in the ship Melanesia on her voyage from Newcastle-on-Tyne to San Francisco, and also $500 on commissions and freight profits. The risks against which the insurance was made were the perils of the sea, barratry of the master and mariners, and other perils usually insured against in a policy of marine insurance. The Melanesia sailed from Newcastle on the 21st day of December, 1884, and on the 21st of June following, in consequence of having sprung a leak, she proceeded to Montevideo, where she was repaired and put in a fit condition to proceed on her voyage, and on the 17th of October, 1885, she sailed from Montevideo for Akyab, in India, where she arrived January 4, 1886. Upon her arrival at Montevideo, the master discharged the soda ash and soda crystals from the vessel, and sold them at public auction. The coke and coal were sold by him upon the vessel before they were discharged. Other portions of the cargo were sold by him, and the voyage to San Francisco was abandoned. The plaintiffs brought this action, claiming an actual total loss under the provisions of the policy, while the defendant denied that the loss had occurred within any of the risks assumed by it. Upon the issues thus made, evidence was presented to the jury, from which they were called upon to determine whether the sale by the master was necessitated by reason of the perils of the sea, or whether he was actuated by improper motives in making the sale. Upon these points the jury were fully instructed by the court in reference to the law applicable thereto, and to these instructions no exception was taken. The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff; and a new trial was asked upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and for certain errors of law occurring at the trial. From the judgment and the order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

In the statement on motion for a new trial the defendant specifies, as the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to show that the cargo was lost by reason of any of the perils insured against, that it does not appear that there was any necessity for its sale, or that, if the cargo had been reshipped, it would not have arrived at San Francisco as the article originally shipped, or that it was in such a condition as to make it dangerous for the ship to carry it forward to its place of destination; and also that the evidence was insufficient to show that the master acted in bad faith, or fraudulently, or from any improper motive in making the sale. These specifications are pointed to the instructions of the court, in which the jury were told, in substance, that if, from the evidence, they found these facts, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. There was evidence before the jury upon all of these matters, and at the request of the respective parties the jury were fully instructed by the court upon the propositions of law applicable thereto. They were told the conditions which would create a necessity for the sale, and what would be an actual total loss of the articles insured, within the meaning of the policy; and they were also told that the necessity of the sale was to be determined by them from all the circumstances of the case, as disclosed by the evidence. Their verdict in favor of the plaintiffs establishes that they were satisfied from the evidence that there was an actual total loss, within the meaning of the policy, as construed under the instructions of the court; and, if there is any evidence in support of the verdict, the verdict must be upheld. The refusal of the trial court to set it aside is itself of great weight, and shows that, in the opinion of the judge who heard the case, the evidence was sufficient to uphold it. It is not sufficient thereafter, upon an appeal, to point out, or even demonstrate to this court, that the verdict is against the preponderance of evidence, or that upon the same evidence other persons would come to a different conclusion. If there is any evidence upon which the jury could have found its verdict, it must be upheld.

It would serve no useful purpose to review the record, and point out the portions which sustain the conclusion of the jury. The intrinsic character of the cargo, its condition upon its arrival at Montevideo, and the extent of injury it had then received, the effect of discharging and reshipping the several portions thereof, the liability to further injury by a prosecution of the voyage, and the probability of risk or danger in attempting to continue the voyage to San Francisco with some portions of the cargo, were all laid before the jury; and they were required to determine whether, upon a fair consideration of all these circumstances, acting as reasonable men would act, there was that necessity for making the sale which the court had told them was necessary in order to bring the loss within the risks assumed by the defendant. It was not necessary to demonstrate with mathematical exactness the impossibility of continuing the voyage with the cargo, or that, if it was reshipped, it would not sustain injury or create danger; nor was the actual condition of the cargo at Montevideo an absolute test of the necessity of the sale. The question to be determined by the jury was whether a prudent man, in the exercise of his deliberate judgment, and upon a reasonable calculation of the future, under the light of these circumstances and the facts disclosed by this evidence, would deem it necessary to sell the cargo. The consideration of these circumstances as they were presented to the jury created at least a substantial conflict in the evidence upon this proposition, and we are not at liberty to disregard the conclusion at which they arrived.

The jury were also instructed that, if the sale by the master was barratrous, there was an actual, total loss, within the meaning of the policy; and upon this subject they were told that, "if the master acted in bad faith in selling the cargo of the Melanesia for the purpose of serving his own ends, or acted against what he knew or believed to be the law, though he thought he was advancing the interests of the owners of the cargo, then his conduct in selling the cargo was what is called 'barratrous.'" Upon this point there was evidence to the effect that the cost of repairing the vessel was trifling, and occupied only a few days; that much of the cargo was sold before it was discharged, and before the master had had an opportunity to ascertain the extent of damage to his vessel; that some of it was sold for a price beyond that of its original cost; that the master knew the insured and the owners of the cargo, and failed to communicate with them, or notify them of the damage, or of his sale of the cargo, or of his purpose to make the sale; that the master was himself a part owner of the vessel; and that, very soon after its repair, he abandoned the voyage to San Francisco, and sailed for a distant port in India. These facts might well cause the jury to believe that he had acted in bad faith in making the sale; that his interest in the vessel and its earnings prompted him to seek a different field therefor, and caused him to forego his obligation to protect the cargo, for the benefit that he might derive by abandoning the voyage. See New Orleans Ins. Co. v. Albro Co., 112 U. S. 506, 5 Sup. Ct. 289. Especially if the jury had believed, as is contended by the appellant upon the proposition previously discussed, that the ship was in a seaworthy condition and fit to make the voyage to San Francisco, and that there was no necessity for a sale of the cargo, would they be authorized to find that the sale was made in bad faith, and that the master had been guilty of barratry. The fact that the master was a part owner in the vessel did not incapacitate him from committing barratry, especially with reference to the cargo. Jones v. Nicholson, 10 Exch. 28.

Certain rulings of the court are assigned as error, but none of them are such as to authorize a reversal of the judgment. The plaintiff offered in evidence a letter from Theobald & Co., of Montevideo, to the secretary of the San Francisco Board of Underwriters, of which body the defendant was a member, acknowledging the receipt of a telegram regarding the loss of the Melanesia. The plaintiff Meyer had testified: "I had a conversation with the agent of the defendant with reference to the agents of the Board of Underwriters at Montevideo,—Theobald & Co. He several times told me they were waiting to get an answer from Theobald & Co. about the particulars of the accident to the Melanesia, and of the action taken thereupon. * * * From the conversations I had with the agent of the Great Western Insurance Company, he told me, while the risk on the Melanesia was pending, that the Union Insurance Company was interested as reinsurers of the Great Western, and he had to consult with Mr. Touchard, the then president of the Union Insurance Company, and that they had decided to telegraph to J. K. Theobald & Co. that the ship must continue on her voyage; and they gave me at the time even the terms of the identical cable which they had sent." The defendant objected to a portion of the letter "as being immaterial and irrelevant, and as being the talk of Theobald, giving his opinion on a variety of matters not responsive to any telegram sent to him;" but the objection was overruled. There was no error in this ruling. The portion objected to was not inadmissible for the reason that it was not responsive to the language of the telegram. It was written by reason of the telegram that had been sent at the instance of the defendant, and was a part of the correspondence by the defendant with reference to the loss. It was relevant to the issues before the court, and might become material upon showing the relations of Theobald & Co. to the defendant. No objection was made to its competency on the ground that Theobald & Co. were not the agents of the defendant, or that the scope of their agency did not include the disposition of the insured property. Meyer had referred to them as the agents of the Board of Underwriters, and it was admitted that the defendant was a member of that board, and the agent of the defendant had stated to him that the telegram had been sent at his instance. The statement of facts connected with the disposition of the cargo is to be considered in the nature of a report by a general agent to his principal. Such a report is equivalent to a declaration by the principal himself. See Whart. Ev. § 1177. The statements in the letter that the writer considered the sale best for all concerned, and that he considered the prices obtained very good, were, it is true, mere matters of opinion; but they were not specially objected to, and, even if they had been, they are of such a character that no harm could have resulted from their being brought to the knowledge of the jury. The subsequent letter from Theobald & Co. to the Union Insurance Company was properly excluded. It was merely a statement to a third party, with whom the plaintiffs had no relation. The other rulings objected to are not of such a nature as to require any comment. The court committed no error in modifying the instructions asked for by the defendant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

WHEELAN v. BRICKELL et al. (No. 15,557.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1894.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE—PUBLIC LANDS—TRUSTS.

In 1860 a married man went into possession of government land known as the "Outside Lands" of San Francisco. In 1863 he died, and his wife, with their children, continued in possession, and was in possession at the passage of Act Cong. March 8, 1866 (14 Stat. 4), relinquishing the title of the United States in said lands to the city of San Francisco, in trust to be "disposed of and conveyed by said city, to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof by themselves or tenants on the passage of this act," on such terms as the legislature should prescribe. While the husband and wife were in possession, they executed a declaration of homestead under the California homestead act of 1862, by which the homestead estate, on the death of either, vested absolutely in the survivor. Thereafter, the city deeded the land to the widow, she having complied with the various ordinances and legislative acts relative thereto. Held, that as she had bona fide, actual possession at the passage of the act, no trust arose, under the conveyance to her, in favor of said children. Baker v. Brickell, 25 Pac. 489, 1067, 87 Cal. 329, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Fairfax H. Wheelan, administrator of the estate of John H. Baker, deceased, against John Brickell and another, to quiet title to the said estate. Judgment by default for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

King & Shaw, for appellant. A. N. Drown, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action by Fairfax H. Wheelan, administrator of the estate of John H. Baker, deceased, to quiet the title of the estate of the said John H. Baker, deceased, in and to certain lands, known as "Outside Lands," situate and being within the present limits of the city and county of San Francisco; to have said lands restored to the possession of said estate for administration and distribution; to recover damages from defendants as and for the value of the use and occupation, rents, issues, and profits thereof, etc. Defendants interposed a demurrer to the complaint upon several statutory grounds, among which was that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained by the court below, and, plaintiff having declined to amend his complaint within the time and pursuant to the leave for that purpose granted, his default was duly entered, and final judgment for costs was entered in favor of defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals. The questions arising on the appeal in this case are substantially the same as those considered by this court in the action No. 15,074, between the same parties, decided June 10, 1893 (not reported in California Reports, but see 33 Pac. 396), and in Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 329, 25 Pac. 489, 1067. What was said in Wheelan v. Brickell, No. 15,074, will apply with equal force here; and upon the authority of that case, and of Baker v. Brickell, 87 Cal. 329, 25 Pac. 489, 1067, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LEE SACK SAM v. GRAY. (No. 18,271.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1894.)

REFERENCE—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE—FINDINGS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 643, requires referees to report their findings in writing, and state separately therein the facts and conclusions of law. Section 1508 provides that in case of a reference of a doubtful claim against the estate the same proceedings shall be had as in other cases of reference. Held, that findings by the court, sitting as a referee to determine the validity of a claim against the estate, stating that "the evidence produced herein is insufficient to establish the validity of said claim," without setting out any of the evidence, is insufficient to support a judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

The validity of a note held by Lee Sack Sam against the estate of Man Wo Chan, deceased, was submitted to the judge of the superior court of Fresno county as referee. From a judgment disallowing the claim, Lee Sack Sam appeals. Reversed.

Thos. F. Barry and Wiley J. Tinnin, for appellant. M. Farley and J. W. Knox, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order or judgment in probate made by the superior court of the county of Fresno, and comes up on the judgment roll, without any statement or bill of exceptions. The following facts will sufficiently illustrate the proceedings had: On the 4th day of April, 1892, Lee Sack Sam presented his claim against the estate of Man Wo Chan, deceased, duly verified, for $21,600, to William W. Gray, administrator of said estate, for allowance. The claim is founded upon a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "$20,000. San Francisco, Dec. 29, 1889. Eight months after date (no grace), for value received in gold coin of the government of the United States, I promise to pay to Lee Sack Sam, or order, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, with interest from date, at the rate of one per cent. per month until paid, both principal and interest payable alike in gold coin. [Signed] Lee Sing." Which promissory note is indorsed as follows: "For value received, hereby waive protest, demand, and notice of non-payment. Man Wo Chan. Man Wo Chan." No action was taken on said claim by the administrator of the estate of Man Wo Chan, deceased, until on or about January 16, 1893, when the administrator, being in doubt as to the correctness of the claim, entered into an agreement in writing with the claimant, under section 1507 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to refer the matter in controversy to the superior court of Fresno county for decision, "or, in other words, that a reference may be had in said court." The agreement was approved by the court, and duly filed in the office of the county clerk; and thereafter a minute of the order was entered, etc., as provided by section 1507, supra. The court, sitting as a referee, heard the case and made its report, wherein there is set out what purports to be the testimony taken, and found the facts and conclusions of law as follows: "(1) That said claim was presented to the administrator, E. H. Cox, within the proper time after first publication of notice to creditors. (2) That the evidence produced herein is insufficient to establish the validity of said claim, or to authorize the same to be allowed or approved. And, as a conclusion from the foregoing, said referee advises that said claim be not approved or allowed, but that the same be rejected. Dated April 23, 1893. S. A. Holmes, Judge of the Superior Court (said court sitting herein as referee)." The report of the referee was presented in open court April 22, 1893, and an order entered approving the same, and the claim "disallowed, disapproved, and rejected." On the 23d day of May, 1893, a judgment was entered by the court, adjudging that Lee Sack Sam take nothing by his claim and reference against the estate of Man Wo Chan, deceased, and awarding the costs of the proceeding against the said claimant, as provided by section 1508, Code Civ. Proc.

Counsel for respondent make several objections to the consideration of the testimony on this appeal, only one of which need be noticed. The report of the referee is simply a report of the evidence upon which he based his decision, and forms no part of the judgment roll. "A copy of the verdict of the jury, or finding of the court or referee," forms a part of the judgment roll. But the testimony, unless embodied in a bill of exceptions and filed, is not a part thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 670; Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 109. It only remains to inquire in relation to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment. Section 1508, supra, provides that in cases of this character "the same proceedings shall be had in all respects, and the referee shall have the same powers * * * and be subject to the same control as in other cases of reference." The apparent object of this section seems to be to bring referees in this class of cases within the rules prescribed for their government and direction in ordinary cases. Turning to section 643 of the same Code, and we find it provided that "the referees or commissioner must report their findings in writing to the court, * * * and the facts found and conclusions of law must be separately stated therein;" and by section 645, "when the referee is to report the facts, the finding reported has the effect of a special verdict." "As the same proceedings shall be had in all respects" in the class of cases we are considering, it must follow that the referee should not only report in writing, but find the facts upon which the judgment of the court is thereafter to be pronounced. By no other means can the court be informed so as to intelligently act in the premises. In this view the findings in this case are fatally defective. No court can say from them whether the claim as presented was, in point of law, one that should have been allowed or rejected by the administrator. In cases tried by the court, written findings may be waived, as prescribed by section 634, Code Civ. Proc.; and in favor of the judgment, if no findings appear, such waiver will be presumed, unless the contrary is made to appear. This presumption can have no application to the report of a referee, for the reason that no provision is made for a waiver in such cases, and, in the very nature of the case, should not be. It will not do to say that in this instance the court or the judge thereof was the referee, and hence that no findings were necessary. The court or judge sitting as a referee is as distinct in law from the court acting as such within its own proper sphere as if a different referee had been selected. The Code fixes one rule for the guidance of all referees, and they are alike, and without exception, subject to its provisions. The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and a rehearing had.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and a rehearing ordered.

In re DOBBEL'S ESTATE. (No. 15,569.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1894.)

WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—POLICY ON HUSBAND'S LIFE—HUSBAND'S RIGHTS AS HEIR.

1. A life insurance policy taken out by a husband, and made payable to his wife, her executors, administrators, or assigns, is her separate property; and he is entitled to one-third thereof, as heir of the wife, in case she dies first.

2. The fact that there was no administration on the wife's estate until after the husband's death does not deprive his estate of his right as her heir.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

Appeal by Henry Dobbel and another from a judgment in the matter of the estate of Margaretha L. Dobbel. Reversed.

Geo. C. Ross and Henry W. Walker, for appellants. Edw. F. Fitzpatrick, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a decree of final distribution of an estate, and is taken by the administrator of the estate of Henry Dobbel, deceased, and by a creditor of his estate. The facts of the case may be briefly stated as follows: Henry Dobbel took out a paid-up policy of insurance upon his life in favor of his wife, Margaretha. Margaretha died intestate. Six years later, her husband, Henry, died. The policy was made payable to "Margaretha L. Dobbel, her executors, administrators, or assigns." Upon the death of Henry, his son was appointed administrator of Margaretha's estate; and the insurance company paid him, as such administrator, the amount of the policy. The husband and wife left, surviving them, seven children; and, by the decree of distribution appealed from in this case, the trial court awarded the proceeds of this policy to the children in equal shares. It is now claimed by appellant that the estate of Henry Dobbel is entitled to all of said moneys as community property; and, secondly, if this contention be unsound, that his estate is entitled to one-third of said moneys, the husband being an heir of the wife, and the money being her separate property.

It cannot technically be said that the money here in dispute was either the separate property of the wife, or common property of the spouses, for this money was the property of the insurance company until after the death of both, and until it passed to her administrator. But the insurance policy, when issued, was property, and valuable property. It could be sold, assigned, or bequeathed by the owner thereof. Its pecuniary value to its owners was as great as though they held a promissory note of the company for that amount, payable upon the same conditions. It was a chose in action, and, upon its satisfaction by a payment of the amount specified, the title to the money so paid followed the title to the policy. This policy was the separate property of the wife under any aspect of the case. If it was bought with the separate property of the husband, or with money of the community, it was a gift by the husband to the wife. That a policy payable as the present one is payable is the separate property of the wife there is no question, viewed in the light of the authorities. Pence v. Makepeace, 65 Ind. 345; Wilburn v. Wilburn, 83 Ind. 55; Harley v. Heist, 86 Ind. 196, and cases there cited; Bliss, Ins. § 317. The principle involved and decided in the case cited from 86 Ind. is in all material respects the same as that which is now before us, and the court there used the following language: "The policy in this case, by its terms, was executed for the benefit of the wife, and, by a fair construction, was payable to her, and not to the personal representatives of the husband. Upon its execution the title vested in the wife, and not in the husband. By the procurement of the husband, the wife became the owner of the policy, and entitled to collect the amount that might become due on the same upon the death of the husband. Had the wife procured the policy to be issued and paid the premiums, no one could doubt as to the ownership of the policy and the right to collect the money due thereon. We are unable to see in this case why there should be any difference in the ownership and title of the policy by reason of the application having been made and the premiums paid by the husband. Had the policy been made payable to the husband, he, doubtless, might have given it to the wife, and, by proper indorsements thereon, conveyed to her the legal title to the same. In such case it would have become her separate property by gift from her husband; and so, too, he had the legal right in the first instance to make the application, pay the premiums, and have the policy made payable to the wife for her benefit, and thus vest in her the legal title and ownership of the property as her separate property."

The policy of insurance, being her separate property, passed to her heirs at the time of her death, she having died intestate; and her husband took a one-third interest therein, by virtue of his heirship. There is no reason why the administration upon Margaretha's estate should have been delayed until her husband's death. Conceding her estate to have consisted alone of the insurance policy, still it was property, subject to administration and distribution as any other piece of personal property. If such administration and distribution had taken place prior to the husband's death, he would have stood in the same relation to this policy as he would to any other separate property owned by her, and title to a one-third interest therein would have passed to him, as an heir and distributee. If such a course had been followed, his interest in the policy would have passed to his estate like any other property which may have belonged to him at the time of his death, and the mere fact that no administration was had upon his wife's estate until after his death in no way affects the title to the policy. The husband's estate occupies exactly the same position with reference to this policy that it does with reference to any other piece of property belonging to the wife at the time of her death. As an heir of his wife, he had an interest in her estate, which he could at any time have sold, subject to the claims of administration thereon. He could have disposed of it by will; and if he had the right to sell or devise, and failed to exercise that right, it passed to his heirs, subject to administration.

For the foregoing reasons, we think one-third of the moneys forming the proceeds of this insurance policy should have been distributed to the administrator of the estate of Henry Dobbel. It is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree in accordance with these views.

PEOPLE v. PORTER. (No. 21,111.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 27, 1894.)

PERJURY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for perjury for making a false affidavit to schedules in insolvency, evidence that defendant, shortly before filing the schedules, collected large sums of money, for which he failed to account, and that his wife, accompanied by him, deposited in bank, shortly afterwards, a large sum in her own name, is insufficient to warrant a conviction.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Daniel M. Porter was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

Geo. A. Knight and Spalsbury & Burke, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of perjury, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. It appears by the information that the perjury charged against the appellant, and of which he was convicted, consisted in taking a false oath to his petition and schedules in insolvency; and the falsity of the oath consisted in the statement that he intentionally and fraudulently omitted therefrom certain of his property, to wit, "money and other personal effects." It is now claimed that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict, and, upon a careful examination of the record, we have arrived at that conclusion. The salient points in the evidence upon which the people rely for a conviction may be briefly stated as follows: (1) Appellant was engaged in the business of carrying on a sawmill for the manufacture of lumber. (2) About 10 days prior to the day upon which his petition in insolvency was filed, and in the after part of the night, his office and all his account books were destroyed by fire. It was attempted to show that he was the cause of this fire, but the evidence wholly fails to support the claim. (3) During the 90 days preceding the day of the commission of the alleged perjury, appellant collected large sums of money from his debtors; and, as shown by his schedule attached to his petition in insolvency, he had no money on hand at the time of the filing of the same (there is no evidence in the record indicating what disposition was made of these moneys). (4) Ten days after the filing of his petition in insolvency, his wife, accompanied by himself, deposited to her credit, in the Hibernia Savings Bank of the City of San Francisco, $3,250. There are a few other matters of evidence disclosed by the record which we deem of little importance, and unnecessary to here detail. It is now claimed by the prosecution that this $3,250 deposited in the name of the wife in the Hibernia Bank was money of the appellant, belonging to him at the time he filed his petition and schedule in insolvency and took the aforesaid false oath, and that therein lies the commission of the perjury. If the rule as to the character of evidence requisite to support a conviction upon a charge of perjury were the same as that demanded in all other cases, with a few exceptions, we would even hesitate, under such circumstances, to declare the charge here alleged proven, for a simple recital of this evidence could hardly be said to satisfy an unbiased, ordinary mind, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the money deposited in the bank by the wife was the money of the husband 10 days prior to that time. Such a conclusion could only be reached after an indulgence in surmises, speculations, and conjectures, not countenanced in criminal law. But whatever aspect the case may present, viewed in the light of the general and ordinary rules of evidence, the rule of evidence necessary to convict upon a charge of perjury is specially declared by the statute, and by that statute courts are bound. That rule declares that perjury must be proven by the testimony of two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances (section 1968, Code Civ. Proc.), and this case must be weighed and measured by that test, and, when so weighed and measured, it wholly fails to meet the requirements of that provision of the law. There are neither two witnesses to the act of perjury, nor one witness and corroborating circumstances. Possibly, the corroborating circumstances are sufficiently proven, but the one witness demanded by the terms of the statute is lacking. It is contemplated by the statute that there must be the testimony of one witness to facts that are absolutely incompatible with the innocence of the accused before a conviction is justified by the law, and there is no such evidence in this case. The principle here involved was considered and directly adjudicated upon in the recent case of People v. Wells (Cal.) 37 Pac. 529; and the views of the court there expressed are again approved and declared the true rule in prosecutions charging the offense of perjury. It becomes unnecessary to notice the remaining questions discussed. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

LAW OF FOREIGN COUNTRY — PRESUMPTIONS — SALE OF DECEDENT'S EFFECTS — VALIDITY — FOREIGN JUDICIAL RECORDS — PROOF — ATTESTED COPY.

1. As, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the law of a foreign country is presumed to be the same as the law of California, one who purchases notes from an executor appointed by an English court, and fails to show that under the English law the executors had power to sell the notes, must show that they were sold in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1517, which requires a sale of any property of a decedent to be authorized by an order of the superior court.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1906, providing that a judicial record of a foreign country may be proved by the attestation of the clerk, with the seal of the court, and certain other certificates, authorizes a copy of such record to be so proven.

3. To prove the probate of a will and administration granted in a foreign country, as to the procedure in which there is no evidence, a transcript of an order of the foreign court to the effect that on a certain day the will was proved and registered and administration granted is not sufficient, it being necessary to introduce the proceedings leading up to the order, and which gave the court jurisdiction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by George W. Wickersham against Richard Johnson on three promissory notes. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Wheeler and P. F. Hart, for appellant. Edward J. Ryan and J. N. Gillett, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The plaintiff brought three actions against the defendant, each upon a promissory note made by the defendant to one John Lancaster, since deceased, who was a British subject, and a resident of England, where he died testate on the 21st of April, 1884. The three actions were by the consent of parties and an order of the court consolidated. The court rendered judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the principal and interest of said three notes with costs, etc. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

The judgment of the lower court went upon the theory, founded upon the findings, that the two sons of the deceased, George Granville Lancaster and John Lancaster, Jr., were appointed by the will of the deceased as the executors thereof, and qualified as such, and were also appointed "administrators of the personal estate" of the deceased, John Lancaster; that the will of the deceased was duly probated in an English court; that by said will the said sons were also made residuary legatees; and that on November 15, 1880, the said sons, George and John, as such executors and administrators, and being the owners of said notes, "sold, transferred, and set over" the same to the plaintiff herein. The main evidence in the case introduced by plaintiff is found in a certain commission to take the testimony of said George and John Lancaster, issued to John C. New, consul general of the United States at London, by which it was undertaken to prove all the foregoing facts as to the death of John Lancaster, deceased, the existence of the will, its probate, issuance of letters testamentary and letters of administration to the sons, etc. Many objections were made by appellant to various parts of the evidence contained in said commission, but we will assume for the present that the evidence contained in this commission sufficiently shows the facts above referred to. There was no evidence at all tending to show what the law was in the foreign country touching any of the questions which are raised here, and it must therefore be assumed that the law with respect to those matters was the same there as in California. Norris v. Harris, 15 Cal. 254; Hickman v. Alpaugh, 21 Cal. 226; Hill v. Grigsby, 32 Cal. 60; Mars-ters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 624; Monroe v. Douglass, 5 N. Y. 447; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 445, 9 Sup. Ct. 469. This rule applies to England as well as to sister states of the American nation. In Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., supra, the supreme court of the United States say: "The law of Great Britain since the Declaration of Independence is the law of a foreign country, and, like any other foreign law, is matter of fact, which the courts of this country cannot be presumed to be acquainted with, or to have judicial knowledge of, unless it is pleaded and proved." The alleged transfer or assignment of the said notes from the said George and John Lancaster was not by indorsement on the back of said notes, but consisted of a separate written instrument, in which they recited that they had "bargained, sold, and transferred" the said notes to the plaintiff herein, and that they "do hereby sell, transfer, and set over" the same to the plaintiff; and it is said in said instrument that they sell, etc., said notes "as executors of John Lancaster, deceased, and as representing themselves and said estate;" and the document is signed: "John Lancaster. George Granville Lancaster." Now, waiving all other points, and assuming the law of England to be the same as that of California, the said John and George Lancaster had no authority to sell and transfer said notes to the plaintiff. They were assets of the estate of John Lancaster, deceased, and could be sold only under and by an order of the probate court. Section 1517 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "no sale of any property of an estate of a decedent is valid unless made under order of the superior court, except as otherwise provided in this chapter;" and the property involved here is not one of the exceptions. Section 1524 expressly provides that "choses in action may be sold in the same manner as other personal property." Belloc v. Rogers, 9 Cal. 128. The cases cited by respondent upon this point, such as Weider v. Osborn (Or.) 25 Pac. 717; Hough v. Bailey, 32 Conn. 288; and Marshall Co. v. Hanna, 57 Iowa, 375, 10 N. W. 745,—were cases arising under statutes which only provided that tangible personal property could not be sold, except by an order of the probate court. For this reason the judgment must be reversed.

The foregoing point is conclusive of this appeal, but, as the cause may be tried again, it is necessary to notice one or two other positions taken by appellant. The evidence introduced by respondent to prove the probate of the will of said John Lancaster, deceased, consisted of a copy of a judicial record of the probate division of her majesty's high court of justice, certified as correct by Charles John Middleton, registrar of said court, accompanied by the certificate of the judge of said court to the official position of Middleton as the custodian of its records and the genuineness of his signature, and also by a certificate of John C. New, United States consul general, to the genuineness of the signature of the said judge; all in accordance with the requirements of section 1906, Code Civ. Proc. But appellant contends that said section refers only to an original record, and not to a copy. The section is as follows: "A judicial record of a foreign court may be proved by the attestation of the clerk, with the seal of the court annexed, if there be a clerk and seal, or of the legal keeper of the record with the seal of his office annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge, or presiding magistrate, that the person making the attestation is the clerk of the court, or the legal keeper of the record, and, in either case, that the signature of such person is genuine, and that the attestation is in due form. The signature of the chief judge or presiding magistrate must be authenticated by the certificate of the minister, or ambassador, or a consul, vice-consul, or consular agent of the United States in such foreign country." While the word "copy" is not expressly used in the section, it is clearly included in the language which is used. It is included in the word "attestation," and is necessarily contemplated throughout the entire section. The notion of an original judicial record requiring the attestations and certificates mentioned in the section is incongruous and not to be entertained. A record proves itself. The certificate and signature of an American consul in a judgment book of an English court—in order to give it verity—would be a rare spectacle. It is not to be supposed that the legislature meant such a thing when express words to that effect were not used. In the absence of statutory provisions on this subject, an original record itself is rarely produced as evidence except when the cause is in the same court whose record it is. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 502. In other cases the proof is by exemplification. In section 1906 the word "attestation" is evidently used in its secondary or technical sense,—the certification by the keeper of a record of the verity of a copy. In Anderson's Law Dictionary a definition of "attest" is as follows: "To certify to the verity of a copy of a public document." In Abbott's Law Dictionary it is said: "Attest is also the technical word by which, in the practice of many of the states, a certifying officer gives assurance to the verity of a copy." See also Black's Law Dictionary under "Attest." Moreover, that part of section 1905 which provides for proof of a judicial record of a sister state, and section 905 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which provides for proof of judicial records of the states and territories, are both substantially the same as said section 1906, Code Civ. Proc. In neither is the word "copy" used. But under those provisions it has been held that a certified copy is sufficient. Low v. Burrows, 12 Cal. 181; Parke v. Williams, 7 Cal. 247; Ferguson v. Harwood, 7 Cranch, 514. Some weight is attached by appellant to the fact that the next succeeding section—section 1907, Code Civ. Proc.—provides that a copy of a foreign judicial record is also admissible in evidence upon compliance with the provisions of that section. But evidently the stress of that section is not upon the word "copy," so as to distinguish it from original. Section 1906 having provided for a copy under attestation of the keeper of the record, accompanied by certain certificates of certain other officers, section 1907 provides that a copy may also be admitted, without the certificates of said officers, if it be accompanied by the oral testimony of a witness that he had compared the copy with the original, and that it was an exact transcript thereof; and also by certain other evidence required by said section. We are satisfied that a foreign judicial record may be proved by a copy thereof, attested and certified as provided by said section 1906 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We think, however, that appellant is right in contending that the judicial record introduced by respondent in this case is entirely insufficient to support any right asserted under it by respondent. It includes merely a transcript of a short order of the foreign court, to the effect that on a certain day the will of Lancaster, deceased, was proved and registered, and that administration of the personal estate was granted to John and George Granville Lancaster, sons, and executors named in the will, who had been sworn to well and faithfully administer the same. It contains no previous proceedings upon which the order rested,—no petition, no pleadings, no judgment roll other than said order. This was not sufficient, in the absence of proof of a procedure in the foreign country different from that of our own. The pleadings, petitions, or proceedings which led up to the order and gave jurisdiction to make it should have been introduced so as to have made the record complete. 2 Freem. Judgm. § 603; Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646; Mason v. Wolff, 40 Cal. 249; Harper v. Rowe, 53 Cal. 234. There are no other points necessary to be now noticed. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 28, 1894.)

IMPANELING JURY — WAIVER OF IRREGULARITY — CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — PROVINCE OF JURY — HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In a criminal case the bailiff selected from the persons present, and placed in the jury box, 12 men, who were regularly returned, under the court's order, to serve as jurors. The clerk obtained from each man his name, wrote it on a sheet of paper, returned to his place, and called the names. The jurors were then sworn to answer as to their qualifications. Held, that such mode of impaneling the jury was reversible error, unless objection was waived.

2. Such mode of impaneling the jury is an irregularity that can be waived by defendant's failure to object.

3. The judge, in his charge, told the jury that he denied a motion to dismiss for want of proof, "because there is testimony enough before you to sustain a conviction, provided you believe it; and it is for you to say what you believe about it." Held not a charge as to the effect of the evidence.

4. In a criminal case, where defendant is a witness, it is not error to charge as to the circumstances under which he testified, and as to his admission that he had previously been convicted of a felony.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

John Johnson was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

D. J. Toohy and M. G. L. O'Brien, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and, his motion for a new trial having been denied, he appeals from the judgment and from the order.

Appellant's first point is that the jury was irregularly impaneled. It seems that, when the case was called for trial, counsel for the people and for the defense each announced themselves as ready for trial. The judge then said: "Call the jurors." The bailiff then proceeded to select from the persons present 12 men, who were regularly returned, under order of the court, to serve as jurors in that department. The bailiff proceeded to place the 12 men in the jury box, and the clerk went to the jury box, and, interrogating each man as to his name, wrote it down on a sheet of paper; then, returning to his place, called the names, and they were sworn to answer as to their qualifications. They were accepted and sworn as jurors. This mode of impaneling a jury differs materially from that prescribed in the statutes of the state, and, if it had been done against the objection of defendant, it would have constituted sufficient reason for reversal. But no objection was raised.

Appellant contends that the irregularity is one that could not be waived; that the defendant has not had a jury trial unless the jury be impaneled in the mode prescribed. But we cannot take that view. The jurors were taken from those who had been regularly drawn and summoned, but not in the prescribed order. It is plainly but an irregularity, and was waived by failing to object.

Appellant next objects to an instruction given in the following words: "A motion was made here to dismiss this case, because of want of proof. I denied that motion, because there is testimony enough before you to sustain a conviction, provided you believe it; and it is for you to say what you believe about it." It is said that this is an instruction to the effect that, if the jury believe the evidence, they must convict, which is a charge as to the effect of the evidence. It is evident such is not the meaning of the instruction. The judge was cautioning the jury against concluding from this ruling that he had determined that the defendant was guilty. He says, in effect: "There being testimony which would sustain a conviction, if you convict, it was my duty to overrule the motion; but I did not decide that the testimony is true; that is for you."

Defendant was a witness on his own behalf, and the court gave some instructions as to the circumstances under which he testified; also in regard to defendant's admission that he had been previously convicted of a felony. A similar instruction was criticised by this court in People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802. In that case, although the court intimated some regret that instructions of that character had ever been sanctioned, it was not deemed reversible error.

I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO BREWERIES, Limited,
v. SCHURTZ et al. (No. 19,314.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 29, 1894.)

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—VALIDITY—FIXTURES —RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

1. A mortgage covering both real and personal property may be foreclosed, and all the property sold, under one decree.

2. The fact that a chattel mortgage covers some property not the subject of mortgage under Civ. Code, § 2955, prescribing what personal property may be mortgaged, does not render it void as to other property covered by it.

3. The averment in a complaint to foreclose a mortgage that defendant "had, or claimed to have, some interest in the mortgaged property, which was subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage," sufficiently alleges defendant's interest.

4. A mortgage by the lessee of the leasehold covers fixtures attached at the time of the execution of the mortgage.

5. The action of the court in refusing to allow a party to introduce evidence nearly three weeks after a decree of foreclosure had been ordered will not be disturbed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by San Francisco Breweries, Limited, against Joseph Schurtz, Henry P. Wilson, and others. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant Wilson appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. Diehl & Chambers, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The defendant Joseph Schurtz had a lease for the term of four years and two months, dated October 5, 1889, of the basement of a building known as the "Wilson Block," in the city of Los Angeles. He used the leased premises for the purpose of a saloon and restaurant, and had caused to be attached to them certain personal property used in conducting his business. On June 25, 1891, he executed to the plaintiff his promissory notes for sums aggregating $4,500, and a mortgage to secure payment of the notes on his said leasehold estate, and on all fixtures, improvements, and appliances which had been attached to or made a part thereof, and also on all personal property, including a piano, used in and about said saloon and restaurant. The mortgage was properly executed as a mortgage of real and personal property, and on the day of its date was by the mortgagee caused to be recorded in the recorder's office of Los Angeles county. In August, 1892, the plaintiff commenced this action to foreclose its mortgage, making Henry P. Wilson, the appellant, and others parties defendant, upon the ground that they had, or claimed to have, some interest in the mortgaged property, which interests or claims, it was alleged, were subsequent and subject to the lien of said mortgage. All of the defendants, except Wilson, suffered their defaults to be entered. He demurred to the complaint, and, his demurrer being overruled, ed, answered. The answer denied some of the averments of the complaint, and alleged that the only property subject to mortgage was the leasehold interest and the piano, and also alleged that on May 26, 1892, one Catherine Wilson recovered a judgment against Joseph Schurtz, the mortgagor, for $2,300, on which an execution was duly issued and levied upon most of the property involved in this action, other than the said leasehold interest and piano; that, under the execution, the property levied upon was sold on June 15, 1892, and bid in by said defendant, and is now owned by him and in his possession; and the prayer was that it be adjudged that defendant is the owner of the property so bid in by him, and that no part thereof is subject to plaintiff's mortgage. The court found that the mortgage was a valid lien on all the property described therein, "except such part of the personal property thereof as was purchased by said Henry P. Wilson, at sheriff's sale on June 15, 1892, said personal property * * * being as follows, to wit: The silverware, safe, and stock of wines, liquors, and cigars." A decree was accordingly entered foreclosing the mortgage upon, and directing a sale of, all the property found to be subject to the lien thereof; and from this decree the defendant Wilson appeals.

1. In support of the appeal, it is claimed that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, but we think it was properly overruled. The mortgage covered real and personal property. Such a mortgage is valid, and may be foreclosed, and the real and personal property may be sold under the same decree (Tregear v. Water Co., 76 Cal. 537, 18 Pac. 658); and the fact that some of the personal property was not mortgageable, under section 2,955 of the Civil Code, did not render the mortgage void as to the other property covered by it (In re Fischer, 94 Cal. 523, 29 Pac. 961). The case of Dufficy v. Shields, 63 Cal. 332, is cited for appellant as declaring a different rule from that last above stated, and as holding that a mortgage like the one supposed is wholly void. But that case was also cited in Re Fischer, and, to the extent that it does declare a different rule, it was in effect overruled by the last-named case, and is no longer authority. The averment that the defendant had, or claimed to have, some interest in the mortgaged property, which was subsequent and subject to the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, was sufficient; and it cast the burden upon him to set up and show what interest he had. The complaint, in our opinion, stated all the facts required to constitute a cause of action, and was not ambiguous or uncertain.

2. It is further claimed that all the property purchased by appellant at the sheriff's sale was the personal property of the judgment debtor, Schurtz, and was subject to seizure and sale under execution against him; and it is said, quoting from Freem, Ex'ns, § 114: "To determine whether a chattel affixed by the lessee can be seized on execution, we have only to ascertain whether the lessee can lawfully remove it; for whatever rights and interests the lessee has are subject to execution against him." The rule thus declared is undoubtedly correct when no intervening rights have accrued. But the fixtures attached by a lessee to leased property become a part of the realty, and remain so until they are severed. While so attached, a mortgage of the leasehold estate covers the fixtures, and on foreclosure they are sold as a part of the realty. McNally v. Connolly, 70 Cal. 3, 11 Pac. 320; Ewell, Fixt. p. 275; Jones, Mortg. §§ 426, 435. The case of Machine Co. v. Gould, 73 Cal. 153, 14 Pac. 609, is substantially on all fours with this case, and must be followed so far as the question in hand is concerned. In that case the lessees of land erected machinery thereon, and mortgaged the leasehold and machinery to the plaintiff therein. Subsequently, the machinery was levied upon and sold as personal property, under an execution against the mortgagor. The mortgagee brought suit to foreclose his mortgage, making the administrator of the estate of the purchaser at the execution sale a party defendant. The administrator answered, setting up the execution sale, and claiming to be the owner of the machinery by virtue thereof. A demurrer to the answer was sustained, and on appeal the ruling was held to be correct. The court said: "The defendant occupied no position superior to that of the mortgagor, Gould; and whatever interest he acquired by his purchase was subject and subordinate to the mortgage of plaintiff."

3. The point is made that, as a chattel mortgage, the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was void, because the affidavit required by section 2957 of the Civil Code, which was attached thereto, was made by one E. H. Meyer, for and on behalf of the corporation mortgagee, and it does not appear that he was the agent of the mortgagee. A sufficient answer to this point is that the affidavit expressly states that Meyer was the duly-authorized agent of the mortgagee, and was authorized to do all acts for it in reference to the mortgage; and there is a direct averment in the complaint, which is not denied by the answer, that, at the time of the execution of the mortgage, Meyer was duly authorized to act in regard thereto as plaintiff's agent.

4. It appears from a bill of exceptions that nearly three weeks after the case was tried and submitted, and findings and decree of foreclosure were ordered, the appellant asked leave to introduce testimony showing that Schurtz's lease had been broken and canceled; that the lessor had canceled the lease by bringing suit against him for rent due; and that from and after March 10, 1891, he had held the leased premises from month to month as a monthly tenant. The court refused to hear the offered testimony, and its ruling is assigned as error. The ruling was proper, and must be sustained, for two reasons: (1) The application was addressed to the discretion of the court (Miller v. Sharp, 49 Cal. 233; Briswalter v. Palomares, 66 Cal. 259, 5 Pac. 226; Consolidated Nat. Bank v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 95 Cal. 1, 30 Pac. 96); and there is nothing tending to show an abuse of that discretion. So far as appears, the evidence might as well have been offered during the trial. (2) No issue was raised by the pleadings to which the offered evidence was relevant.

It follows that the decree appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

In re KENNEDY'S ESTATE. (No. 15,415.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1894.)

IMPEACHMENT OF ONE'S OWN WITNESS.

A person whose witness testifies contrary to the way he has been led to believe he would do cannot prove that the witness had made prior statements to the contrary.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sander-son, Judge.

Appeal by J. T. McCormick, in the matter of the estate of Catherine Kennedy, deceased, from an order denying him a new trial. Reversed.

For opinion in division, see 36 Pac. 1030.

Eugene Deuprey, for appellant. M. J. Platshek, M. S. Elsner, and F. S. Stratton, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Catherine Kennedy died testate, at the city and county of San Francisco, April 13, 1887, leaving estate of the value of about $12,000. She was thrice married, and left surviving her one son by her second marriage, named John E. Tomlinson. By her last will she devised all of her estate to the said son, John E. Tomlinson, except three small legacies, of $100 each, bequeathed to Sarah McCloskey, John E. McCormick, and Rosa Malone, respectively, and naming James McCloskey as executor. The will was admitted to probate, McCloskey appointed executor thereof, and such proceedings were had in relation thereto that on the 11th day of December, 1889, a petition was filed by the executor, praying a distribution of the estate as in the will provided. On the 23d day of December, 1889, Mary Rogers made and filed her petition and opposition in the cause, in which, among other things, she set out that she was the daughter of Catherine Kennedy, deceased; that, by an omission not appearing to be intentional, deceased wholly failed to provide for petitioner in her last will; that she is entitled to a like share or interest in the estate as though deceased had died intestate, and prayed that one-half of said estate be distributed to her. Thereafter, on the 23d day of December, 1891, the matter of the petition of Mary Rogers to participate in the distribution of the estate of said Catherine Kennedy, deceased, came on to be heard. A trial by jury was waived by the parties. The contest was between said Mary Rogers and J. T. McCormick, the executor of the last will of J. E. Tomlinson, deceased, who had before that time departed this life. The question in litigation was as to the maternity of the said Mary Rogers. The decision was in favor of the respondent, said Mary Rogers, who was found to be the illegitimate daughter of Catherine Kennedy, the testator, and one-half of the estate was distributed to her. The appeal is from the decision, and from an order denying a new trial to said McCormick, executor of the last will of said Tomlinson, deceased.

At the trial, one McCloskey was called by respondent as a witness on her behalf, and by her attorney questioned as to statements previously made by him in the presence of respondent and her attorneys, as to Mrs. Kennedy having told him that she was going to send to Buffalo, N. Y., for a niece of hers, and that he gave five dollars to her to be used for that purpose; that he had seen Mrs. Rogers, the respondent, at Mrs. Kennedy's house, on Natoma street, in April or May, 1886; that the respondent was introduced to him by Mrs. Kennedy as her niece; that, after Mrs. Rogers moved from Mrs. Kennedy's house, Mrs. Kennedy told him that respondent did not like her place, and had gone away, and that she was displeased with her niece for having become a Protestant. These questions were answered evasively, or by a direct denial, and thereafter Attorney Eisner took the stand as a witness for respondent, and was permitted, against the appellant's objection, to contradict the evidence of his own witness, McCloskey, by testifying that at the time and place suggested in the questions, and in the presence of the persons named, the said McCloskey "stated in my presence that the deceased, Mrs. Kennedy, had often told him, just prior to the advent of the so-called niece, that she was going to send to Buffalo, N. Y., for a niece of hers, and had asked Mr. McCloskey for five dollars to send on to her niece, and he said that he was quite sure—that is the language taken down then—that he was quite sure that he saw Mrs. Rogers at Mrs. Kennedy's house, on Natoma street, in this city, about April or May, 1886, and he said that, after the niece left Mrs. Kennedy's home, Mrs. Kennedy had said to him (McCloskey) that she (the niece) did not like the place, and had gone away, and that Mrs. Kennedy expressed dissatisfaction or displeasure at her (the niece) having become a Protestant." The previous alleged statements of the witness McCloskey, if sworn to at the trial, would have corroborated the testimony of the respondent on the main issue, and would have tended to make out her case. The question then is, did the court err in permitting the witness Eisner, against appellant's objection, to contradict his own witness as to these previous statements, notwithstanding the fact that the witness McCloskey had not testified as he had led respondent to believe that he would? If so, was the appellant injured thereby? The rule is well settled in this state, on the authority of People v. Jacobs, 49 Cal. 385, and People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 158, 26 Pac. 650, that such testimony is not admissible, for the reason that to admit it "would enable the party to get the naked declarations of the witness before the jury as independent evidence." It is therefore clear that the court erred in permitting the witness Eisner to contradict the testimony of his own witness by testifying to the previous statements made by him under the circumstances stated, and, as we cannot say that the appellant was not injured thereby, it follows that the judgment and order should be reversed. So ordered.

This action is brought to test the right of the holder of a railroad passenger ticket to stop at an intermediate station, and subsequently renew his journey on another train without further payment. Defendant is a common carrier of passengers, by ferry and railroad, between San Francisco and Oakland and Alameda. It has several lines between these points, and has provided and sells but one form of ticket from San Francisco to Oakland and Alameda. It is as follows:

S. P. Co.—Ferry and Local Trains.

ONE PASSAGE ONLY CC 11	SAN FRANCISCO 15cts.
	OAKLAND or ALAMEDA
	J. H. Goodman. ^s
	Gen. Pass. and Ticket Agent.

The ticket entitles the holder to take either of three different lines, all operated by defendant, two of which pass through Oakland.

In May, 1891, plaintiff purchased such a ticket at the office of defendant at the foot of Market street, San Francisco, and proceeded with it to the ferry which carries the passengers to the Oakland pier in the city of Oakland, where defendant's railroad begins. He was required to pass through a gate on his way to the ferry. Here an employé of the defendant demanded his ticket. Plaintiff informed the gate keeper that he desired to stop over at Oakland, and insisted upon retaining his ticket or receiving a check, which would be evidence of his right. He was informed that stop-over tickets were not provided, and that no stop-over rights were allowed; and he was refused permission to go upon the ferry, except upon surrender of his ticket, which he then gave up. He proceeded by ferry and road to the intersection of Broadway and First streets, in the city of Oakland, where he alighted, and remained attending to some private business for a short time. At this point all passenger trains passing over the road habitually stop, and from 1,000 to 1,500 passengers get on and off daily. There is no station house or station agent there, but passengers are received, and pay their fare to the conductor. Subsequently, he took the train for Alameda at the point where he alighted, and, his fare being demanded by the conductor, he refused to pay it, basing his refusal upon the facts stated. But, notwithstanding his statement of these matters to the conductor, he was ejected from the train.

The only question involved in this litigation is, was the respondent entitled to a stop-over privilege at the city of Oakland? He claims this stop-over right under section 490 of the Civil Code, and that section reads as follows: "Sec. 490. Every railroad corporation must provide, and, on being tendered the fare therefor fixed as provided in the preceding section, furnish to every person desiring a passage on their passenger cars a ticket which entitles the purchaser to a ride, and to the accommodations provided on their cars, from the depot or station where the same is purchased to any other depot or station on the line of their road. Every such ticket entitles the holder thereof to ride on their passenger cars to the station or depot of destination, or any intermediate station, and from any intermediate station to the depot of destination designated in the ticket, at any time within six months thereafter. Any corporation failing so to provide and furnish tickets, or refusing the passage which the same calls for when sold, must pay to the person so refused the sum of two hundred dollars." The briefs of counsel contain an elaborate discussion of various legal principles that are claimed to be germane to the question here presented, and those principles which we deem necessarily involved in the final determination of this litigation we will take up and discuss seriatim.

1. Appellant insists that the true construction of section 490 is: "Such ticket entitles the holder, at any time within six months after the issuance of the ticket, to ride from the depot where he purchased the ticket to the depot of destination named in the ticket, or to any intermediate station, or, if he so elects, he may start from any intermediate station, instead of where he bought the ticket, and ride to the depot of destination designated in the ticket." Notwithstanding the statute appears to be plain and explicit upon its face, it is insisted that the conjunctions "and" and "or" are convertible terms, and that the conjunction "and," as it appears in the section should be read "or." There are times when it is entirely manifest from the context that the intention of the lawmaking power can only be given effect by holding these terms convertible. And this rule of construction is adopted for the very purpose of giving that force and effect to the text which plainly appears from the context was intended to be given it by the author of its creation, but this license of construction is only to be exercised upon the lines indicated, and in all other cases these two words are to be read and construed as they stand upon the page. Ordinarily, they are in no sense interchangeable terms, but, upon the contrary, are used in the structure of language for purposes entirely variant. "There is a world of difference between the little words 'and' and 'or.'" State v. Beaulcleigh, 92 Mo. 497, 4 S. W. 666. We see nothing here demanding the construction claimed. It is not plainly manifest that the legislature so intended. It is not manifest at all. The clause is full of meaning, reading it as it appears to the eye, and is entirely consistent with other portions of the section. If we should interpret "and" as "or" an entirely different meaning would be given the provision. This would be judicial legislation, pure and simple. Appellant contends for the construction claimed because it is said that formerly so-called "competitive points" were favored, and the object of the statute was the prevention of greater charges from intermediate stations to competitive points than were charged for longer distances from one competitive point to another. In view of the fact that the legislature provided in the immediately preceding section (489) that the amount of passenger fares should be regulated according to the distance traveled, there would seem to be no necessity for further legislation upon that question. That evil, whatever it may have been, was called to the attention of the legislature, and cured by said section. The only effect upon the statute, by appellant's construction, is to give a passenger the right to board a train at an intermediate station, and ride to the point of destination upon a ticket purchased at some station which, from the place of destination, is beyond the intermediate point. We see no demand for legislation of the character outlined by appellant's construction of the statute. The circumstance of a passenger purchasing a ticket from one point to another, and then only actually using it for a portion of the distance, would not seem to be an event of such common occurrence as to demand the needs of legislative action. Again, while not desirous of prejudging matters not necessarily involved in the consideration of the present case, we might remark that no legal rule now presents itself to our minds which ever denied a passenger the right to use a ticket of the character here contemplated from an intermediate station to the point of destination. Auerbach v. Railroad Co., 89 N. Y. 281. And, if such was the law prior to the passage of section 490, we are justified in saying that the legislature, in enacting that provision, was not doing an idle thing, and we must assume the provision was created for other purposes. Appellant's position as to the construction of section 490 of the Civil Code is not tenable.

2. It is insisted that section 490 of the Civil Code, upon which plaintiff relies for his stop-over right, was repealed by section 22 of article 12 of the state constitution, and this claim of repeal is based upon the additional claim that the constitutional provision cited places the full and exclusive power of fixing railroad transportation charges within this state in the railroad commissioners. It is insisted that the repeal of section 490 is occasioned by the repeal of section 489; that this constitutional provision repealed section 489,—a section which pertains to the regulating and establishment of rates for freights and fares,—and that section 490 is so dependent upon section 489 that it cannot stand alone, and the fall of section 489 therefore necessarily carries with it the destruction of section 490. We will not discuss the interesting question as to whether or not the repeal of section 489 was occasioned by the adoption of that portion of the constitution referring to the election, powers, and duties of railroad commissioners, but, for the purposes of the case alone, will concede that such repeal was had. The single question then remains, did the repeal of section 489 result in the repeal of section 490? Chief Justice Shaw, in discussing a similar principle, said in the case of Warren v. The Mayor, etc., 2 Gray, 84: "When the parts of a statute are so mutually connected and dependent, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that if all could not be carried into effect the legislature would not pass the residue independently, if some parts are unconstitutional and void, all the provisions, which are thus dependent, conditional, or connected, must fall with them." The rule is well stated in the foregoing quotation, and the principle there declared has been recognized and declared the true one by the courts of many states. Measured by this doctrine, can section 490 stand the test? Is it manifest that the legislature intended that such section should stand or fall with section 489? Is section 490 so closely connected with and so entirely dependent upon the preceding section that its very life ends at the moment when that section is no more? Would section 490 have been enacted by the legislature if section 489 had never been placed upon the statute book? These interrogatories are answered by appellant,—and to the legal soundness of those answers our attention shall now be addressed.

Section 489 provides that railroad corporations must fix and publish their rates of charges for freightage and fares from one depot to another on their various lines of road in this state, and declares a graduated scale of charges according to distance. It further provides that the maximum charges shall not exceed 10 cents per mile for each passenger, nor 15 cents per mile for each ton of freight transported upon its road, and also affixes a penalty for the violation of any of these provisions. Section 490 declares that the railroad company must provide, and, on being tendered the fare therefor fixed as provided in the preceding section, furnish to every passenger desiring passage on their passenger car, a ticket which entitles the purchaser to certain rights and privileges which we have already considered; and this section also affixes a penalty for the violation of any of its provisions. In all portions thereof, save a single one, the section is entirely disconnected from and independent of section 489. With this single exception, it appears to be full of its own vitality, and possessed of ample strength within itself to stand out alone; a law, as independent and complete as any other section within the lids of the Code. But, it is said in the language of defendant, to hold that section 490 is not dependent upon section 489, is to ignore the words of the section itself, namely, "on being tendered the fare therefor fixed as provided in the preceding section." This clause forms the connecting link between the sections, and upon the sole strength of that link depends the repeal or nonrepeal of section 490. It is claimed that it was the legislative intent that a passenger, in order to enjoy the rights and privileges granted by section 490, should tender the amount of fare fixed by the corporation, in accordance with section 489, and, that section being repealed, that it is impossible to make a tender of the fare therein provided; that a tender of the fare fixed by a later act of the legislature, or the tender of a fare fixed by the corporation itself in the absence of any law upon the subject, would be unavailing, and that consequently no rights and privileges can flow to the passenger under section 490. It is insisted, in other words, that the fare tendered must be the fare fixed according to section 489, notwithstanding that section may have been repealed, and in substance replaced by other legislation. We think appellant's interpretation of the section, as evidenced by the foregoing line of reasoning, too rigid and literal to satisfy well-settled rules of statutory construction. The subject-matter of these two sections has nothing in common. The sections relate to distinct and independent matters of legislation. Section 489 is in no way dependent upon section 490. There is no mutuality in their connections and dependencies. Section 490 could have been repealed, and the vitality of section 489 would not have been affected in the slightest degree. In accord with appellant's contention, we have conceded that section 489 is repealed by implication by certain provisions of the constitution. In order to declare a repeal by implication, it must be entirely apparent, by a comparison of the two provisions, that the subject-matter of section 489 is completely covered by the constitutional provision, and the repeal can be supported upon no other ground. In other words, the constitutional provision is a substitute for the section. It seems to follow that the question here presents itself in no different form, and involves no different principle, than though section 489 had been amended upon the lines embraced within the repealing clause of the constitution. If section 489 were still a live section, covering the general subject-matter embraced within it at the beginning, no matter how changed and modified, no matter how drastic the treatment by amendment, surely defendant would still be bound by its provisions. Hence, appellant's contention reduces itself to the single claim that the present law upon the question is not embraced in the "preceding section," and that the particular point of location of the law upon the statute book is the all-controlling element. Such a construction would result in the sacrifice of substance to the merest form. The gist of section 489 is the requirement that railroad corporations fix their rates, and fix them in accordance with certain rules there declared, and within certain limits, and, to a certain extent, regulate fares and freights; and a reference to this section in section 490 is simply a recognition of that fact, and nothing more. The words, "as provided in the preceding section," might almost be termed surplusage. Their only possible purpose is to make more certain that which was already certain. Strike them from the section, and nothing of weight or substance is taken away. The construction would be the same with or without them. There surely is not that magic in them which holds the power of life and death over the entire section. The fare to be tendered, in order to give the passenger a right to his ticket, is the lawful fare; and it is immaterial whether that fare be fixed by the "preceding section," or by other provisions of the Code, or by the corporation, in the absence of law, or by the constitution itself. It is the fare regulated by law, and, if there be no law regulating the fare, then it is the regular fare charged by the corporation. At the date of the enactment of section 490, it happened that fares were regulated by the preceding section 489, and hence the reference. There is nothing to indicate that the enactment of these two sections partook of the character of a contract between corporations upon the one side, and the people, through its legislative body, on the other, whereby corporations were granted valuable privileges and benefits under section 489 in consideration of reciprocal valuable privileges and benefits extended to the traveling public under section 490. It is further apparent that such conditions did not surround the creation of these sections, for we find the substance of section 489 to have been the law of this state for many years prior to the adoption of the Codes. St. 1861, p. 625. We conclude that it was not the intention of the legislature that these two sections should be taken as a whole, that section 490 should stand only while section 489 stood, and that the fall of section 489 should likewise mark the fall of section 490. We see no reason why the legislature should do such a thing, and such an intention is not manifest from the context. The repeal of section 489 does not result in the repeal of section 490.

3. The Central Pacific Company leased to the Southern Pacific Company certain railroads for the period of 99 years, and also assigned to the Southern Pacific Company certain leases it held of other roads. These leases included all the rolling stock, telegraph lines, steamboats, wharves, piers, and all other property, both real and personal, used in connection with these roads, together with the appurtenances thereto belonging, with the right to possess, use, maintain, and operate and enjoy said property. The leases held by the Central Pacific Company were assigned "with the right to take, hold, operate, maintain, and enjoy said railroads and other property in the same manner as the Central Pacific Company holds, operates, enjoys, and maintains the same under said leases." It is now claimed that section 490 of the Civil Code, upon which plaintiff relies to give him the privilege of "stop-over," does not apply to the defendant, the Southern Pacific Company, because it does not apply to its lessor, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and section 288 of the Civil Code is relied upon to show its nonapplicability to the Central Pacific Railroad Company. That section provides: "No corporation formed or existing before twelve o'clock, noon, of the day upon which this Code takes effect, is affected by the provisions of part IV, of division first of this Code, unless such corporation elects to continue its existence under it as provided in section 287; but the laws under which such corporations were formed and exist are applicable to all such corporations, and are repealed subject to the provisions of this section." The Central Pacific Railroad Company has not elected to continue its existence under the law found in part 4 of division 1 of the Civil Code; and, section 490 being found therein, it would appear that that corporation was not bound by its provisions, for this language is comprehensive, and, judged by its face alone, has no uncertain meaning. But it is claimed by appellant that section 490 is highly penal in its character: If this be true, the power of the legislature to create penal statutes, and thereupon enact that they should be only applicable to corporations created subsequent to a certain time, may well be doubted. Such an exception would appear to be beyond the limits of legitimate legislation. This court said in the case of City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604: "A law is constitutional and general when it applies equally to all persons embraced in a class founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction. It is not general or constitutional if it confers particular privileges, or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right, upon a class of persons arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law." But we will not enter into a detailed examination of section 288, with the object of determining its true force and effect as to either of these positions. For the purposes of this case, we will concede that by reason of that section the provisions of section 490 do not apply to the Central Pacific Company. That much being conceded, is its lessee, the Southern Pacific Company, by virtue of its leases, assignments, etc., likewise unaffected by the provisions of that section? The Southern Pacific Company is a foreign corporation, and was organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky in March, 1884,—more than 10 years after the enactment of sections 288 and 490 of the Civil Code; and, aside from any rights, privileges, or exemptions passing to it by virtue of these leases and assignments, it only exists in this state, and is enabled to do business in this state, by virtue alone of those provisions of the Code which, we have conceded, have no binding force and effect upon the Central Pacific Company. We are unable to appreciate the importance and gravity with which appellant surrounds its contention in this regard. A corporation, organized and carrying on its business under a certain set of laws, leases and assigns all or portions of its property to another corporation, organized and carrying on its business under another and different set of laws. Do such leases, assignments, and transfers give the second corporation the right to thereafter conduct its business under the laws which were only applicable to the first corporation? Such contention can have no support in the law. Prior to its transactions with the Central Pacific Company, the Southern Pacific Company, in the conduct of its business, was bound by the provisions of section 490 of the Civil Code, and no man or corporation, by contract or otherwise, possessed the power to relieve it in the conduct of its business from whatever restrictions or burdens were imposed by that section. These restrictions and burdens were imposed upon it by legislative power, and it is to that power alone it must look to be relieved of them. When organized and ready to do business in this state, part 4, division 1, of the Civil Code, formed the law regulating its conduct and defining its rights and duties; and now, by the sole virtue of a business transaction with another corporation, it is claimed that this entire body of law has become nugatory, and, in effect, repealed, as to such corporation. This law cannot be evaded in that way. It is not the legal method recognized for effacing a law from the statute books. The Southern Pacific Company was organized to conduct a general railroad business. If it had built its own roads, it would have been bound by the provisions of section 490, and its status as to the law is not changed by reason of the fact that it preferred to lease rather than build. Let us assume that it has constructed and is the owner of certain roads in connection with those it has obtained from the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The result follows that one distinct and separate body of law governs its conduct as to certain portions of its business, and other portions thereof are controlled by another separate and independent body of law. It needs but a glance at the various provisions of the Code to see that such conditions would lead to inextricable confusion. If appellant's position be sound, its converse is equally sound, and a transfer by the Southern Pacific Company of its roads (if it has constructed any) to the Central Pacific Company would bring that corporation within the binding effect of section 490, as well as all other provisions of part 4 of the Code, nolens volens. This practice would not only effect results never contemplated by the legislature, but would effect them in a way absolutely forbidden by sections 287, 288, for those sections mark the only road that leads to such results. It is not necessary that we enter into a microscopic inspection of the writings evidencing the contracts between these corporations, for the purpose of determining all the properties and rights that actually passed thereby. It is sufficient to say that some things are not the subject of lease. This lessor could not lease the law. The law could not pass under those instruments, however apt words were used to indicate such a purpose. The legislature extended to each of these corporations the right to conduct its business in a certain way. That right, in each instance, was embodied in a separate and distinct set of laws. It was a purely personal right. It was in no sense an asset of the corporation which could be bought and sold. It was nothing that could be transferred. If the Central Pacific Company could transfer it to the defendant, it could likewise transfer it to a private individual, and this would be an absurdity. This right which is claimed to have passed to the lessee is a very intangible thing. It certainly is not the privilege which the lessor possessed of bringing itself within the provisions of the Code, for the lessee was already within those provisions. Prior to the lease the lessee was subject to the burdens of section 490. How any transfer of interest from the lessor could operate to relieve the lessee of burdens already resting upon it is not perceptible. Appellant terms this act an exemption. The only exemption the Central Pacific Company enjoyed was its exemption from the operation of general laws pertaining to corporations coming under the provisions of the Civil Code. It had the right to exist and do business under certain laws, but this right was not transferred to the defendant. It could not be transferred. The Central Pacific still exists, and has the right to do business. It can build new roads (perchance, it did not dispose of all its old ones), and operate them as it has ever done in the past. If this right has been transferred, the corporation no longer exists, for it constitutes its life. Neither is it possible that this right could be transferred pro tanto, nor that it may vest in both corporations at the same time. If section 490 does not apply to defendant, no part of the Code pertaining to corporations applies. We then have a corporation organized since the adoption of the Codes conducting its business under laws created prior to that adoption, and such a condition of things is directly opposed to the provisions of section 288. It would be the achievement of astonishing results by the practice of a legerdemain that has no place in the law, and the recognition of a doctrine striking at the very root and source of legislative power. Appellant, in this respect, relies firmly upon the case of Gilmore v. City of Utica, 121 N. Y. 561, 24 N. E. 1009. That was a street assessment case, and the judgment rendered in no way was dependent upon that portion of the decision here relied upon by appellant. The decision was not placed upon that ground, and the matter appears to have been but incidentally touched upon. The facts are briefly these: A street railroad corporation was organized and did business under a general law which provided that "every such corporation incorporated under, or constructing, extending or operating a railroad constructed or extended under the provisions of this act," shall pave between its tracks, and two feet on each side thereof. A second corporation, organized under a law containing no similar provision, leased its roads to the other corporation, and the court said: "But the Utica Belt Line Street-Railway Company (lessee) was not operating its road under that act. By a lease authorized by chapter 305 of the Laws of 1885, it had succeeded to all the rights of the Utica Street-Railroad Company, and was operating the road in the right of that company, and hence that section has no pertinency." We have not the laws of New York of 1885 before us, and consequently do not know exactly what may be the subject of lease under those statutes. If the language quoted goes to the length of holding that a lessee of a railroad corporation takes with the property leased the right to control and use it subject alone to the law operating upon the lessor corporation, we do not indorse it as sound. It would seem in this case that, as the road involved was not one constructed under the provisions of the act under which the lessee was incorporated, by the very terms of the act itself the lessee was not required to do the paving, and possibly the court viewed the question from that standpoint.

4. It is contended that section 490 has no application to this case, because the railroad begins at Oakland pier, within the corporate limits of the city of Oakland. Therefore, the point referred to in the complaint, instead of being an intermediate station, is the initial point; Oakland being the station at which the railroad begins, and there being no railroad between San Francisco and Oakland pier, but a ferry only. It seems very clear that, as to a trip from San Francisco to Alameda via Oakland, Oakland is an intermediate station; and the fact that the defendant has two or more stopping places in Oakland, where, for the accommodation of the public, passengers are allowed to enter and leave its local trains, can make no difference. At whichever of these stopping places a passenger chooses to get off, he stops at Oakland; and under the law, as we construe it, he has the right, if he has made a reasonable demand for the privilege, to afterwards resume his journey to Alameda.

5. It is next contended that the line traveled by plaintiff was not the most direct route, and that passengers are allowed to take the more circuitous route on condition that they make a continuous passage. It is sufficient for present purposes to say that the ticket purchased by plaintiff in this case was an unlimited ticket, and subject to no such conditions. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; HARRISON, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; BEATTY, C. J.

VAN FLEET, J. I concur in the judgment. I think that section 489 of the Civil Code is, by clear and necessary implication, repealed by section 22 of article 12 of the constitution. But I am not strongly impressed with the position of appellant that section 490 is so dependent upon section 489, to which it refers, as that the repeal of the latter necessarily involved and carried with it the repeal of the former. I do not think there is any such dependence manifest from either the subject matter or the provisions of those two sections. To my mind, the reference in section 490 to the preceding section is merely in its nature incidental, and not such a bond of union as to make the life of the one measure that of the other. The vital question in the case, in my judgment, and the one giving rise to the greatest difficulty, is whether section 490 was ever intended or designed by the legislature to give to the passenger a stop-over privilege, or the right to a stop-over ticket. Upon this question, after a somewhat extended examination of the case and the arguments presented, I am not prepared to say that the conclusion reached in this opinion of the court is not the correct one.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and, if other duties permit, will hereafter express my views of the case in an opinion. At present I will merely give my conclusions on two points:

1. I think that the ticket purchased by respondent, on its face, and especially when considered in connection with the reasonable regulations of appellant of its business on the various routes from San Francisco to Oakland, Alameda, and other points near the bay, which regulations were well known to respondent, merely gave to the latter the right to go either to Oakland or Alameda, not to both, and when he elected to get off at Oakland the life of the ticket was ended.

2. A "stop-over" ticket is a thing well known, not only in railroad circles, but to the general public,—so well known as to have gone into the common dictionaries of the language. It is a ticket which gives one a right "to stop at a station beyond the time of the departure of the train on which one came, with the purpose of continuing one's journey on a subsequent train." Webst. Dict., under head "Stop." Now, section 490 does not use the phrase "stop-over," nor does it, in my judgment, use any equivalent words to denote an intention to give to the holder of an ordinary ticket the right to break up his trip into 2 or 20 different journeys on different days, and on 2 or 20 different trains. I think that the authorities are to the point that a ticket which merely designates in general terms a trip from one point to another means a continuous trip between those points, and such is surely the law where there are by-laws or regulations of the railroad company to that effect, especially where they are known to the purchaser of the ticket. See Com. v. Power, 41 Am. Dec. 478 et seq.; 1 Redf. R. R. p. 92 et seq., and cases there cited; Xorton v. Railway Co., 54 Wis. 234, 11 N. W. 482; Cody v. Railroad Co., 4 Sawy. 114, Fed. Cas. No. 2,940; Gale v. Railroad Co., 7 Hun, 670. This being the general law, there is no language in section 490 sufficient to show an intent to change it so as to make all tickets stop-over tickets. There is no necessity of substituting "or" for "and" where it occurs in the section. The language of the section merely provides for a ticket upon which the holder can ride from the "station where the same is purchased" to the point of destination, and also from any intermediate station to the point of destination, but not that he may stop over at any intermediate station, or at all intermediate stations, and proceed afterwards, piecemeal, on other trains, as he may choose. Whether or not the intention was to remedy a certain subsisting evil, as contended for by appellant, there is clearly no intention expressed of providing for stop-over tickets.

There are other points in the case, as to some of which I agree with respondent, and as to others with appellant. I think that the judgment should be reversed.

PER CURIAM. In this case, objection was made by respondent, at the oral argument, to the qualification of Mr. Justice VAN FLEET to sit in the case, upon the ground that he is related to one of the parties by affinity within the third degree, as provided by section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The fact upon which the objection is based is that the said justice became by marriage, and is thus by affinity, a first-cousin, or cousin-german, of one of the stockholders of the corporation appellant. But such relation is not within the third degree. Section 1393 of the Civil Code provides as follows: "In the collateral line the degrees are counted by generations from one of the relations up to the common ancestor, and from the common ancestor to the other relations. In such computation the decedent is excluded, the relative included, and the ancestor counted but once. Thus, brothers are related in the second degree; uncle and nephew in the third degree; cousins-german in the fourth, and so on." As no other rule is elsewhere declared in any of the Codes, and as the four Codes are to be construed as one statute (Pol. Code, § 4480), section 1393 must be taken as establishing the degrees of relationship by consanguinity or affinity, and other sections of the Codes referring to such degrees must be construed as passed in view of said section 1393. People v. De la Guerra, 24 Cal. 73, and one or two previous cases, were decided before the adoption of the Codes, and under the rule that statutes in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed. Section 4 of each of the Codes provides as follows: "The rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation of the common law are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates." We are satisfied, therefore, that Justice VAN FLEET is not disqualified to sit in this case, and the said objection is overruled.

VAN FLEET, J., did not participate in the foregoing.

WICKERSHAM v. COMERFORD et al.
(No. 15,583.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1894.)
SETTING APART HOMESTEAD — CANCELLATION FOR FRAUD.

1. In an action to annul an order setting apart a homestead to defendant, on the ground of fraud, the evidence showed that defendant failed to state to the court that articles of separation had been made between herself and deceased, from whose land the homestead was set apart, and that their property had been divided, but applied for the order through a mistaken view of her rights, and on the erroneous advice of an attorney. Held, that a finding that defendant practiced no fraud on the court is sustained by the evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against Sarah Comerford and another to annul an order of court fraudulently obtained to set apart a homestead to Sarah Comerford. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellant. Smith & Murasky, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action to vacate and annul an order of the superior court setting apart a homestead to the use of the defendants out of the estate of Richard Comerford, deceased. The facts alleged in the complaint are set forth in the report of the case when here upon a former appeal. 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358. After the cause had been remanded to the superior court, the defendants answered the complaint; and upon the trial of the issues the court rendered its decision and judgment against the plaintiff, from which, and also from an order denying a new trial, he has appealed. The court finds that the allegations in the petition of Mrs. Comerford for the homestead were not fraudulent, and that the court was not induced to make the order by reason of any false or fraudulent representations therein contained, or by any concealment of facts from it by her, or by any one on her behalf. This finding is challenged by the appellant as not supported by the evidence, but we are of the opinion that the evidence before the court justifies the finding. It was necessary for the plaintiff to establish by clear and indubitable proof, to the satisfaction of the superior court, that the order setting apart the homestead had been obtained through some fraud practiced upon that court by the defendant. It was not sufficient to show that she had made the application under an erroneous view of her rights in the premises, or that, upon the facts presented in her petition or at the hearing, the court had mistaken the law applicable thereto. She cannot be charged with fraud or any fraudulent imposition upon the court for merely failing to state in her petition any facts tending to show that the petition ought not to be granted, unless it is made to appear that she knew the import of these facts, and that they were willfully suppressed by her with the intention of deceiving the court, and thereby inducing it to grant her petition. Tested by these rules, and plaintiff failed to establish his right to the relief sought. It was shown that, after the death of her husband, Mrs. Comerford was advised by her attorney that she was entitled to have the property set apart to her as a homestead, and the petition therefor was prepared by him, and signed by her, and presented to the court. It is not claimed that this advice was not given in good faith, or that the facts set forth in the petition are not correctly stated; and the most that can be said is that the attorney was mistaken in his views of the law. It is claimed, however, that the petitioner "concealed" from the court the fact that "articles of separation" had been entered into between her and her husband, under which they had divided their property, and were living separate and apart from each other. It was not shown, however, that the legal effect of these articles of separation upon her right to a homestead out of the estate of her husband was ever called to the notice of the petitioner, or that she was advised in reference thereto, or that she had any purpose or motive in omitting to make mention thereof in her petition or at the hearing; and she cannot be charged with "concealing" them from the court by her mere silence in reference to their existence. She is not to be charged with a fraudulent concealment of any fact unless she was under some obligation to disclose it, and the mere omission to make mention of the fact, in the absence of any knowledge or notice on her part that it was requisite to make such mention, falls far short of fraud.

Whether the court determined that the property which it set apart was community property, or the separate estate of the deceased, is not shown by the record. The order purports to have been made upon "the papers on file" and other evidence; and in the inventory on file with the court it was stated to be community property, while the attorney for the petitioner testified at the trial herein that he informed the court that it was the separate property of the deceased. If the court held that it was community property, its finding would have been contrary to the evidence; while, if it determined that it was the separate property of the deceased, it committed an error of law in setting aside the homestead without any limitations. These, however, are insufficient grounds for maintaining the present action, as a court of equity will never set aside a judgment for mere error, whether of law or fact, committed in the rendition of the judgment.

The court did not err in refusing to grant the motion of the plaintiff for judgment on the pleadings. The matters which were denied on information and belief were not presumptively within the knowledge of the defendants. The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAVINGS BANK OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY
v. BURNS. (No. 19,422.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1894.)

EXHIBITS TO PLEADINGS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—RESORT TO TITLE—ACTION ON CONTRACT—DEFENSE OF INVALIDITY — PLAINTIFF NOT IN FAULT.

1. An exhibit attached to a complaint, and referred to therein, becomes a part thereof, though the complaint does not expressly make it a part.

2. Where the body of a repealing act does not identify the act intended to be repealed, the title of such repealing act may be resorted to.

3. Where the president of a savings bank induces the bank to loan money, and take as security a mortgage on land, in order that a mortgage belonging to him may be paid, the mortgagor cannot, in defense to an action by the bank to foreclose, claim that its mortgage is invalid, under Civil Code, § 578, prohibiting any officer of a savings corporation from directly or indirectly borrowing its funds.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Savings Bank of San Diego County against Ann Burns to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Darby, for appellant. W. T. McNealy, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and the demurrer was overruled. She then answered, setting up that the plaintiff had not complied with the requirements of the act of April 1, 1876, "concerning corporations and persons engaged in the business of banking," and also that, in making the loan referred to in the pleadings, plaintiff had violated section 578 of the Civil Code. The plaintiff demurred to the answer, and the demurrer was sustained; and thereupon, defendant declining to amend, judgment of foreclosure was entered as prayed for, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

1. The first point made for a reversal is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. The alleged insufficiency of the complaint is based upon the fact that it simply avers that on a certain day the defendant "executed to the plaintiff a certain promissory note, and also a certain mortgage to secure the same; that a copy of said note is set out in said mortgage, and said mortgage is hereto attached, and marked 'Exhibit B'"; and it is claimed that, as the exhibit is not expressly made a part of the complaint, it does not constitute a part of it, and therefore it cannot be ascertained from the pleading when the note matured, nor what property was mortgaged to secure its payment. This point cannot be sustained. The exhibit, as attached to the complaint, forms a part of it, and must be so treated, notwithstanding no express words declaring it to be so are used. In Ward v. Clay, 82 Cal. 502, 23 Pac. 50, 227, it was held that a copy of a note annexed to the complaint, and referred to in the body of it as an exhibit, forms a part of the complaint, and may properly be referred to by the court for the purpose of ascertaining the form and contents of the note. And in Whitby v. Rowell, 82 Cal. 635, 23 Pac. 40, 382, it was held that when the complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage has a copy of the mortgage annexed as an exhibit, to which it refers, a correct description of the land in the mortgage is sufficient for all purposes of the suit. There are other cases to the same effect, but they need not be cited. The cases cited by appellant are clearly distinguishable from this case, and are not in point. The complaint was not well drawn, but, when tested by a general demurrer, we think it must be held sufficient.

2. The next point is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first defense set up in the answer. That defense was that the plaintiff had failed to file with the county recorder, or publish, the statements required by the act of April 1, 1876 (St. 1876, p. 729), and therefore could not maintain the action. The only question to be considered under this head is as to whether or not the act referred to had been repealed. In 1893 an act was passed by the legislature, and approved March 9th, reading as follows (St. 1893, p. 112):

"An act to repeal an act entitled 'An act concerning corporations and persons engaged in the business of banking,' approved April 1, 1876.

"Section 1. Said act is hereby repealed.

"Sec. 2. This act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

It is earnestly contended that this act did not repeal the act referred to in its title, for the reason that the title of an act is no part of the act, and therefore the words, "said act is hereby repealed," are meaningless. In Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes (section 58), it is said: "In this country, whilst the title of a statute is not, in general, regarded as a part of the same, it is nevertheless regarded as a legitimate aid in ascertaining the intention of the legislature, when the language and provisions in the body of the act are ambiguous and of doubtful meaning and application." And again, in section 59: "The propriety of such reference is especially manifest where the title is referred to in the body of the act, and all the more justifiable, in cases of uncertainty, where the constitution gives significance and assigns particular importance to the title by requiring that a statute shall contain but one subject, and that it shall be expressed in the title." In Myer v. Car Co., 102 U. S. 1, Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, commencing on page 11: "In cases of doubt the title might always be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the body of the act; but especially is this true in states like Iowa, where the constitution provides that 'every act shall embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, which subject shall be expressed in the title.'" In Wilson v. Spaulding, 19 Fed. 304, Mr. Justice Blodgett, after reviewing the authorities, said: "These authorities seem to fully sustain the right of the court to look at the title for the purpose of ascertaining the intent of congress, when the intent is doubtful or obscure from the body of the act; * * * but, reading the body of the act and the title together, there can be no question what section the act is applicable to." In Bank v. Henderson, 101 Cal. 307, 35 Pac. 899, one of the defenses set up in the answer was the same as that now under consideration here; and no question was raised by counsel or the court as to the validity of the repealing act of March 9, 1893. It was assumed that the act of April 1, 1876, was repealed by it, and the effect of the repeal was very fully discussed. In view of the authorities, we think the court below did not err in also assuming that the said act of April 1st was effectually repealed, and in sustaining the demurrer to the said first defense.

3. The only other point made for a reversal is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the second defense set up in the answer. That defense was, in effect, that at all the times named in the pleadings one Bryant Howard was the president of the plaintiff corporation, which was a savings bank duly organized and doing business under the laws of this state; that, at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage set out in the complaint, defendant was indebted to Howard in the exact sum named in said note, and that said sum was secured by a mortgage executed by defendant upon the same land embraced in her mortgage to the plaintiff; that, immediately prior to the execution of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff, Howard importuned her to pay him the amount due upon her said note and mortgage, and that she then and there informed him that she was unable to pay the same, and he thereupon promised and agreed to renew and extend said loan; that immediately thereafter the note and mortgage set out in the complaint were sent to her by one of the officers of the plaintiff, and that, believing it to be an extension of her loan by Howard, she signed and executed the same without reading them; that, after deducting prior incumbrances on said property, the value thereof was much less than the sum named in said note, and that Howard procured and induced plaintiff to make said loan to her for the purpose of paying to himself her said note and mortgage to him; and that this fact, and all other facts alleged by defendant, were known to plaintiff and its officers at the time of the execution of her said note and mortgage to it. The contention is that the admitted averments of the answer show that the loan was made to defendant, and her note and mortgage taken, in violation of section 578 of the Civil Code, and therefore no action can be maintained to enforce payment of the same. The section referred to reads as follows: "No director or officer of any savings and loan corporation must, directly or indirectly, for himself or as the partner or agent of others, borrow any of the deposits or other funds of such corporation. * * * The office of any director or officer who acts in contravention of the provisions of this section immediately thereupon becomes vacant." We do not think this contention can be sustained. The obvious purpose of the section of the Code invoked and relied upon was to protect savings banks and their depositors. To hold, therefore, that, if the deposits or funds of such a bank should be borrowed by any of its officers, directly or indirectly, no action could be maintained by the bank to recover back the money, would often work out great injustice and wrong. The general rule, undoubtedly, is that a contract founded upon an illegal consideration, or prohibited by statute, is void. There are, however, exceptions to this rule where the parties are not in pari delicto. Many of these exceptions are referred to in the note to Gray v. Roberts, 12 Am. Dec. 383, and among others the following: It is said: "Upon similar principles, it has been held that where a class of contracts is prohibited for the protection of particular parties thereto, the adverse parties cannot take advantage of the illegality of such contracts. Thus, when there was a statute prohibiting the loaning of public-school funds, except on mortgages on unincumbered lands, it was held that one who borrowed such funds, and gave a mortgage on incumbered land to secure the same, could not resist the enforcement of the contract as illegal, because the law was designed for the protection of the state, and not of the borrower [citing Indiana cases]. So, in Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 509, where the law required that contracts made by the state or a municipal corporation for labor should contain a stipulation that eight hours a day should be a day's work, and a contract was made with a county in which no such provision was inserted, it was held that the county could not take advantage of the omission, because the law was meant for the protection of the laborer." In our opinion this case is within the well-recognized exceptions to the general rule and the court therefore properly sustained the demurrer to the second defense. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WONG LANG v. ALASKA IMP. CO. (No. 15,575.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

In an action for labor in defendant's fish cannery, defendant's testimony was that the balance claimed by plaintiff was covered by a charge against him for defective canning, in accordance with the contract, and that plaintiff had signed a receipt in full, which was read to him before he signed it. Plaintiff's testimony was that the defective canning was due to defective machinery; that plaintiff could not read writing in the English language; that the receipt was not read to him at the time he signed it; that he supposed he was signing only for a payment which he then received. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Wong Lang against Alaska Improvement Company on contract. From a judgment rendered on a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel Titus, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is upon a written agreement between plaintiff and defendant, whereby the plaintiff, in consideration of certain specified payments to be made by the defendant, agreed to do and cause to be done, by himself and about 90 other Chinamen, to be employed by him, certain labor in and about the fish cannery of defendant during the fishing season of 1891; and thereupon it is alleged in the complaint "that plaintiff fully and faithfully performed each and every of the covenants on his part in said agreement contained, and that on the 23d day of November, 1891, there became due and payable to plaintiff, under and in accordance with the terms of said agreement, for and on account of said performance on his part, the sum of $23,775"; and it is further alleged that defendant has paid plaintiff only $21,155 on account, leaving still due, owing and unpaid, $2,620, for which plaintiff prays judgment. The defendant, by answer, denied that plaintiff had fully performed his contract, and denied that any sum was due, owing, or unpaid to plaintiff; alleged full payment of the amount found due according to the terms of the agreement upon an accounting and settlement between plaintiff and defendant, for which payment the plaintiff indorsed upon the agreement a receipt in full of all demands under the agreement. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,310, upon which judgment for this sum was rendered in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The only point made by appellant is that the verdict of the jury is not justified by the evidence. Although the transcript of the evidence brought up in the bill of exceptions seems to show a considerable preponderance of evidence, in number of witnesses at least, in favor of the defendant, yet I think it clear that the evidence for plaintiff substantially tends to prove all the issues on his part, and is prima facie sufficient to justify the verdict. That the verdict of a jury will not be set aside by this court on the ground that it appears to be against a mere preponderance of evidence is too well settled to require citation of authorities. The defendant's ledger account with plaintiff was put in evidence, and shows that plaintiff was credited with $23,775, which was balanced by charges, the last item of which is as follows: "Nov., 1891, Dr., to reclamation as per settlement, $1,312.55." It is claimed by defendant that this charge was properly made under that clause of the agreement which provides that plaintiff "shall be allowed a percentage of four per cent. for all 'do-overs' and mended cans, but all do-overs in excess of four per cent. shall be charged" to him at the rate of ten cents per can. The term "do-overs" means the cans of fish which have been so imperfectly closed that they leak, and therefore must be recanned,—done over. The whole controversy relates to this item of $1,312.55 charged to plaintiff for "do-overs" in excess of 4 per cent. Another part of the agreement required the defendant "to furnish all materials necessary for the manufacturing of cans and packing of salmon, * * * to keep the machinery in running order, and to furnish the necessary and experienced and skillful men to look after the same on their part." Plaintiff contended and testified that the "do-overs" in excess of 4 per cent. were the effect of defective machinery, and the failure of defendant to keep the machinery in running order, or to furnish skillful men for that purpose, and were not caused by any negligence or want of skill on the part of the plaintiff; and as to this plaintiff's testimony was corroborated by that of Eugene Amiot, an apparently disinterested witness, and was undisputed, except by the testimony of Mr. Barling, a stockholder of defendant, and superintendent of the cannery, who admitted that the machinery was imperfect, and spoiled a great many cans, yet claimed that it worked ordinarily well. Nor is it distinctly contended by counsel for appellant that the evidence is not substantially conflicting upon this issue. The principal controversy relates to the alleged settlement, which is denied by the plaintiff. There is no question, however, that plaintiff signed the receipt in full, which is indorsed on the contract as alleged in the answer; but he testified at the trial that he could not read writing in the English language; that the receipt was not read nor explained to him; that at the time he signed it there had been no settlement to the effect that any charge should be made or allowed against him for "do-overs"; that he was told and understood that the receipt was for only the amount ($10,000) then paid him on account, to enable him to pay off the Chinamen who had worked for him in defendant's cannery, and who were clamoring for their pay; and that he would not have signed it had he known it was a receipt in full of all his demands under the contract. Four witnesses, who were stockholders of the defendant corporation, testified that the charge for the "do-overs" was the result of a settlement to which plaintiff assented, and that the receipt was read to plaintiff before he signed it. The plaintiff was subjected to a long and searching cross-examination, by which it is claimed that some inconsistencies in his testimony tending to impeach its credibility were shown. But the alleged inconsistencies relate principally to collateral matters, as to who were present, and what was said on two different occasions, and may be accounted for, I think, without prejudice to the credibility of his testimony, by his imperfect knowledge of the English language, in which he testified. As to the principal and only material matters—the alleged settlement and receipt—his testimony was self-consistent and positive, and was flatly contradicted by the witnesses for defendant. This, I think, constitutes a case of substantial conflict. The jury must have believed the testimony of the plaintiff, and the lower court was satisfied with the verdict; and, though counsel invite attention to the fact that the witnesses for defendant are white men, he does not claim that the jury was prejudiced against them on that account. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SILVA v. SILVA. (No. 15,623.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1894.)

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DENIAL OF MOTION—AFFIRMANCE.

Where, on appeal, no affidavit to support a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence is identified as used on the hearing of the motion, and the affidavits in the transcript show that the alleged new evidence is merely cumulative, and would not probably effect a different result on a new trial, the denial of such motion will be affirmed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Frank Silva against Maria C. Silva to establish a trust in land. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Burris and Moses G. Cobb (Stephen G. Nye, of counsel), for appellant. R. B. Tappan, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that the defendant holds a certain lot of land in trust for the plaintiff, and prays that it be so adjudged by the court. The answer of the defendant is a denial of the alleged trust. Judgment passed for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

A careful reading of the transcript of 100 pages and 60 pages of briefs for appellant has led me to the conclusion that the appeal is totally destitute of merit. In limine, counsel for appellant complain that the court erred in substituting for their statement of the evidence an "epitome" of the stenographic report thereof, which does not fully nor truly represent it. But of this there is not the slightest evidence in the statement or bill of exceptions on which the motion for new trial was made. It does not appear, even, that appellant's original statement of the evidence was amended or changed in any respect. One of the grounds of the motion, as stated in the notice of the motion, was newly-discovered evidence, and it is contended that the court erred in not granting the motion on this ground. But, in the first place, no affidavit to prove this ground of the motion is properly identified as having been used or read on the hearing of the motion; and, in the second place, the affidavits printed in the transcript show that the alleged newly-discovered evidence was merely cumulative to that introduced by plaintiff on the trial; and, furthermore, that it probably would not effect a different result on a new trial. It is contended that the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence. But the evidence appears to be amply sufficient to justify the findings in all particulars in which they are excepted to in appellant's brief. Nor does the statement contain any intelligible specification of any error in law committed at the trial. Yet all the points made under this head in appellant's brief have been considered, with the result that no such error is made to appear. I think the order and judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

COOPER v. MONTEREY COUNTY. (No. 15,538.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1894.)
HIGHWAY—DEDICATION—ESTABLISHMENT BY USER —EVIDENCE—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. The fact that a strip of land has been continuously traveled and used by the general public as a highway for 20 years, with the knowledge of the owner of the fee, and without objection by him, does not justify a finding that the strip "is a public highway," since such facts are consistent with an absence of intention to dedicate, and may indicate merely a license.

2. Pol. Code, § 2619, providing that all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways, was repealed by Act March 30, 1874.

3. In an action against a county to quiet title to a strip of land, it appeared that a strip 10 feet wide was used 30 years by the public under license from plaintiff's tenants, unauthorized by him, and that no work was done on the road, except what was done by such tenants, who were in exclusive possession during the whole period of user, for their own use and convenience. Held, that the fact that such user was with plaintiff's knowledge, and without objection by him, did not support a judgment quieting title in the county to a strip 20 feet wide for the use of the public as a road.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by John B. H. Cooper against Monterey county, Cal., to quiet title to certain land. From a judgment for defendant for part of the land claimed, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Geil, for appellant. Zabala & Kearney, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land containing about 2,000 acres situate in the county of Monterey. The defendant, by its answer, disclaimed any title or interest in the land, except to a defined strip thereof, 40 feet in width, extending across the tract, which it alleged was a public highway, and as such was under the supervision and control of the defendant for the use of the general public, and that it had been traveled and used as a public road by the general public during a period of 30 years next before the commencement of the action. The court found that a part of said strip, 20 feet in width, extending across the tract, "has been continuously and uninterruptedly traveled and used by the general public as and for a public road or highway ever since 1872," and that "the same is a public highway," and "that such use of said portion of said land as a road or highway by the general public has been with the knowledge of plaintiff, and without objection on his part." Thereupon, to that extent, and for the use of the public as a road, the court adjudged that defendant's title be quieted. From this judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

Counsel for appellant contend that the findings of the court above stated are not justified by the evidence. The finding that the strip of land in question was traveled and used by the public ever since 1872, with the knowledge of plaintiff, and without objection on his part, is only the finding of probative facts tending to prove a dedication; but the fact of dedication (which, by the way, is neither alleged nor found, does not necessarily follow from these probative facts, since they are not necessarily inconsistent with a total absence of intention to dedicate, and may indicate merely a license. The finding that the strip of land "is a public highway," whether deemed an ultimate fact or a conclusion of law, is not justified. As an ultimate fact, it is not justified by the probative facts found, nor by the evidence, since the evidence tended to prove only those probative facts; there being no evidence tending to prove that the strip of land ever became a public highway otherwise than by dedication, and no allegation or claim of adverse user, or of title by prescription. Considered as a conclusion of law this finding is unwarranted by the findings of fact, which fail to show that the alleged road ever became a public highway in any mode provided by law.

The theory upon which respondent's counsel endeavor to support the judgment is based upon that part of section 2619 of the Political Code as it took effect January 1, 1873, which reads as follows: "All roads used as such for a period of five years are highways." And they contend, on the authority of Gloster v. Wade, 78 Cal. 407, 21 Pac. 6, that this provision was not amended nor repealed until 1883, and that, since the road in question was found to have been used continuously as a public road more than five years before this provision of the Code was repealed, the conclusion of law that it "is a public highway" is correct. But, unfortunately for this theory, the case of Gloster v. Wade has been overruled since this appeal was taken, in the case of Huffman v. Hall (Cal.) 36 Pac. 417, in which it was decided that section 2619 of the Political Code was repealed March 30, 1874,—less than three years after the commencement of the user of the road in question by the public.

Thus far the case has been considered without regard to the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, which tends to show that the road was used by the public only by a license from plaintiff's tenants, which was unauthorized by him, and that the width of the strip used by the public did not exceed 10 feet. It was also proved that no work was ever done on the road for the purpose of opening, improving, or repairing it, except what may have been done by plaintiff's tenants, who were in exclusive possession during the whole period of user by the public, for their own use and convenience. The evidence on the part of the defendant was sufficient to justify the finding as to the user by the public with the knowledge of plaintiff, and without objection from him, but nothing more in favor of defendant. As this finding is obviously insufficient to support the judgment, I think the order and judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

YOCCO v. CONROY. (No. 15,650.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1894.)

DEED OF WATER RIGHTS—CONSTRUCTION.

One who conveys land through which a stream flows by a deed which provides that it is intended to and does convey the right to lay a one-inch pipe so as to carry the running water from the stream to certain land of the grantee perpetually and forever, cannot afterwards, as the owner of adjoining land through which the stream flows, lay a pipe in the stream which will so divert the water as not to leave sufficient to fill the one-inch pipe of the grantee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Clemente Yocco against John Conroy to enjoin the diversion of water and for damages for its diversion. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. P. Veuve, for appellant. J. C. Black, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover damages for alleged wrongful diversion of water by defendant from plaintiff's water pipe through which he conducted water to his land for the purpose of irrigation, and also to enjoin the defendant from diverting such water perpetually. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the judgment was in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and contends that, upon the facts found by the court, the judgment should have been in his favor. The material substance of the facts found is as follows: In February, 1881, the defendant owned and resided upon a tract of land through which ran a living stream of water called a "gulch"; and at the same time plaintiff owned an adjoining tract of land, no part of which adjoined or included any part of the stream or gulch. On February 12, 1881, the defendant, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, conveyed to plaintiff one square rod of land at a certain point in said gulch, through the center of which square rod said stream ran; and by the same deed granted to plaintiff a defined right of way for a water pipe of one inch diameter from said square rod of land to plaintiff's nonriparian land. After the description of the land and the right of way, the deed contains the following: "This deed is intended and does hereby grant and convey to the said party of the second part [plaintiff] the right to lay a one-inch pipe along the above-described piece of land [the way] so as to convey the running water from said gulch to and over the land of the said party of the second part perpetually and forever." In the month of February, 1881, the plaintiff laid his pipe on the granted way, and connected it with a box at a point in the stream within the boundaries of said square rod of land; and thence, until the summer of 1889, without interruption or objection, conducted water from the stream to his land, to the full capacity of the pipe, except during such times as there was not sufficient water in the stream to supply the full capacity of the pipe, when he took all the water running in the stream above the head of his pipe.

The findings of the court as to the use of the water by plaintiff, and the diversion thereof by defendant, are as follows: "(4) The plaintiff has maintained said box and pipe as aforesaid continuously ever since said 12th day of February, 1881, and has continuously conducted and used as much of the water of said gulch as flowed into said box and through said pipe, which was, during nine months of the year, the full capacity of said pipe. During the other three months of the year some water would flow into said box and through said pipe each day, when none of the water in said gulch was diverted for the use of the defendant as an upper riparian owner; but when so diverted no water would flow into said box except what came into the stream below the diversion. (5) That defendant, some time in the summer of the year 1889, without the consent of plaintiff, laid a three-fourths inch pipe from a point in said gulch one hundred feet above said box of plaintiff, and by means thereof has ever since diverted from said gulch all the water that said three-fourths inch pipe would carry, when sufficient water flowed in said gulch at that point to fill the same. Defendant has ever since maintained, and still maintains, said pipe as aforesaid, and by means thereof has ever since diverted, and still diverts, all the water of said gulch which said three-fourths inch pipe would carry. (6) That said acts of defendant and his diversion of the waters of said gulch as aforesaid have diminished the quantity of water flowing down said gulch to said box of plaintiff, which is the natural course of said water, and in the summer and fall months, by reason of said acts of defendant, the quantity of water which has flowed and flows down said gulch to plaintiff's said box is not sufficient to fill his said one-inch pipe if allowed to flow without any obstruction or diversion. I further find that the defendant owns the land in and on both sides of said gulch, from the place where he diverts the water by means of his pipe to the place where the plaintiff's said box and pipe are located, and that the defendant has not at any time diverted any more of the water flowing in and through said gulch than was reasonably required for domestic purposes. (7) That all the water that said one-inch pipe can carry is, and has always been, necessary for the irrigation of plaintiff's said trees."

1. The principal ground upon which counsel for respondent endeavor to uphold the judgment is that defendant is riparian owner of all land over which the stream runs, except the square rod conveyed to plaintiff, and by reason thereof was entitled to divert the water as he did for domestic use, etc. The ready answer to this is that to whatever extent defendant granted to plaintiff the use of the water of the stream, to the same extent he parted with his riparian right to divert or use that water to the detriment of his grantee (Gould v. Stafford, 91 Cal. 155, 27 Pac. 543, and authorities there cited; Lux v. Hiaggin, 69 Cal. 392, 10 Pac. 674); and, since plaintiff claims the use of the water solely under the grant from the defendant, his alleged rights depend upon that grant alone.

2. The only other ground upon which the respondent endeavors to support the judgment is that the deed does not expressly grant the right to divert water to the full capacity of plaintiff's pipe at all times, nor to divert all the water at any time; and that, under the circumstances, it should not be so construed as to deprive defendant of the use of sufficient water for domestic purposes, etc. But the principal circumstance urged as a reason why it should not be so construed is that defendant is riparian owner, and therefore has a preferred right to the use of so much water as is necessary for household purposes and for watering cattle, etc. The effect of this circumstance has already been considered, and, besides, it is not found, and does not appear, that defendant had no other source of supply of water sufficient for all these purposes. If the deed is open to construction as to the extent of the grant, the most reliable circumstance in aid of such construction is the practical construction given it by the acts of the parties during the first eight years immediately following its execution, during which period plaintiff diverted water to the full capacity of his pipe, except while there was not sufficient water in the stream for that purpose, when he diverted all until interrupted by defendant in the summer of 1889. See findings 4 and 5. Yet I think the diversion and use of the water by plaintiff during the first eight years was in accordance with the intention of the parties as expressed or clearly implied in the deed. It appears by the findings that the diversion of the water by the defendant was a detriment to plaintiff, for which the latter was entitled to nominal damages at least. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to render judgment on the findings in favor of plaintiff for nominal damages; and also to grant an injunction against the defendant, perpetually restraining him from diverting any water from any point in the gulch above the head of plaintiff's pipe, except the surplus thereof over what may be necessary to supply plaintiff's pipe to its full capacity.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed and the court below is instructed to render judgment in favor of plaintiff for one dollar as damages, and to grant a perpetual injunction against the defendant, restraining him from diverting any water from the gulch or stream from any point therein above the head of plaintiff's pipe, except the surplus thereof over and above so much as may be necessary to supply said pipe to the full capacity thereof.

Dissenting opinion. For prior report, see 37 Pac. 1048.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the order denying a rehearing in this case, but, if the opinion of the department is to be understood as holding that the lands belonging to the several parties to the syndicate agreement became, by virtue of that agreement, partnership property, I desire to state that I do not concur in that view.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 7, 1894.)

On rehearing. Granted. For former report, see 38 Pac. 94.

McFARLAND and VAN FLEET, JJ. The judgment heretofore entered herein is vacated and set aside, and the cause ordered to a rehearing before the court in bank.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the foregoing order, but would desire to limit the reargument to a single point, viz. the first point discussed in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND, or, in other words, to the question whether a ticket conferring the right to ride to either Oakland or Alameda gives the holder a right to stop off at one place, and afterwards resume his journey to the other place.

FITZGERALD, J. I concur in the foregoing order granting a rehearing, but desire to state that my opinion remains unchanged upon the three principal points heretofore decided. I am satisfied that section 490 of the Civil Code is still in force, that it applies to the Southern Pacific Company, and that it gives stop-over privileges. But upon a point which was not touched in the oral argument, and but slightly and inadequately discussed in the briefs, I am in serious doubt. I refer to the question whether the ticket purchased by the plaintiff, and which, by its terms, entitled him to go to either Oakland or Alameda, gave him the right, after electing to stop at Oakland, to afterwards go to Alameda. Upon this point only I think the court should have further argument.

DE HAVEN, HARRISON, and GAROUTTE, JJ. We dissent from the order granting a rehearing in this case.

TUTTLE v. BLOCK. (No. 15,544.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1894.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—IMPAIRING OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS—CHANGING STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

The amendment of February 13, 1885, to Pol. Code, § 3788, providing that, "where land has been heretofore sold for delinquent taxes, the deed therefor must be made within one year and three months after this act takes effect, and, unless so made, the purchaser shall be deemed to have relinquished all his rights," does not impair the obligation of contracts.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Application by B. F. Tuttle for a writ of mandamus, commanding James N. Block, as tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco, to execute to him a tax deed. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Shay, for appellant. Henry T. Creswell, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On the petition of plaintiff, an alternative writ of mandate was issued to defendant in his official character as tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco, commanding him to execute to plaintiff a deed of a certain lot of land which had been sold by defendant's predecessor in office to plaintiff's assignor for delinquent taxes, or to show cause why he had not done so. The court sustained defendant's demurrer to the petition, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the writ, and thereupon dismissed the proceeding. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals. The petition and affidavit of plaintiff show that the lot in question was on March 31, 1875, regularly sold to William Bosworth for delinquent taxes theretofore properly assessed to W. W. Lapham, as owner, and that a certificate of such sale in due form was then issued by the tax collector to Bosworth; that the lot has never been redeemed from said sale; that after the time for such redemption had expired, to wit, December 1, 1875, Bosworth assigned the certificate of sale, with all his rights incidental thereto, to the plaintiff; that plaintiff thereupon entered into possession of the lot, and has ever since had sole possession thereof, and that the same has ever since been assessed to him for taxes, all of which taxes he has paid; that on March 20, 1893, the petitioner presented said certificate of purchase to defendant, and demanded that he, as tax collector, etc., officially execute to petitioner a deed for said lot, and at the same time tendered to defendant three dollars as and for his lawful fee for making such deed; but that defendant then refused, and ever since has refused, to execute such deed.

The specific and only ground upon which the demurrer was sustained is that the petition shows that petitioner's right to the writ is barred by section 3788 of the Political Code, as amended February 13, 1885, which, among other things, provides: "In all cases where land has been heretofore sold for delinquent taxes the deed therefor must be made within one year and three months after this act takes effect, and, unless so made, the purchaser shall be deemed to have relinquished all his rights under such sale." Neither at the time of the tax sale to Bosworth, nor at any time prior to the enactment of this amendment (February 15, 1885) of section 3788 of the Political Code, was there any statutory limitation upon the time within which the deed must have been made by the tax collector, except that it could not have been made until after the expiration of the period allowed for redemption, which period expired in this case in 1875, more than nine years before the passage of the amendment. Appellant contends that, by virtue of the contract of sale, he was entitled to a deed from the defendant, not only at the time the amendment was passed, but indefinitely thereafter, including the time when this proceeding was commenced, eight years after the passage of the amendment, and more than six years after the expiration of the period of limitation prescribed by the amendment; and, therefore, that the limitation of his right of action to compel the defendant to execute such deed to the period of one year and three months after the amendment took effect impairs the obligation of the contract of sale, and for this reason is repugnant to section 16 of article 1 of the constitution of this state, which prohibits the passage of any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." The amendment in question is clearly a prospective statute of limitation of the time within which the tax deed must have been made, and consequently a like limitation of the time within which an action must have been commenced to enforce the making of such deed, and, as such, does not impair nor purport to impair the obligation to make the deed, but merely prescribes a reasonable period of time, after the passage thereof, within which an action for a breach of such obligation must have been commenced.

It is claimed, however, that, under the contract of sale, the obligation to make the deed was without any limitation by law as to the time within which the deed must be made or the obligation enforced; and, therefore, that it was an essential part of the obligation of the contract that the time within which it might be enforced should be unlimited; and that the passage of a law, after the maturity of the obligation, limiting the time within which it could be enforced, impairs this essential part of the obligation of the contract. This argument, though often made heretofore, has been answered and almost uniformly overruled by the highest authorities. It is well settled that a reasonable limitation of the time within which a matured contractual obligation may be enforced by suit does not impair the obligation of the contract in the sense of the constitutional prohibition cited; and it has been often held that a limitation to one year, and even to six months, is not unreasonable, and does not impair the obligation of the contract, nor deprive the obligee of an adequate remedy. Of the great number of authorities to this effect, only the following, deemed specifically in point, need be cited: Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628; Vance v. Vance, 108 U. S. 514, 2 Sup. Ct. 854; Wheeler v. Jackson, 137 U. S. 245, 11 Sup. Ct. 76; Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. 648; Korn v. Browne, 64 Pa. St. 55.

Upon the question under consideration the authority of the supreme court of the United States is paramount, since the federal constitution also prohibits the passage of a law by any state impairing the obligation of contracts; and that court, upon writ of error, may review and reverse the final judgment of the highest court of law or equity of any state upon this question. The appellant relies principally upon the cases of Robinson v. Magee, 9 Cal. 81, and Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 395, 29 Pac. 58; but I think those cases distinguishable from the case at bar. The law which was held to impair the obligation in each of those cases required the obligee to perform an onerous act, not required by the contract, nor by any law in force at the time the obligation matured, as a condition precedent to any remedy for a breach of the obligation; whereas in this case the law in question requires no such condition, but, on the contrary, assumes the right of the obligee to an immediate unconditional remedy, and merely limits the time, prospectively, within which such remedy must be sought or prosecuted to one year and three months. If this is not a substantial distinction, available to exempt this case from the rule announced in those cases, neither is there any such distinction between those cases and that of Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 24 Pac. 648, nor between them and the decisions of the supreme court of the United States above cited; and the consequence must be that the legislature is prohibited from reducing the period of limitation of actions ex contractu from that prescribed by law at the time the obligation matured, even though the remedy is not thereby impaired, nor the period of limitation so much reduced as not to afford a reasonable time within which to apply for the remedy. In view of the authorities, it seems clear that such a consequence is not admissible. If, as I understand counsel to claim, the amendment of section 3788 of the Political Code purports to deprive appellant of vested rights other than the alleged right to unlimited time within which to commence this proceeding, no question as to any such other right is involved in this appeal, and therefore need not be considered. I think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GAROUTTE v. HALEY, County Clerk. (No. 15,892.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1894.)

AMENDMENT OF RECORD—CONCLUSIVENESS—NEW TRIAL—CONDITIONS—MANDAMUS.

1. An order by the court amending a former order granting a new trial is conclusively presumed to be correct, when used in evidence or questioned collaterally.

2. The court may, in its discretion, grant a new trial on condition that the party in whose favor it is granted shall pay costs.

3. Where a new trial was granted to defendant provided he pays the costs within a certain time, if he fails to so pay them the order granting the new trial is inoperative, and mandamus lies to compel the clerk to issue execution on the judgment.

In bank.

Petition by one Garoutte against Haley, county clerk, for a writ of mandate to compel defendant to issue execution on a judgment. Granted.

R. Y. Hayne, for petitioner. Goodfellow & Taylor, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Application for a writ of mandate. In an action brought by the petitioner against Stephen Williamson et al. in the superior court for the city and county of San Francisco, judgment was entered January 31, 1894, in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $3,891.21, and $366 costs of suit. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, and after argument thereon an order was entered in the minutes of the court, July 31, 1894, granting said motion. August 13, 1894, the court made, and caused to be entered in its minutes, the following order: "The plaintiff's motion to amend the order granting a new trial having been continued until Monday, the 13th of August, 1894, and having come on regularly to be heard on that day, R. Y. Hayne, Esq., appearing for the plaintiff, and no one appearing for the defendants, and it appearing to the court that the order granting a new trial, heretofore entered in said cause, does not correctly set forth the grounds upon which the court acted in making said order: Now, therefore, it is ordered, upon plaintiff's said motion, that said order granting a new trial be, and the same is, hereby amended so as to read as follows [title of court and cause]: In this action, the motion for a new trial on file herein having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and taken under advisement, and now the court having fully considered the same, and being fully advised therein, it is ordered by the court that said motion be, and the same is, hereby granted, upon the grounds * * * [stating them]; and it is further ordered, as a condition of the order granting a new trial, that the defendants herein pay to plaintiff herein, within twenty-five days from July 31, 1894, the plaintiff's costs of suit, amounting to the sum of two hundred and twenty-six ($226) dollars; provided the plaintiff file within twenty days from said July 31, 1894, a written consent not to prosecute any appeal from the said order granting a new trial, but to either take a new trial of said action, or to dismiss the same." Within the time designated therefor in this order, the plaintiff filed a waiver of his appeal and right to appeal from said order, but the defendants did not pay the sum of $226 named in the order. September 17, 1894, the petitioner applied to the respondent, as clerk of said court, to issue an execution upon the judgment, and upon his refusal the present application was made for a writ of mandate requiring him to issue such execution.

Upon the application and return herein, we can consider only the order of August 13th. That order purports, upon its face, to be amendatory of the order of July 31st, and to be made for the purpose of correcting the former order. Its effect, therefore, was to supersede the original order, and to render it the only order of the court upon the motion for a new trial. It must therefore receive the same consideration as if the original order had been entered in the terms in which it is now found. The right of a court of general jurisdiction to amend or correct its records so that they shall speak the truth is too well recognized to need any argument. Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal. 486, 26 Pac. 1074. And any correction or amendment of its records is conclusively presumed to have been properly made, when such record is collaterally drawn in question, or is used as evidence or relied upon in support of any other proceeding. Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 391, 31 Pac. 264; Cockrill v. Clyma, 98 Cal. 123, 32 Pac. 888.

The order of August 13th is not framed in as simple and direct language as it might have been, but we are of the opinion that, upon a consideration of all its terms, the proper construction to be given to it is that the court required of the defendants, as a condition upon which their motion should be granted, the payment of the plaintiff's costs: provided the plaintiff should, at least five days before the expiration of the time within which such payment was to be made, waive his right to appeal from such order; that, if the plaintiff should not file such waiver, the defendants need not pay the costs, and the order for a new trial would then become absolute. If the plaintiff should file the waiver, and the defendants should not pay the costs within the time limited, the condition upon which the new trial was ordered would remain unperformed, and consequently the order would become inoperative. The order does not state in express terms that in such case the new trial would be denied, but we think that is a necessary inference to be drawn from all its provisions; otherwise, the motion for a new trial must be regarded as still pending, since a new trial was granted only upon a compliance with the condition. This appears to be the construction given to the order by the defendants themselves, for on the 19th of September they appealed therefrom, stating in their notice that they appeal from said order "in so far as the same denies the motion of the defendants for a new trial in said action, and also in so far as the same grants such motion of defendants upon conditions as therein expressed."

The authority of the court to make its order granting or refusing a new trial dependent upon the performance of a condition by the party in whose favor the order is made must be regarded as a settled rule of procedure in this state. Davis v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 13, 32 Pac. 646. And it is within the discretion of the court to make the payment by the defendant of costs to the plaintiff the condition upon which it will grant a new trial. Rice v. Gashirie, 13 Cal. 53; Cordor v. Morse, 57 Cal. 301. Whether, in the present case, the condition was a proper one, or whether the court failed to exercise a proper discretion in making the condition, is not open to consideration here, but can be reviewed only upon a direct appeal from the order itself. As the motion for a new trial must be regarded as having been denied, and no undertaking to stay execution upon the judgment has been filed, it was the duty of the respondent to issue the execution, when requested by the plaintiff. The application for the writ is granted.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

PEOPLE v. TUCKER. (No. 21,141.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1894.)
CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE OF ANOTHER CRIME.

On a trial for larceny, testimony of a theft other than the one charged, and shortly before it, is not admissible.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Ansel Smith, Judge.

Richard Tucker was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and the order denying a new trial. Reversed.

A. V. Scanlan, for appellant. Wm. H. H. Hart and W. H. Layson, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The defendant was informed against for the crime of grand larceny in stealing $35 from the person of William Laughlin, on the 18th day of January, 1894. At the trial, Laughlin testified that he and defendant occupied the same room on Wednesday night, January 16, 1894; that witness had in a purse when he went to bed $45 in gold, and loose in his pocket $2 in silver. When he went to bed, he put his purse and watch under his pillow. In the morning, when he was half awake, he felt a hand go under his pillow, but thought Tucker wanted to see what time it was. Tucker then shook him, and told him it was time to get up. Tucker then said: "You spent a good deal of money last night." Witness then looked at his purse, and found $20 gone, and said to Tucker: "Dick, this won't do. You must have taken twenty dollars out of there." Tucker denied taking it, but finally, when witness promised to give him $2, Tucker handed him the $20. The witness further testified that he and Tucker were about town together all that day and night. He had a $20 piece changed, and at about 1 o'clock the next morning sat down in a saloon, and fell asleep. When he went to sleep, he had $35 in his purse. During his sleep his purse was taken from his pocket, and the money abstracted, and the purse put in his coat pocket, with the key to his room, which he did not have when he fell asleep. F. Doutré testified that he saw defendant take from Laughlin's pocket his purse, and that he showed him two five-dollar pieces which he had taken from it, offering him one not to speak of the matter. The defendant testified for himself that he did not take the money, and knew nothing of the matter. The testimony in regard to the abstraction of the $20 piece on the morning of the 17th was put in against the objection of the defendant, who excepted to the ruling of the court admitting it, and afterwards moved to strike it out, and excepted to the ruling of the court denying the motion. Whether these rulings were correct is the only question presented on this appeal.

The fact that testimony offered tends to prove another offense is never a valid objection to its introduction. On the other hand, testimony is not relevant simply because it tends to show that the defendant at some other time was guilty of a similar offense. Guilt cannot be shown, nor can the weight of evidence be increased, by showing that the defendant has committed other offenses. When such evidence is offered, the same considerations arise as upon the offer of other testimony. Is the evidence relevant and competent? Does it tend to prove any fact material to the issues? The only suggestion made here in justification of the ruling is that but for this proof the defendant might have claimed that he took the money from a sleeping friend to preserve it for him. There was no such issue in the case. The defendant did not claim that he took the money for such purpose. He denied that he took it at all. Mere proximity of time and place do not render this evidence admissible. People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 379, 34 Pac. 856. I think the ruling was erroneous, and that for that reason the judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

WHITMORE et al. v. AINSWORTH et al.
(No. 15,547.)

(Supreme Court of California, Nov. 2, 1894.)

PURCHASER OF LAND—NOTICE OF EQUITIES—POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIONS.

1. Where, in an action by a grantor against the grantee to set aside a deed for fraud, the findings are for the defendant, the question whether possession by the grantor operated as notice to subsequent purchasers is immaterial.

2. A question whether defendant wanted plaintiff "to do anything" at a certain time was rightly excluded as calling for a conclusion.

3. A paper executed by defendant, authorizing his agent to take possession of certain premises, is admissible to prove defendant's attempt to take possession thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by Charlotte S. Jones against A. G. Ainsworth and others to set aside and annul a deed for fraud and want of consideration. Plaintiff having died before the trial, her executors, Welles Whitmore and Cary Howard, were substituted as plaintiffs. Judgment for defendants. From an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Whitmore & Stoddart, Welles Whitmore, Cary Howard, and M. C. Chapman, for appellants. C. L. Calvin and T. F. Graber, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action brought to set aside and annul a deed executed on or about July 26, 1890, by Charlotte S. Jones to the defendant A. G. Ainsworth, upon the grounds that the same was without consideration, fraudulent, and void. Defendants had judgment, from which, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal.

The action was commenced in the name of Charlotte S. Jones as plaintiff, who departed this life before the trial, and the present plaintiffs, the executors of her last will, were thereupon substituted as plaintiffs in the cause. A synopsis of the complaint may be thus stated: (1) On the 22d day of July, 1890, Charlotte S. Jones, the plaintiff, acquired a legal title to the lot of land described in the complaint by deed from Welles Whitmore. (2) Plaintiff was at the time a servant of defendant, who went with her, on the 26th day of July, to the office of Whitmore, for the purpose of receiving said deed, and thence to the office of the county recorder, where defendant represented to plaintiff that, in order to have said deed recorded, it was necessary for her to acknowledge it; and plaintiff, believing this statement to be true, made, as she supposed, such acknowledgment, but in fact acknowledged a fraudulent deed, which defendant had prepared from her to himself of the property. (3) That there was no consideration therefor. (4) That plaintiff was able to write, but said deed to the defendant was signed with plaintiff's mark. (5) That the deed was not made, signed, executed, or acknowledged by plaintiff, and if her name is signed thereto it is a forgery. (6) Plaintiff was old, feeble, and unacquainted with business, and defendant, well knowing that fact, took advantage of her incapacity, fraudulently procured her to acknowledge said deed, which he recorded, and now claims to be the owner of said lot of land. There are also allegations to the effect that defendant afterwards executed a mortgage upon the lot to the Oakland Bank of Savings to secure the payment of $400, which mortgage was duly recorded. That the said bank took with notice and knowledge of the ownership and possession of plaintiff in and to said land, etc. Defendant's answer denies that the deed from plaintiff to him was without consideration, and denies all fraud in its procurement. It further sets out that in July, 1890, Welles Whitmore had title and possession of the lot of land in question under a deed of conveyance from plaintiff, claiming to hold it as security for $175 asserted to be due him from plaintiff; that plaintiff was desirous of redeeming the same from Whitmore, but was unable to procure the means so to do; that plaintiff and defendant thereupon entered into an agreement whereby the latter agreed to and did advance the money to pay Whitmore, and to support, maintain, and care for plaintiff, and to furnish her all the necessities of life, including board, lodging, clothing, medical attendance, etc., during the full period of her natural life, to pay her lodge, insurance, and society dues and assessments, in return for which plaintiff agreed to convey to him by deed absolute the title in fee to the lot of land in question; that in pursuance of said agreement defendant advanced the money, paid Whitmore, who conveyed to plaintiff, and the latter then conveyed to defendant the said lot, and placed him in possession; that defendant complied with all the conditions of the agreement to be by him kept and performed, etc. Defendant also incorporates in his answer, and makes a part thereof, an affidavit, made and duly certified before a notary public by the plaintiff, in which she states that she is old, feeble, and without near relatives; that defendant and his family have been her friends; that defendant advanced the money to pay Whitmore, and that she then knowingly and voluntarily executed and acknowledged the conveyance to defendant, who has faithfully kept his agreement with her; that the allegations of fraud in her complaint are untrue; that she never authorized this action, never read or heard the complaint read, and was not aware of its contents, and knew nothing of its being filed, paid no costs or fees, and directs that the same be dismissed at once.

At the trial Rachel C. Quinn was called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, and had testified as to a conversation which occurred between plaintiff and defendant, when the following question was propounded to the witness: "Q. State whether or not he [defendant] wanted her [plaintiff] to do anything or not at that time." To which counsel for defendant objected "upon the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness." The objection was sustained, an exception noted, and the ruling is assigned as error. The record shows that the court permitted the witness to testify, and she did testify at length, to the conversation between the parties, and, finally, that defendant had a paper he wanted plaintiff to sign. No doubt this was precisely what plaintiff desired to prove in answer to his question. Whether it was or not, the action of the court in confining the witness to a statement of facts as they occurred, rather than to an expression of her opinion of what was wanted, was proper.

Thomas T. Jones was called by the plaintiff as a witness, and, after testifying that plaintiff was his wife, said he went to the house where his wife died, on the day of the funeral, to take possession of the place; that he had a paper with him, which he produced, and which he said he tried to show to Mrs. Rachel C. Quinn, but she would not look at it. On cross-examination the paper was offered in evidence, and proved to be an authorization to witness from defendant as owner to take possession of the premises in which his wife had died, and to hold the same until further arrangements. To this document objections were made, and the ruling admitting it is assigned as error. The evident object of the plaintiff in introducing the witness was to prove by him that he was seeking to take possession of the property in dispute, where plaintiff had died, for and on behalf of the defendant. The paper in question was the authority under which witness acted, and as such was competent evidence.

The other errors assigned upon the admission of evidence are not more important, and are as destitute of foundation as those noticed, and, as they relate to the testimony of defendant, they need not be noticed. The fact is, the testimony on the part of the plaintiff failed most signally to sustain the allegations of fraud set up in the complaint. Treated liberally, and the most that can be said of it is that it raised a suspicion as to the good faith of the defendant in some of the transactions. Had the court granted a nonsuit as asked for by defendant, its action could have been sustained. The findings are supported by the evidence. The only one upon which any doubt should be predicated is that in relation to the possession by defendant of the land in dispute; and of this it may be said: (1) There was a conflict in the evidence. (2) The question of possession, in view of the findings that there was no fraud on the part of defendant, became wholly unimportant. If he purchased the land in good faith for a valuable consideration, and received a deed of conveyance thereof in due form from plaintiff, he was entitled to the possession; and, whether he had such possession or not, he could execute a valid mortgage thereon to the Oakland Bank of Savings. It is only where the title is defective, or where equities exist in favor of the grantor or others, that possession by the grantor is notice to subsequent purchasers. In other words, possession by the grantor after a conveyance is notice to subsequent purchasers of any defects which may exist in the title, sufficient to put a subsequent purchaser upon inquiry; but, if such inquiry results in showing a perfect title in the grantee, the subsequent purchaser cannot be made to suffer by reason of his immediate grantor not having been in possession. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HITCHCOCK. (No. 21,139.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—OBJECTIONS TO INDICTMENT—WAIVER—PERJURY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The fact that in an information for perjury the words "manner material to the issue" were used, instead of "matter," etc., is not ground for reversing a conviction, under Pen. Code, § 1258, the error being without prejudice.

2. The fact that the issue concerning which a witness testifies falsely is afterwards admitted does not render it immaterial, so as to prevent a conviction of perjury therefor.

3. An instruction that if defendant testified in a certain manner after being sworn, etc., and in fact did not see or hear the occurrences to which he testified, and was not at that time in E., where the occurrences took place, but was in F., and his testimony was knowingly and willfully false, then defendant was guilty of perjury, does not violate Const. art. 6, § 19, providing that judges shall not instruct with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law.

4. The fact that Pen. Code, § 1321, providing that an accused may testify in his own behalf, does not expressly authorize the court to instruct as to the credit to be given his testimony, does not deprive it of the power to do so.

5. An instruction that "defendant has been examined in his own behalf. This it is his right to be, and the jury will consider his testimony as they would that of any other witness examined before you. It is proper for the jury, however, to bear in mind the situation of defendant, the manner in which he may be affected by your verdict, and the very grave interest he must feel in it; and it is proper for the jury to consider whether his position and interest may not affect his credibility or color his testimony. But it is your duty to consider it fairly, and give it such credit and weight as you think it is entitled to receive," is not ground for reversal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Albert Hitchcock was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ford & Burnell and Ernest Sevier, for appellant. T. H. Selvage, for the People.

HAYNES, C. The defendant was indicted for perjury. The indictment appears to have been copied in part from the case of People v. Ah Bean, 77 Cal. 13, 18 Pac. 815. The opinion in that case set out the material part of the indictment, and in it occurs the expression "did in a manner material to the issue." The word "manner" is evidently a misprint, in that case, for the word "matter." Here the word "manner" is used in the indictment. The indictment was not demurred to. At the close of the evidence on behalf of the people, the defendant moved the court to instruct the jury to acquit the defendant, upon the ground that the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense; and then first raised the question as to the use of the word "manner" instead of "matter." The indictment was in other respects sufficient, and in some particulars less open to criticism than that against Ah Bean. If the district attorney had read the opinion of the learned chief justice in that case he would have seen that it was an error of the printer, as he afterwards used the word "matter" in precisely the same connection. We do not think appellant or his counsel could have been misled or prejudiced by the error, as it was clearly alleged that the false testimony was given upon the preliminary examination of George B. Hall on a charge of murder, and set out the evidence given by appellant on such examination, showing on its face that the evidence so given was material to the issue, and, that appearing, it appeared upon the face of the indictment that the testimony so given was in a matter material to the issue. We do not intend to encourage carelessness in criminal pleading; but where a defect in an indictment or information is merely technical, and does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, we are not at liberty to reverse the judgment. Pen. Code, § 1258.

The testimony of appellant given upon the examination of Hall, as set out in the indictment, was clearly material. The issue there was whether Hall was probably guilty of the murder of Anderson. The killing of Anderson was therefore in issue. The record here does not show that Hall admitted the killing, but, if it did, it would not affect the question, since an admission of a fact does not tend to show that it was not in issue. It was not only alleged to have been material, but was proven to be so upon the trial.

Appellant's contention that the court erred in its third instruction cannot be sustained. This instruction stated: "The matter which the prosecution alleges the defendant swore to, and which is alleged to be false, is as follows." The court then quoted the allegations of the indictment, and added: "The prosecution claims this testimony to have been false, and that the defendant knew it to be false, in this: that the defendant, Albert Hitchcock, was at that time at Freshwater, a distance of ten miles from the city of Eureka, and that, so far as he was concerned, the whole testimony was false, for the reason that, if it did occur, he did not see or hear it." This was a clear and correct statement of the issues; and the remainder of the instruction was an application of the law to the effect that, if the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did so testify after being duly sworn, etc., and in fact did not see or hear the occurrences to which he testified, and was not at that time in Eureka, but was in Freshwater, some 10 miles distant, and that his said testimony was knowingly and willfully false, then the defendant was guilty, and they should so find. This instruction did not violate section 19, art. 6, of the constitution, which provides that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." See People v. Flynn, 73 Cal. 516, 15 Pac. 102; People v. Casey, 65 Cal. 260, 3 Pac. 874.

Appellant excepted to the seventh instruction given at the request of the people, which is as follows: "The defendant has been examined as a witness on his own behalf. This it is his right to be, and the jury will consider his testimony as they would that of any other witness examined before you. It is proper for the jury, however, to bear in mind the situation of the defendant, the manner in which he may be affected by your verdict, and the very grave interest he must feel in it; and it is proper for the jury to consider whether this position and interest may not affect his credibility or color his testimony. But it is your duty to consider it fairly, and give it such credit and weight as you think it is entitled to receive." Appellant contends that the change in the statute since the case of People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 204, was decided, has destroyed the authority of that case upon this point. That case was decided in 1867. The constitution of 1849, art. 6, § 17, and section 19 of the same article in the present constitution, are identical.

If neither the constitution nor the statute prohibits an instruction as to the credibility of witnesses, the power to so instruct must be conceded. That the constitution does not has been frequently decided, from the case of People v. Cronin, supra, down to People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 181, 31 Pac. 45. The act of 1866 (St. 1865-66, p. 865) permitted the defendant to be examined as a witness at his own request, "the credit to be given to his testimony being left solely to the jury, under the instructions of the court." This act was amended in 1872 (St. 1871-72, p. 319), but was not changed in this respect. The Codes omit the clause above quoted relating to the instructions of the court, and the right of a defendant in a criminal case to testify in his own behalf is found in a general provision relating to the competency of witnesses. Code Civ. Proc. § 1879; Pen. Code, § 1321. These provisions, counsel contend, effect such a change in the law that the court can no longer give the jury any instruction upon the subject of the defendant's testimony. But these changes do not affect the constitutional provision; and if that provision permits it, and if the statute does not prohibit it, it must still exist. The charge in this case is certainly not more objectionable than many others which have been sustained on appeal; but we would again call attention to the suggestions given in People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 180, 31 Pac. 45; People v. Curry (No. 21,110; filed Aug. 16, 1894) 37 Pac. 503; and People v. Lang (No. 21,119) 37 Pac. 1031. Sections 1102 and 1323, Pen. Code, cited by counsel, do not affect the question.

No other points are made by appellant in his brief, but we have examined the whole record, and find no ground upon which the motion for a new trial should have been granted. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

FARWELL et al. v. MURRAY. (No. 15,598.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1894.)

ASSUMPSIT—PLEADING—WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL.

1. In a complaint for labor performed, and goods furnished, it is not necessary to segregate the items of the account.

2. A case was continued on account of the absence of defendant's attorney, and afterwards called, when defendant appeared with a new attorney, and demanded a jury. Held that, by his failure to demand a jury on the first call defendant did not waive his right to it, under Code Civ. Proc. § 631, providing for such waiver (1) by failing to appear at the trial; (2) by written consent; and (3) by oral consent in open court.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Farrell & Hutchinson against Robert M. Murray for labor performed and goods furnished. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Welles Whitmore, for appellant. Dodge & Fry, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover the sum of $556.42 for and on account of work done and labor performed by plaintiffs for defendant, and for and on account of goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that it was uncertain and unintelligible, for the reason that it could not be determined therefrom how much of the sum alleged to be due was for work and labor, and how much for goods, wares, and merchandise. The demurrer was overruled, and the defendant then answered, denying the allegations of the complaint. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the judgment entered was in favor of the plaintiffs, for the sum of $490.57, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

There was no prejudicial error in the order overruling the demurrer. The complaint stated a cause of action, and it was not necessary to set forth the items of the account. If the defendant desired more particular information as to the items, he might have demanded a bill of particulars. Code Civ. Proc. § 454.

It appears from the bill of exceptions that the case came on regularly to be heard at 10 o'clock a. m. on August 22, 1893, at which time the attorneys for plaintiffs and the defendant appeared, but the attorney for defendant was not present. It was stated to the court that defendant's attorney was engaged in the trial of another case in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and for that reason could not then be present to try this case. At the request of the defendant the trial of the case was thereupon continued until 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day, at which time the plaintiffs and their attorneys appeared, and announced that they were ready to proceed with the trial; and the defendant appeared with a new attorney, who was, by an order of the court, authorized to be and appear as the attorney for the defendant in said action. "Thereupon, the defendant demanded a trial by jury, which demand the court refused, and denied the right of the defendant to a jury trial." The defendant duly excepted to this ruling of the court, and now assigns it as error. The constitution, in article 1, § 7, provides: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate. * * * A trial by jury may be waived * * * in civil actions by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law." And section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a trial by jury may be waived in manner following: "(1) By failing to appear at the trial. (2) By written consent, in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk. (3) By oral consent, in open court, entered in the minutes." It is claimed for respondent that the trial of the case was actually commenced in the morning, when it "came on regularly to be heard," and that appellant waived his right to a trial by jury by not demanding it at that time. We fail to see any valid ground on which this claim can be sustained. The trial of the case was not commenced in the morning, but was continued until the afternoon, when appellant promptly demanded a trial by jury. He was certainly entitled to such a trial, unless he had waived his right in one of the ways prescribed by the law. We see nothing in the record showing such waiver, and therefore conclude that the court erred in its ruling. See Biggs v. Lloyd, 70 Cal. 447, 11 Pac. 831.

The other matters discussed by counsel need not be considered. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

(4 Cal. Unrep. 876)

PEOPLE v. BUTTON.¹ (No. 21,127.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 2, 1894.)

JUSTIFIABLE HOMICIDE.

1. Pen. Code, § 197, provides that to constitute justifiable homicide, if defendant was the assailant in a mortal combat, he must in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed. Held, that where one accused of murder commenced the combat, but in good faith tried to withdraw before the homicide, and was followed by deceased, who continued the combat, the fact that deceased, by reason of injuries sustained at defendant's hands, was unable to realize that defendant sought to withdraw, does not limit the right of defendant to claim that the killing was done in self-defense.

2. If it was defendant's purpose in good faith to withdraw from the combat, and he endeavored to do so, it is not necessary to his justification that the conflict should have actually ceased, or that there should have been such an interval as would divide it into two different combats.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; George E. Otis, Judge.

Charles Button was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

Byron Waters and Wm. A. Harris, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart and Frank F. Oster, for the People.

HAYNES, C. An information was filed against Button, charging him with the murder of Gustav Bohm, and upon the trial he was found guilty of manslaughter. His motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Some exceptions were reserved to evidence, but the principal questions arise upon the instructions to the jury and the sufficiency of the evidence as matter of law to sustain the verdict. The deceased died from a gunshot wound inflicted by the defendant. Very shortly before the shooting, angry words had passed between the parties, and at that time the defendant stamped or kicked the deceased in the face. The injury inflicted by defendant upon Bohm's face when he stamped upon it was fully described by the physicians, and doubtless was of a very serious character, breaking down the left cheek bone and injuring the left eye, so that, in the opinion of the physician, the possibility of sight in that eye was excluded, and that the tendency would be to affect the other eye, both in co-ordination of movement and vision. The doctor was then asked by the district attorney: "What faculties would it affect, in your opinion?" Defendant's objection that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was overruled, and the witness answered: "It would affect more particularly his brain, and his mental faculties, and his vision, and sense of smell, and the guidance and direction of his eyes or eye to a particular spot, or for any particular purpose." The same witness was asked the further question: "Would that, in your opinion, affect a man's impressions of things around him?" An objection to this question was also overruled, and the witness answered, "Yes, sir." Other questions were permitted, and answers received, of like character. In this connection one of the instructions given to the jury may properly be considered, inasmuch as it is based on this evidence of the mental condition of Bohm. The defendant requested the court to give the following instruction: "One who has sought a combat for the purpose of taking advantage of another may afterwards endeavor to decline any further struggle, and if he really and in good faith does so before killing the person with whom he sought the combat for such purpose, he may justify the killing on the same ground as he might if he had not originally sought such combat for such purpose." The court modified said instruction, and gave it as modified by the addition of the following: "Provided, that you also believe that his endeavor was of such a character, and so indicated, as to have reasonably assured a reasonable man that he was endeavoring in good faith to decline further combat, unless you further believe that in the same combat in which the fatal shot was fired, and prior to the defendant endeavoring to cease further attack or quarrel, the deceased received at the hands of the defendant such injuries as deprived him of his reason or his capacity to receive impressions regarding defendant's design and endeavor to cease further combat." The court also gave the following instructions: "But, even though the jury should be satisfied that the defendant, after such assault, and before firing the fatal shot, did really and in good faith endeavor to decline any further struggle, and to abandon the conflict, and that the defendant, at the time he fired the fatal shot, had reason to fear and did fear that the deceased meant to take his life, and acted under the influence of such fears alone, yet if you also believe that in such assault the defendant, by his own act, had put the deceased into such a condition that the defendant could not make the deceased understand that the defendant desired to withdraw from the conflict, you must not acquit the defendant." The modification of the first of these instructions and the qualification in the second commencing with the word "yet" were erroneous. If, under the circumstances existing at the moment of the homicide, the deceased had killed the defendant, and he had been on trial for murder, there might have been some pertinency to these instructions. If the defendant, being the first aggressor, had declined further combat, as stated in the first part of the instruction, he is placed, so far as the law of self-defense is concerned, in the same position as though there had been no prior combat; and, that being true, the mental or other condition of the deceased could not affect his right of self-defense, even though such condition, if the deceased had slain the defendant, would have excused the homicide. If a confirmed lunatic, so completely bereft of reason as to make him wholly irresponsible for his acts, is about to take my life, may I not, when it is necessary for the preservation of my own life, take his? Must I be placed where I have no alternative but to accept death at his hands, or be hanged for murder? Section 197 of the Penal Code defines justifiable homicide. So much of subdivision 3 of that section as is pertinent is as follows: "But such person or the person in whose behalf the defense was made, if he was the assailant or engaged in mortal combat, must really and in good faith have endeavored to decline any further struggle before the homicide was committed." This section makes the justification to depend wholly upon the endeavor of the defendant in good faith to decline any further struggle, and not upon the mental or other condition of the deceased; nor, if such condition was not normal, upon whether it was caused by the defendant. It follows from these considerations that the evidence of the physician as to the effect of the injury upon the mental or other condition of the deceased was improperly admitted.

Another instruction requested by the defendant was modified by the court, and, given as modified, is as follows (the modification being in italics): "If you believe from the testimony in this case that the defendant committed an assault upon the deceased by kicking him, and then left him with the intention of doing him no further harm; that after committing such assault he went after his horse, and saddled him, with the purpose of leaving the party, to avoid further trouble, and that other members of the party endeavored to persuade him to remain, and that while he and they were so engaged the deceased picked up his own gun, pointed and snapped it at defendant, and then pumped or attempted to pump a cartridge into it, and that he again pointed it at defendant, and that then defendant fired the fatal shot; and you further believe that the first assault and the second were substantially distinct transactions,—you must acquit the defendant, whether you think the assault by kicking was justifiable or not." In another instruction upon the same subject the following qualification was inserted: "And that after the first assault had ceased, and there had an interval elapsed between said first assault and the final assault, making said assaults respectively, although in some degree related to each other, yet substantially distinct transactions, each attended with its own separate circumstances, and the deceased procured his gun, and made such an attempt to shoot the defendant," etc., stating circumstances which would justify the homicide). Each of these modifications imposes upon the defendant conditions not required by the statute. They required the jury to find as matter of fact, in order to justify the homicide, that there were two substantially distinct transactions; that is, that the transaction immediately connected with the shooting of the deceased, though if considered by itself it would have justified the defendant, could not justify him unless it was substantially distinct from the assault made by defendant before he went for his horse. The interval between the two occurrences is not important simply as it may serve to mark two occurrences or transactions instead of one, but also because what occurred in the interval, as well as the interval itself, when shown to be voluntary, marks a withdrawal from the conflict, and furnishes evidence tending to show the purpose and intent of the defendant not to renew it. If there was such purpose and intent on the part of defendant in good faith to withdraw from the conflict, and in like good faith he endeavored to do so, it is not necessary to his justification that the conflict should have actually ceased, or that there should be an interval sufficient to divide it into two substantially distinct transactions. It was impossible for the jury to acquit under these instructions, unless they concluded that there were two transactions instead of one.

In People v. Gonzales, 71 Cal. 577, 12 Pac.

783, it is said: "The tenth instruction does not enunciate a correct proposition of law where it declares that one 'cannot in any case justify killing another by a pretense of necessity, unless he was wholly without fault in bringing that necessity on himself'; for cases may, and frequently do, occur in which the aggressor, although primarily in fault, has really and in good faith sought to avoid further conflict before the mortal blow was given, and when this is apparent, and he slay his antagonist in the necessary defense of his own life, he is not guilty of any crime." See, also, People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 129, 3 Pac. 590; People v. Robertson, 67 Cal. 649, 8 Pac. 600; People v. Simons, 60 Cal. 72.

In the seventh instruction given at the request of the prosecution it was said: "That, in order to determine whether any such attempted withdrawal was in good faith, the jury are to take into consideration all the surrounding circumstances, the situation and relation of the parties; and the conduct of the party intending to thus withdraw must be unequivocal, and so marked in the matter of time, place, and circumstance as to clearly evince the withdrawal of the accused from the combat." It is argued by appellant that, the evidence on the part of the prosecution having tended to show that the homicide was justifiable, the burden of proof was not upon the defendant to prove his justification, and cites Pen. Code, § 1105. The court did not refer in this instruction to the question as to where the burden of proof rested. An instruction substantially in the language of that section had before been given without comment. This instruction said: "The conduct of the party must be unequivocal and clearly evince the withdrawal." The first part of the instruction is unobjectionable, but it may be questioned whether the latter part does not conflict with People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549, and other cases following that, down to People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 653, 33 Pac. 791. People v. Bushton, supra, overruled People v. Ah Duck, 61 Cal. 395, and People v. Ratten, 63 Cal. 422,—which held that the burden was upon the defendant to show by a preponderance of evidence circumstances of mitigation or justification. In People v. Bushton, supra, it was said of section 1105, Pen. Code: "This does not mean that he must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of evidence, but that the presumption that the killing was felonious arises from the mere proof by the prosecution of the homicide, and the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, etc., is thereby cast upon him. He is only bound, under this rule, to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged. * * * The well-settled rule that a defendant shall not be convicted unless the evidence proves his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt applies to the whole and every material part of the case, no matter whether it is as to the act of killing, or the reason for or manner of its commission. * * * The jury should have been instructed that the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justified or excused the killing, devolved upon the defendant, but that if, upon the whole case, they entertained a reasonable doubt from the evidence as to his guilt, he should be acquitted. Any other rule as to the weight of the evidence makes one measure applicable to one part of the case and a different one to another part, and leads to confusion." See, also, People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 305, 22 Pac. 207; People v. Lanagan, 81 Cal. 143, 22 Pac. 482; People v. Carroll, 92 Cal. 572, 28 Pac. 600; People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 653, 33 Pac. 791.

Appellant's contention that a new trial should have been granted because of the insufficiency of the evidence, and that the judgment should be reversed with a direction to the court below to discharge the defendant, need not be considered. There is no doubt of the power of the appellate court to decide, as matter of law, that a given state of facts does not show that an offense has been committed; but it is a power that should be cautiously exercised, inasmuch as even in an apparently clear case this court cannot know but that upon another trial additional evidence tending to show guilt may be obtained. Except in rare cases, the question whether the defendant should be discharged is properly left to the trial court unprejudiced by any expression of opinion by this court. For the other reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

PEOPLE v. DODGE. (No. 15,065.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 3, 1894.)

VOIDABLE JUDGMENT — MOTION TO SET ASIDE — TIME FOR MAKING — SUFFICIENCY OF SUMMONS — STATEMENT OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. The affidavit of a judgment defendant, made after 12 years, that he has no recollection of service, is insufficient, as against the sheriff's return of personal service, and the court's finding that "the defendant, having been regularly served with process as required by law," etc., to justify the vacation of the judgment.

2. The description of land in the summons as "the land described in the complaint" makes the description in the complaint a portion of the summons.

3. Where, under Code Civ. Proc. § 407, providing that the summons shall contain "(2) the cause and general nature of the action," a summons stated that "the said action is brought to annul a certain certificate of purchase, resulting from location No. 248, and to foreclose and bar defendant, and those claiming under him, of all right and interest in the land described in the complaint (filed in this action), and for such other relief as is consistent with equity," when the action was brought to foreclose the defendant's interest in certain land purchased by him of the state, and to annul the certificate of purchase issued therefor for delinquency in the payment of interest, the entry of judgment by default in said action was voidable, but not void.

4. Where a judgment is voidable, and not void on its face, the error can be corrected only by an appeal, or by motion within six months to set it aside.

5. After the expiration of six months from its rendition, a judgment can be set aside upon motion only where it is absolutely void upon its face for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California against W. W. Dodge to foreclose a certain interest and annul a certificate of purchase. From an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. D. Murray and Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellant. Buck & Wheeler, for the People.

SEARLS, C. This is an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate and set aside a default and judgment, and to permit defendant to plead to the complaint in the cause. The action was brought in the district court of Humboldt county, July 8, 1876, to foreclose the interest of the defendant in certain land purchased by him of the state, and to annul the certificate of purchase issued to him therefor, on the ground of delinquency in the payment of interest. A summons was issued July 10, 1876, which on March 24, 1877, was returned with a certificate of the sheriff of San Francisco, in due form, showing that, on the day last mentioned, he personally served said summons upon the defendant, W. W. Dodge, in the city and county of San Francisco, by delivering to said defendant a copy thereof, attached to a certified copy of the complaint in said action therein named. Defendant failed to answer the complaint, and in due time his default for want of an answer was duly entered; and on the 12th day of July, 1877, a decree was entered, foreclosing all his right, title, and interest in and to the land described in the complaint, and annulling the certificate of purchase, etc. On the 20th day of November, 1889, the defendant served and filed a notice of a motion to vacate the default and judgment, on the grounds: (1) That said judgment is void upon its face; (2) that no summons in said action was ever issued or served upon said defendant; and (3) that said district court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The motion was heard upon the judgment roll and upon an affidavit made by defendant, in which he denied all recollection of having been served with the summons, or that he knew or heard of the pendency of the case until 1889; that he had a meritorious defense upon the merits, etc.

The point that there was in fact no service of the summons and complaint upon defendant may be dismissed, with the remark that the affidavit of defendant, made after the lapse of more than 12 years, showing that he had no recollection of service, is entitled to but little weight as against the official return of the sheriff of personal service and the finding of the court showing that "the defendant, W. W. Dodge, having been regularly served with process as required by law," etc. It will therefore be taken as established here, as it was in the court below, that defendant was personally served with the summons and a certified copy of the complaint.

The leading point made by appellant relates to the sufficiency of the summons to support a default. The contention of his counsel is that the summons did not substantially comply with the material requirements of the statute and hence was inoperative to sustain a judgment by default. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, as it existed when this action was commenced, the summons was required to contain, among other things: "(2) The cause and general nature of the action." Code Civ. Proc. § 407. The clause of the summons to which objection is made is in the following language: "The said action is brought to annul a certain certificate of purchase, resulting from location No. 248, and to foreclose and bar defendant, and those claiming under him, of all right and interest in the land described in the complaint [filed in this action] and for such other relief as is consistent with equity, together with costs of suit." The clause quoted from section 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure has since been amended, and now reads as follows: "(2) A statement of the nature of the action in general terms." As will be observed, the main feature of the amendment was to eliminate the word "cause" from the sentence. The term "cause of action" is defined as "the right which a party has to institute and carry through a proceeding." And. Law Dict., citing, in support of the definition, Meyer v. Van Collem, 28 Barb. 231. Black defines it as "matter for which an action may be brought; the ground on which an action may be sustained; the right to bring a suit." In Calderwood v. Brooks, 28 Cal. 153, "the cause and general nature of the action" was stated thus: "And said action is brought to recover possession of certain land and premises, more particularly described in the complaint herein,"—and it was held sufficient. The court said: "The complaint is thus by reference made a part of the summons, and it affords a proper description of the premises. The summons and affidavit [of service of summons] were sufficient to authorize the entry of the default." In King v. Blood, 41 Cal. 314, a similar doctrine was enunciated; the court holding that by the summons and copy of the complaint, which was served with it, "the defendants were fully and particularly notified of the cause, general nature, and object of the action," etc. Lyman v. Milton, 44 Cal. 630, was a case in which there were several defendants, only one of whom was named in the summons. The court, in holding the summons insufficient, said: "The summons is the process by which parties defendant are brought into court, so as to give the court jurisdiction of their persons. Its form is prescribed by law, and, whatever the form may be, it must be observed, at least substantially." In Ward v. Ward, 59 Cal. 139, a like doctrine was held with that enunciated in Lyman v. Milton, supra. People v. Greene, 52 Cal. 577, was an action, like the present, to foreclose the interest of the defendant in certain land purchased from the state, and to annul his certificate of purchase on account of the nonpayment of interest. The summons issued in the case required the defendant to appear in an action "brought to obtain a decree of this court foreclosing the interest of defendant in certificate of purchase No. 1,393, of grants 16 and 36 sections and lieu lands in the county of Santa Barbara," etc. This court held the summons fatally defective in failing to state "the cause and general nature of the action," and reversed a judgment by default rendered in the case. In Bewick v. Muir, 83 Cal. 368, 23 Pac. 389, decided since the amendment to the Code, the opinion indicates that a very general statement of the nature of the action in the summons is sufficient. In Clark v. Palmer, 90 Cal. 504, 27 Pac. 375, the summons notified the defendant that, upon failure to answer, "plaintiff will take judgment against you for the relief demanded in his complaint"; it being a case in which it should have been stated that he would apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint. On appeal, this court held that under section 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that "its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice," the summons was sufficient. In Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 395, 7 Pac. 838, a like error in a summons was held voidable, but not void, and hence good as against a collateral attack. The summons in the present case attempted to state the cause and general nature of the action, but it must be admitted made a lame effort so to do. To say that an action is brought to annul a certificate of purchase resulting from a given location, and to foreclose and bar the defendant, etc., of all right and interest in the land described in the complaint in the case, affords some light as to the cause and nature of the action, and would have been sufficient to warrant the court below in permitting an amendment had it been asked. There is a wide difference between a want of jurisdiction and a defect in obtaining jurisdiction. "From the moment of the service of process, the court has such control over the litigants that all its subsequent proceedings, however erroneous, are not void. If there is any irregularity in the process, or in the manner of its service, the defendant must take advantage of such irregularity by some motion or proceeding in the court where the action is pending." Freem. Judgm. § 126; Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 396, 7 Pac. 838; Clark v. Palmer, 90 Cal. 504, 27 Pac. 375. That the description of the land by reference to the complaint had the effect to make that portion of the complaint a part of the summons, and obviated the necessity of repeating the description, is upheld in Calderwood v. Brooks, supra. The complaint stated a cause of action, and, in the absence of a special demurrer, cannot be successfully attacked.

From a review of the record and the authorities applicable, the following conclusions are reached: (1) The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, and, by the personal service of the summons, obtained jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. (2) Having such jurisdiction, the entry of judgment by default upon a summons regular in other respects than those indicated was voidable, but not void. (3) In all cases where a judgment is voidable, and not void, on its face, the error can only be corrected by an appeal, or by motion to set the same aside in the court where rendered, which motion must be made within six months after the rendition thereof, and, if denied, by an appeal from the order of denial. (4) After the expiration of six months from its rendition, a judgment can only be set aside upon motion in cases where it is upon its face absolutely void for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter or of the person of the defendant. (5) In the present instance, a period of 12 years having elapsed between the entry of judgment and the motion to set the same aside, the court below did not err in refusing said motion. It follows that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

MILLETT et al. v. LAGOMARSINO et al.¹

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1894.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—NOTICE—SUIT TO QUIET
TITLE—RES JUDICATA.

1. In 1873 plaintiffs' grantor entered into possession of a number of lots, including the one in controversy, under a three-years lease, and retained possession of them till 1892. In 1882 he received a deed to the lot in question from a tax-sale purchaser thereof, which was duly recorded, but he performed no act to change the character of his possession, and gave no notice that it was hostile. Before 1882 the lot was used by him as a cow pasture, in subordination to the owner's title. Held, that such possession did not constitute notice to the owner of said lot of the adverse character thereof.

2. A judgment rendered in an action for an unlawful entry of certain lands has no effect upon a subsequent action between the same parties to quiet title to said lands.

3. It is not necessary for plaintiff in an action to quiet title to certain lands to allege the source of such title, although his title was acquired by adverse possession.

4. The record of a deed from the owner of the tax title to one already in possession under permission of the owner does not affect the owner with notice that the possession of the grantee thereafter is adverse to his title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court; San Mateo county; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Martin M. Millett and others against Thomas Lagomarsino and others to quiet title to certain land. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Nowlin & Fassett, for appellants. Nagle & Nagle, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to quiet title to lot 2 in block 22 of the "City Extension Homestead Association," at some place not named either in the pleadings or judgment otherwise than that it is in the county of San Mateo. The complaint is in the usual form, alleging that plaintiffs are the owners in fee, and entitled to the possession. The answer denies the ownership and title of the plaintiffs, and alleges title in John B. Cronan, one of the defendants, and that Lagomarsino is in possession under a contract of purchase upon which partial payments had been made, and that he had erected a dwelling house thereon. The court made the general finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and the allegations of the answer untrue, and entered a decree quieting plaintiffs' title, and awarding them possession. The defendants appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The lot in question is 100 feet square, and is one of many lots comprising together about 10 acres, which, with other lands, were subdivided by said association (a corporation) prior to 1873. Plaintiffs claim title by adverse possession, and whether they have such title is the ultimate question. In November, 1873, Michael Millett, the grantor of plaintiffs, entered into possession of the ten acres above mentioned, under a lease for three years, executed by McNear and nine others, owners of lots, McNear being then president of the association. The whole ten acres were inclosed by a fence, none of the lots therein being separately fenced. The lot in question was sold and conveyed by the association in 1870 to John Tenney, under whom defendants claim, but Tenney did not sign the lease. Defendants claim that the possession so taken by Millett of the whole parcel was continued from that time until he conveyed to the plaintiffs in March, 1892. Tenney conveyed the lot in question to defendant Cronan in August, 1889, and Lagomarsino entered under him in the latter part of 1890, or early part of 1891, and built a house thereon; and Michael Millett conveyed by quitclaim to the plaintiffs March 14, 1892. On July 24, 1882, Jason Wight executed and delivered to Michael Millett a quitclaim deed of said lot, Wight claiming to have purchased it at a sale for delinquent taxes in February, 1878. The only evidence that a tax deed was ever issued to him was the assessment roll, showing the lot assessed to John Tierney (not Tenney), and the tax-sale book, in which was a memorandum that "deed issued March 6, 1879." That deed was not produced, and was not recorded, and Wight testified that he did not remember about the deed. Plaintiffs, however, do not claim that Wight's deed conveyed a title, but that the deed constituted color of title under which Millett held adverse possession. That Millett obtained possession of the lot in question under the lease as tenant of the whole parcel is clear from his own testimony, and that he was never out of possession until he conveyed to the plaintiffs is also clear. That the lease was void as to this lot makes no difference. "He who enters under a void lease is estopped equally with him who holds under a valid instrument." Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 393, 7 Pac. 804.

Appellants contend that Millett, having entered under a lease, or by permission of the owner, cannot initiate an adverse possession without first surrendering possession; and cite Tewksbury v. Magraff, 33 Cal. 244; Hussman v. Wilke, 50 Cal. 250; and Standley v. Stephens, 66 Cal. 541, 6 Pac. 420. In reply respondents contend that the lease expired in November, 1876, and that after five years from the expiration of the lease the presumption declared by section 326, Code Civ. Proc., that the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord, ceases, and that Millett had the right then to commence an adverse possession without first surrendering possession. The five years succeeding the termination of the lease ended in November, 1881, but Millett testified that he did not commence to hold adversely until he obtained the deed from Wight, in July, 1882. His possession prior to July, 1882, could not have affected the owner with notice of that which did not exist, viz. an adverse holding; and therefore it must appear that at or after that time Tenney had such notice of an adverse holding as would set the statute in motion. Respondents assert that the record of the deed from Wight was notice of the adverse claim. But it does not appear that Tenney had any knowledge that such deed was in existence, or had been recorded, and its record was not constructive notice to him. Section 1213 of the Civil Code is as follows: "Every conveyance of real property, * * * from the time it is filed with the recorder for record, is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees." The owner is neither a subsequent purchaser nor mortgagee, and is not only not within the above Code provision, but is under no obligation or duty to watch the records for conveyances made by a stranger to the title.

The question, then, is whether the possession was of such character as to be notice to the owner that it was adverse. At some time, not definitely fixed, probably in 1883 or 1884, the ten acres seem to have been divided, and thereafter Millett remained in possession of one part, containing about five acres, including said lot No. 2. The principal use of the inclosed parcel, both before and after the division, was for a cow pasture, though it was sometimes cultivated. None of the lots were separately marked off, inclosed, or improved. No one lived upon any part of it. No change in the character of the possession or the use of the property took place. Millett owned some of the lots inclosed, De Forest owned at least one lot, and there were several streets within the five-acre inclosure. The plat of the subdivision with the lots, blocks, and streets had been duly recorded in 1870, prior to Tenney's purchase of the lot in question. The De Forest lot was not at any time claimed or held adversely, nor were the streets, so far as the record shows. No apparent distinction was made between the possession of the lot in question and that of the De Forest lot and the streets. If any distinction was made, it was a mental distinction, not communicated to Tenney. For nine years before receiving the quitclaim deed from Wight, Millett had been in possession of a large number of lots, owned by many different persons, holding in subordination to their title; and, without something to mark a change in the character of his possession, the possession itself could not be reasonably held to be notice that it was in fact hostile, and the possession must be hostile, or it cannot be adverse; and where its adverse character cannot be inferred from the fact of possession, notice of some kind that it is hostile must be given to the owner before the statute will begin to run against him. De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 662, 663, 30 Pac. 1. In Mauldin v. Cox, 67 Cal. 387, 7 Pac. 804, the defendants went into possession under a lease, and afterwards received a deed, and more than five years had elapsed after receipt of the deed before the action was commenced. At page 394, 67 Cal., and page 804, 7 Pac., the court said: "They [the defendants] had, it is true, a secret conveyance of the property, but having been in possession under the lease, the plaintiff, having no notice of the deed, was not bound thereby. An entry to set the statute of limitations in motion must be sufficiently open and notorious to give the owner notice of the hostile claim and possession begun thereunder, and it must be hostile. * * * The owner will not be condemned to lose his land because he has failed to sue for its recovery, when he had no notice that it was held or claimed adversely."

The judgment offered in evidence by the defendants was properly excluded. The answer sufficiently shows that the judgment was given against Martin Millett and wife (plaintiffs in this action) in proceedings against them for a forcible or unlawful entry upon the possession of Lagomarsino. Such action does not involve title, and the judgment could have no effect upon this action.

Defendants offered to prove that in a conveyance executed by Michael Millett to defendant Cronan it was intended to include the lot in question, and that it was omitted by inadvertence or mistake. No issue of that kind was made in the pleadings. If the facts were as claimed, it would have been a proper case for a bill in equity to reform the deed.

Under the repeated rulings of this court the general findings made in this case were sufficient. It is not necessary, as appellants contend, for the plaintiff, in actions to quiet title, to allege the source of his title; and this rule of pleading applies where his title is acquired by adverse possession. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1894.)

FORGERY—EVIDENCE—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. In a prosecution for forgery, evidence of similar forgeries nine months after the one charged is not admissible.

2. Where, in a prosecution for forgery, defendant's direct examination is confined entirely to the document which he is charged with forging, it is error to permit him, against objection, to be cross-examined concerning a similar document, also claimed to have been forged.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

W. F. Baird was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Reversed.

Harris & Vickrey, Goucher, Jacobs & Jones, Seth Mann, W. D. Hatton, R. B. Jerry, and L. L. Cory, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, W. D. Tupper, Dist. Atty., and Frank H. Short, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant, Baird, and one John Brown, were jointly indicted for the crime of forgery, and the appellant, who was tried separately, was found guilty. He appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

There are only two points made by appellant which need to be noticed: First, that the court erred in admitting evidence of alleged forgeries by appellant other than the one charged in the indictment; and, second, that the court erred in allowing certain questions on the cross-examination of appellant when on the stand as a witness for himself.

1. It is charged in the indictment that appellant and said Brown did falsely, feloniously, etc., make, forge, utter, and pass a certain certificate of shares of stock of the Bank of Madera, a copy of said certificate being set forth in the indictment. It was introduced in evidence as Exhibit 1; and it appeared from the evidence of the prosecution that the said certificate was uttered and passed on the 8th day of October, 1890. The prosecution were permitted, over the objections and exceptions of appellant, to introduce three other documents marked Exhibits 3, 4, and 5,—two of which were certificates of stock, and the other a promissory note,—and to introduce evidence tending to show that they were also forged, and that they had been feloniously uttered and passed by appellant. But these latter instruments were not uttered until the latter part of June, 1891,—about nine months after the alleged commission of the crime charged in the complaint. Exhibits 3, 4, and 5 bore dates considerably more than a year subsequent to the date of Exhibit 1. We think that the court erred in allowing these exhibits in evidence. They were too remote,—too long subsequent to the time of the act charged in the complaint. This is a dangerous kind of evidence at best. It is an exception to the well-established rule that evidence of other crimes cannot be introduced to help along a conviction of the crime charged; and it should not be carried any further than courts have already carried it. No case has been cited which would justify the contention of respondent on this subject in the case at bar.

2. Appellant went on the stand as a witness for himself. His testimony was confined entirely to Exhibit 1, the certificate which he was charged with forging. On cross-examination he was asked by counsel for the people about said Exhibit 3. Objection was made by appellant's counsel on the ground that it was not cross-examination as to a matter about which appellant was examined in chief. The objection was overruled, and appellant excepted. This was error. People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 602, 6 Pac. 695; People v. Bishop, 81 Cal. 113, 22 Pac. 477; People v. Wong Ah Leong, 99 Cal. 440, 34 Pac. 105; People v. Crowley, 100 Cal. 478, 35 Pac. 84.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

COOPER v. MONTEREY COUNTY. (No. 15,539.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1894.)

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Maria G. E. V. Cooper against the county of Monterey. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. F. Geil, for appellant. P. E. Zabala and W. A. Kearney, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action involves the same questions of fact and law as were involved in the case of Cooper v. Monterey Co. (No. 15,538, this day decided) 38 Pac. 106, was tried at the same time, and upon the same evidence. Upon the authority of that case the order and judgment in this are reversed, and a new trial granted.

GATES v. LINDLEY et al. (No. 15,578.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1894.)

TAX DEED—TITLE ACQUIRED.

Plaintiff's deed contained a reservation to defendant's predecessors in title of all timber on a certain described tract. The timber was taxed as part of the land, and the whole property was sold for taxes, and plaintiff bought the tax title from the purchaser at the tax sale. Held, that plaintiff did not acquire title to the timber by such purchase.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by M. L. Gates, by his guardian, against Mary Lindley and one Philips, to recover stumpage for timber sold to defendant Philips. Plaintiff had judgment for part of the claim, and appeals. Affirmed.

Ford & Burnell, for appellant. J. G. H. Weaver, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought against defendant Philips to recover stumpage for shingle timber sold to Philips. Defendant Mary Lindley intervened, claiming stumpage for the timber taken off a portion of the land. Philips admitted the contract with plaintiff, and that there was due somebody $428.08, that he owed the plaintiff of this sum $333.44, and that the timber taken off the portion claimed by Mary Lindley amounted to $94.64, and that he was ready to pay the whole to whosoever the court found was entitled thereto. The cause was submitted to the court upon agreed findings covering all the facts, from which the court drew the conclusion of law that plaintiff was entitled to recover $333.44, and Mary Lindley $94.64, and entered judgment accordingly, from which the plaintiff appeals.

One Osborne filed his application to purchase this land from the state in 1858. He conveyed by quitclaim deed and assignment of his certificate to Whitmore and Dix, and in June, 1867, they in like manner conveyed to Elihu Lindley, then the husband of the intervenor. In 1872, Lindley in like manner conveyed to Thorp, reserving in the deed, however, all the timber on a certain portion of the land particularly described therein. On January 27, 1873, Thorp's grantee conveyed to the plaintiff, and assigned the state certificate, the deed containing the same reservation expressed in Lindley's deed to Thorp; and on October 2, 1873, the state patented the lands to plaintiff. Mary Lindley is the widow of said Elihu Lindley, and to whom he gave all his property by will. On September 20, 1873, O. J. Gates and wife executed and delivered to J. B. Hamilton a grant deed to said lands, with the same reservation, and on September 24, 1878, Hamilton conveyed to Whitlow. From the year 1873 to and including the fiscal year ending June 1, 1879, the property was assessed to Hamilton, who paid all said taxes except for the year last mentioned. On March 3, 1879, the tax collector sold the whole of the property to J. O. Dinsmore, and on April 5, 1888, Dinsmore received a tax deed. No reservation of the timber was made either in the deed or certificate of sale. In January, 1879, prior to said tax sale, Whitlow mortgaged part of the property to Dinsmore, which mortgage has never been foreclosed or satisfied of record. For the years 1879-80, 1880-81, and 1881 the land was assessed to Whitlow. On February 8, 1889, Dinsmore conveyed to the plaintiff. Whitlow has never conveyed to any one. From 1881 to 1889, inclusive, the property was assessed to Dinsmore, and all the taxes were paid by him. Since that time it has been assessed to plaintiff, who has paid the taxes, but it was never assessed to him prior to that time. The timber has never been separately assessed, nor did Mary Lindley or her testator ever pay any taxes thereon. From April, 1881, to the time he conveyed to the plaintiff, Dinsmore was in possession. All the deeds herein mentioned were recorded. The record does not disclose that Gates and wife, who conveyed to Hamilton, ever had any title; and as the taxes for which the land was sold to Dinsmore were assessed to Hamilton, who did not acquire any title by the conveyance, and who does not appear to have been in possession, the court below concluded that plaintiff was not divested of his title by the tax sale, and, being a minor, that Dinsmore, the purchaser at tax sale, did not acquire title by adverse possession. Code Civ. Proc. § 328.

It is certainly not clear from the findings that the tax title was valid, nor do we think it necessary to decide that it was void; for if the plaintiff, by the purchase of the tax title, acquired a title to the timber reserved by his grantor, the burden is upon him to show that his title to the timber is good; in other words, that the tax title is valid. But even that is not sufficient. The plaintiff was the owner of the land, and it was his duty to pay the taxes. "He could not, by neglecting to pay them, and permitting the land to be sold in consequence of such neglect, add to or strengthen his title by purchasing at the tax sale himself, or by subsequently buying the tax title from a stranger who purchased at the tax sale; otherwise he would be allowed to gain an advantage from his own fraud or negligence in failing to pay the taxes. This the law does not permit, either directly or indirectly." Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 45; Christy v. Fisher, 58 Cal. 258; Bernard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 518, 16 Pac. 307. Plaintiff did not, therefore, acquire a new title to the land by the purchase from Dinsmore. "His purchase is deemed one mode of paying the taxes." Christy v. Fisher, supra. Plaintiff's title is therefore the same as though he had each year paid the taxes, and he holds the same under his deed, in which the timber was reserved. If it be said that the timber did not belong to the plaintiff, and that he was under no duty or obligation to pay the taxes thereon, it may be replied that he could not permit it to be taxed as part of his property, and then permit his land upon which it grew to be sold for the entire tax, and thus get title to it; for, unless he got a new title to the land, the reservation of the timber in his deed was in full force, and he is in the same position as though he had paid the taxes each year. The judgment was right, and should be affirmed.

BELSER v. HOFFSCHNEIDER. (No. 15,657.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 1, 1894.)
ASSESSMENT FOR STREET WORK—APPEAL TO CITY COUNCIL—VACATION OF ASSESSMENT—EFFECT.

1. Under Act March 18, 1885, § 11, providing for appeals by property owners from assessments by the superintendent of streets to the city council by "briefly" stating their objections in writing and filing the same with the clerk of the council, a paper merely stating as the ground of objection that "the work is not done in a proper manner" is sufficient, without stating in what way the work fails to conform to the contract.

2. It is not necessary in such paper to specifically state that the signers "appeal," as the only object in filing such paper is that it may operate as an appeal.

3. In an action to foreclose a special assessment lien, an order of the city council setting aside the assessment cannot be reviewed on the ground that such relief was not based on the objection made to the assessment.

4. The action of the city council on appeal from an assessment by the superintendent of streets being judicial, they cannot at a subsequent meeting vacate a final order setting aside such assessment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by J. H. Belser against William Hoffschneider. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Haven & Haven, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to foreclose a lien for a street assessment upon a district made by the city council of Oakland, and declared to be benefited by the street work. The work consisted in the construction of certain sewers, which apparently were to constitute a sewerage system for the district defined. The court found that the contract for the work was duly let, entered into, and the work performed by the contractor according to the contract, and was approved and accepted by the street superintendent; that a diagram was made and approved as required, and that after the completion of the work the superintendent of streets made and issued an assessment, by which defendant's lot was assessed at $83.11; that a warrant was issued, and a demand made, etc. It was also found as follows: "(4) Within thirty days after the date of the warrant issued by the superintendent of streets of the city of Oakland to the plaintiff, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, certain owners of property affected by the work described in plaintiff's complaint, and who were interested, and who had and made objections to the correctness and legality of the assessment made by said superintendent of streets, made their appeal to the city council of the city of Oakland, by briefly stating their objections, in writing, to the correctness and legality of the said assessment and the proceedings of the said superintendent of streets, and filed the same within the said period of thirty days with the clerk of said city council. Thereupon, notice was given by said clerk of the time and place of the hearing of said written objections, by publication for five days. At the time and place so appointed for the hearing of said written objections, the said city council of the city of Oakland proceeded to hear and consider the sufficiency and correctness of said objections and appeal; the said persons so making their appeal being present and represented thereat by counsel, and the plaintiff being represented thereat by counsel. And after such hearing the said city council unanimously passed the following resolution: 'Resolved, that the assessment made and issued for sewer in Commerce street, from 14th street to 32d street, be vacated and set aside, and the superintendent of streets be and he is hereby authorized to make and issue a new assessment, diagram, and warrant, according to law.' Thereafter, and at a subsequent meeting, and without notice to the protestants or appellants, or any of them, the said city council voted to reconsider this resolution, and to confirm and ratify the said assessment. This action was based upon the said assessment. (5) In the said assessment for said sewer, as made by the said superintendent of streets, the total cost of the entire work was assessed upon subdistricts, and the said assessment was apportioned in each subdivision by an uniform rate per square foot on all the land therein, and not separately upon the respective parcels or lots of land."

The bill of exceptions shows that on the 15th of June, 1891, the city council adopted the following resolution: "Resolution No. 16,187. Resolved, that each and all appeals and protests on Commerce street sewer assessment be overruled, and that the order of June 1, 1891, setting aside the assessment, and ordering a new assessment, be and the same is set aside, and that said assessment be and the same is confirmed."

As conclusions of law the court found: "(1) That the papers filed by the property owners with the clerk of the city council of Oakland within thirty (30) days from date of assessment and warrant were sufficient in form to constitute an appeal to the city council from said assessment. (2) That said city council had jurisdiction to make and pass the order of June 1, 1891, vacating the assessment set forth in the complaint. (3) That said city council, after June 1, 1891, lost jurisdiction to make or pass any further order or resolution in said matter, and that the order or resolution passed by said city council at its next meeting was without jurisdiction, and was void. (4) That the assessment sued on in this action, having been set aside June 1, 1891, became null and void from that date. (5) That plaintiff is not entitled to take anything by reason of the matters alleged in the complaint herein, and that defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiff for his costs. Let judgment be entered accordingly."

The points raised on this appeal are: First. That no valid appeal was taken from the assessment, and therefore the city council had no jurisdiction to make the order of June 1, 1891, by which the assessment was set aside and a new one ordered. The order, being void, was therefore properly vacated by the resolution of June 15th. Second. If the appeal was effectual, the city council, in reviewing the assessment, were acting in a legislative capacity, and could and did reverse its action at a subsequent meeting of the council. Both questions arise under section 11 of the act of March 18, 1885. St. 1885, p. 147. It provides that the owners and persons interested, "feeling aggrieved by any act or determination of the superintendent of streets in relation thereto, or who claim that the work has not been performed according to the contract in a good and substantial manner, or having or making any objection to the correctness or legality of the assessment or other act, determination or proceeding of the superintendent of streets, shall, within thirty days after the date of the warrant, appeal to the city council, as provided in this section, by briefly stating their objections in writing and filing the same with the clerk of said city council."

1. After the warrant was issued, nine different documents were filed with the clerk of the city council, signed in the aggregate by about thirty different persons, objecting to the assessment. There was no conceivable purpose in filing those objections, unless they were intended to operate as an appeal under section 11. Unless they effected an appeal, the council could not consider the matter at all. It matters not, then, that the "protestants," as appellant calls them, did not say in their protests that they thereby appealed from the assessment. Appellant contends that no objection is stated which the city council had jurisdiction to hear and determine. It will be at once admitted that some objections must be briefly stated, at least in general language, which the city council was authorized to consider under the provisions of law above quoted. I think such objection is stated, at least in two of the protests. In the document signed by White and others it is stated that "the work is not being done in a first-class manner, and we ask your honorable body to investigate the matter before we are assessed for its costs. In fact, we hereby protest against paying for so poor a job." In another, signed by J. J. North and 15 others, it is said: "The work is not being done in a proper manner, and we ask your honorable body to investigate the matter before we are assessed for its costs, and we hereby protest against paying for so poor a job."

Barber v. Supervisors, 42 Cal. 630, was a proceeding to review the action of the board upon an appeal from an assessment for grading a street. It was claimed that the board had no jurisdiction because of the insufficiency of the statement of the objections. The appeal was on the ground that the appellants had graded the street in front of their lots themselves. To make this fact available as a defense on the part of property holders, the law required them to procure a certificate from the city and county surveyor. The statement of the objectors did not show that the objectors had such certificate. In other words, they failed to show that they had any right to raise such objection. The court said: "All that the statute requires is that the objection be 'briefly' stated in writing. In other words, the nature of the objection may be stated in general terms, without specifying minutely all the particulars." One of the grounds upon which parties interested may appeal is that the work has not been performed according to the contract, in a good and substantial manner. If the appellants were not required to specify wherein the work failed to conform to the contract, as seems to have been held in the case cited, the statement was ample.

The council having jurisdiction, we cannot here review their action on the claim that the relief granted was not based upon the objection made. The court found a fact which would tend to show that the assessment was illegal, and not that the work was badly done. This does not show upon what ground the city council granted relief, and the fact so found is utterly immaterial.

2. The next question is whether the city council, having entertained the appeal and vacated the assessment, could, on a subsequent day, set aside their order and overrule the objections, and confirm the assessment they had previously vacated. Under the decisions of this court the action of the city council in the matter of the appeal was clearly judicial. People v. El Dorado Co., 8 Cal. 58; Waugh v. Chauncey, 13 Cal. 11; People v. Supervisors Marin Co., 10 Cal. 344; Robinson v. Supervisors, 16 Cal. 209; Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 85; Keys v. Supervisors, 42 Cal. 252; Levee Dist. No. 9 v. Farmer, 101 Cal. 178, 35 Pac. 569. It is not contended that in providing for a system of sewers for the district, or in letting the contract, or in providing for such supervision as will insure proper performance, the council acted judicially. These were administrative acts. There was nothing of this kind in the question submitted to the council on the appeals provided for in this act. The council is, by the section quoted, made a special tribunal to determine the conflicting claims of individuals. They were not there as such tribunal to legislate, or even to use their judgment to promote public interests in the management of public affairs. They could not change the contract or the assessment district. They could simply determine the rights of the parties upon the facts. This is purely judicial. The act being judicial, it would necessarily follow that the final judgment entered by the council could not be vacated. The procedure does not provide for granting a new trial or a rehearing. Dorsey v. Barry, 24 Cal. 449. The general rule is that where special jurisdiction is conferred upon a court or board to determine certain specified controversies, and no provision is made for a review by such tribunal of its judgments, when it has once determined the matter its jurisdiction is exhausted. While the matter is still sub judice, no doubt the tribunal may reconsider its action, but when final judgment has been entered the board is functus officio. This matter is exhaustively considered, and the authorities upon the subject cited, in People v. Supervisors Schenectady Co., 35 Barb. 408.

It is unnecessary to pursue the matter further here, for the learned counsel for appellant does not contend that the council had power to make the second order if in making it the council acted judicially. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

INGRAM v. COLGAN, Controller.¹ (No. 18,372.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1894.)

BOUNTIES—KILLING COYOTES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Act March 31, 1891, providing that any person who shall kill any coyote in any county in the state shall be paid a bounty of five dollars out of the general fund of the state treasury, and for taking the proof thereof and issuing a certificate therefor by the county supervisors, and that "such certificate may be presented to the controller of the state, who may draw his warrant on the general fund in the state treasury," does not abrogate the necessity of presenting the claim for audit before the state board of examiners, as required by Pol. Code, § 660, nor section 672, forbidding the controller to draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by such board.

2. There being a consideration for such bounty, the statute is not inhibited by Const. art. 4, § 31, which provides that the legislature shall have no power to give, or to authorize the making of any gift of, public money to any individual.

3. Such statute is within the police powers of the state.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. Catlin, Judge.

Application by J. W. Ingram for a writ of mandamus compelling E. P. Colgan, as state controller, to pay a bounty to petitioner for killing coyotes. The writ was granted, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. Freeman & Bates, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. The act of the legislature of the state of California, approved March 31, 1891, entitled "An act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps" (St. 1891, p. 280), provides in its first section that "any person who shall kill and destroy any coyote or coyotes, in any county of this state, after the passage of this act, shall be paid a bounty of five dollars out of the general fund in the state treasury for each coyote so destroyed." The second section of the act provides that the person killing any coyote, as provided in section 1, shall present the scalp containing the nose and ears of the coyote destroyed to any officer authorized to administer oaths, and make and subscribe to an affidavit showing time and place that such animal was killed, which scalp and affidavit may be deposited with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county in which such coyote was killed. Section 3 provides that the board of supervisors shall quarterly determine the number of scalps deposited with the clerk, and by whom, and shall give to each person who may have deposited scalps a certificate certified by the clerk, showing the number of scalps deposited by such person, and the sum due him at the rate of five dollars per scalp, and then proceeds as follows: "Such certificate may be presented to the controller of the state, who may draw his warrant on the general fund in the state treasury for the sum named therein, in favor of the person entitled thereto." The remaining sections provide for the destruction of the scalps, and that no bounty shall be paid for scalps unless presented within three months after the coyote is killed. The respondent, J. W. Ingram, in 1893, killed 73 coyotes in the county of Kern, state of California, in due time presented the scalps, and made affidavit as by law provided, and in due and proper form received, after an examination, etc., a certificate of the clerk, under seal of the board, showing that he had killed 73 coyotes, and that there was due said Ingram the sum of $365 from the state of California. The certificate was presented to appellant as controller of state April 26, 1894, and a demand made that he, the said controller, draw his warrant on the general fund in the state treasury in favor of said J. W. Ingram for said sum of $365, which was refused. Respondent thereupon filed an affidavit in the superior court in and for the county of Sacramento, setting out the foregoing facts, and showing a compliance with the terms of the statute, and averring that "after allowing and paying all warrants drawn by the state controller against the general fund, and all claims allowed by the state board of examiners for the forty-fifth fiscal year, there remains more than sufficient in said fund to meet the said warrant demanded by the said Ingram." The sworn affidavit or petition admitted "that said claim of said Ingram has never been presented to nor acted upon by the state board of examiners." An alternative writ of mandate issued to appellant, as per the prayer of the sworn petition therefor. Appellant appeared, and demurred to the affidavit and petition upon various grounds, among which were that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that it fails to show that the claim was presented to the board of examiners before being presented to the state controller; (3) it does not show that said claim is exempt from the provisions of section 672, Pol. Code; (4) it fails to show that there is an appropriation or available fund for the payment of the claim; (5) that said act is unconstitutional and void, in that it seeks to create an obligation on the part of the state which would be a gift, and without sufficient consideration. The demurrer was overruled, and, appellant refusing to answer, such proceedings were thereupon had that a peremptory writ issued to appellant, commanding him to draw his warrant upon the treasury, etc. Defendant appeals.

The statute in question comes within the purview of the police power of the state. This power is said to extend to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the state. It is a power inherent in the state by virtue of, and one of the attributes of, its sovereignty. Under the exercise of this general police power, persons and property are subjected to restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the state, of the perfect right in the legislature to do which, as was said by Redfield, C. J., in Thorpe v. Railroad Co., 27 Vt. 140, "no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned." It is coextensive with self-protection, and is often referred to as "the law of overruling necessity." It is that inherent and plenary power in the state which enables it to prohibit all things hurtful to the comfort and welfare of society. Lake View v. Cemetery Co., 70 Ill. 192. How far the provisions of the legislature can extend is always submitted (subject to constitutional limitations) to its discretion, provided its acts do not go beyond the great principle of securing the public safety; and its duty to provide for the public safety, within well-defined limits and with discretion, is imperative. "All laws for the protection of lives, limbs, health, and quiet of the person, and for the security of all property within the state, fall within this general power of government." State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189. "Any law which goes beyond that principle, which undertakes to abolish rights, the exercise of which does not involve an infringement of the rights of others, or to limit the exercise of rights beyond what is necessary to provide for the public welfare and the general security, cannot be included in the police power of the government. It is a government usurpation, and violates the principles of abstract justice, as they have been developed under our republican institutions." Tied. Lim. pp. 4, 5. The statute of March 31, 1891, is not within the limitation to the exercise of the police power. That coyotes are a pest and scourge to the breeders of sheep and other small domestic animals is matter of common knowledge. To provide adequate means of defense against this common enemy to those engaged in an important industrial pursuit is clearly within the general police powers of the legislative branch of the government, through which all police power is exercised. The statute is not then void in the sense that it violates the fundamental principles of free government, and infringes upon the original rights of the citizen. This remark is indulged for the reason that it has been said by some of the most eminent jurists of our country that the state legislature, in the absence of constitutional limitations, is not so far omnipotent that it can pass valid laws violative of the fundamental theories upon which enlightened government is constructed. Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. 657; Taylor v. Porter, 4 Hill, 145; Goshen v. Stonington, 4 Conn. 209; Varick v. Smith, 5 Paige, 137; Griffith v. Com'rs, 20 Ohio, 609; Ross' Case, 2 Pick. 169.

There is no suggestion that the statute infringes the federal constitution. It remains then to inquire, does it violate any provision of the constitution of this state? The contention of appellant is that the bounty provided to be paid by the statute is a gift, and inhibited by the thirty-first section of article 4 of the constitution of California, which, so far as applicable, is as follows: "The legislature shall have no power to give or to lend. * * * Nor shall it have power to make any gift or authorize the making any gift of any public money or thing of value to any individual, municipal or other corporation whatever." A "gift" has been judicially defined as "a voluntary transfer of his property by one to another, without any consideration or compensation therefor." Gray v. Barton, 55 N. Y. 72. To the same effect is 2 Bl. Comm. 440; 2 Steph. Comm. 102; 2 Kent, Comm. 437. A "bounty" signifies moneys paid or a premium offered to encourage or promote an object, or procure a particular act or thing to be done. Fowler v. Danvers, 8 Allen, 84. A sum of money or other things given, generally by the government, to certain persons, for some service they have done or are about to do to the public. Abbe v. Allen, 39 How. Pr. 484. The terms "bounty" and "reward" are nearly allied in meaning, the distinction being the former is said to be the appropriate term where the services or action of many persons are desired, and each who acts upon the offer may entitle himself to the promised gratuity without prejudice from or to the claims of others, while a reward applies to the case of a single service, which can be only once performed, and therefore will be earned only by the person or co-operating persons who succeed while others fail. Black, Law Dict. tit. "Bounty." A primary meaning of "bounty" is goodness, kindness, virtue, worth; (2) liberality in bestowing gifts or favors, gracious or liberal giving, generosity, munificence; (3) a premium offered or given to induce men to enlist in the public service, or to encourage any branch of industry, as husbandry or manufactures. Webster. As applied to bounties given by statute, there is a consideration implied; so long as the consideration is not rendered, it remains a mere offer or privilege, which may be taken away by a repeal of the statute; but when earned, by complying with the conditions of the statute, the right to the bounty becomes vested. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) pp. 471, 472; East Saginaw Manuf'g Co. v. East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 259, 13 Wall. 373; People v. Board of State Auditors, 9 Mich. 327. There being a consideration for the claim of respondent, rendered by him under the offer of the statute, the money claimed is not a gift, and is not, therefore, obnoxious to the provision of the constitution quoted supra. Ryer v. Stockwell, 14 Cal. 134. Our attention is not called to any other constitutional provision, either state or federal, with which the statute in question is claimed to conflict; hence, we conclude that as the statute comes within the general welfare, for which the legislature is authorized to provide under its police powers, and not being violative of the fundamental law, it must be upheld as a valid and subsisting law.

Should the claim have been presented to the state board of examiners? The trial court evidently proceeded upon the theory that, as the act of March 31, 1891, provided that any person who shall kill and destroy any coyote or coyotes in any county of the state shall be paid a bounty of five dollars for each coyote so killed, out of the general fund of the state treasury, and provided for taking the proof thereof and issuing a certificate therefor by the board of supervisors of the proper county, and provided that "such certificate may be presented to the controller of state, who may draw his warrant on the general fund in the state treasury," etc., it dispensed with the necessity of a presentation of the claim to the state board of examiners. Section 660 of the Political Code provides that any person having a claim against the state, for which an appropriation has been made, may present the same to the board (of examiners); if the board approves the same, they must, under section 661, indorse their approval thereon, and transmit the same to the controller, who must thereupon draw his warrant, etc. If no appropriation has been made for the payment of a claim provided for by law, or if an appropriation made has been exhausted, the board must, upon approving it, transmit it to the legislature, with a statement of their approval. Section 672 is as follows: "The controller must not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the board, and, when hereafter the controller is directed to draw his warrant for any purpose, this direction must be construed as subject to the provisions of this section, unless the direction is accompanied by a special provision exempting it from its operation." Section 673 exempts official salaries and claims upon the contingent fund of either house of the legislature from the operation of the foregoing sections. It will be perceived that by section 672 a direction to the controller to draw his warrant in payment of a claim which has not been approved by the board of examiners is not sufficient, unless it is accompanied by a special provision exempting it from the operation of that chapter. We find nothing in the provision of the statute in question exempting the claims therein provided for from the section.

Respondent contends that there was no necessity for presenting the claim to the board of examiners; that it had been audited and made certain by the action of the board of supervisors, so that no duty remained, except to make payment; and in support of this view we are referred to Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 Pac. 884; Freehill v. Chamberlain,

65 Cal. 603, 4 Pac. 646; County of Greene v. Daniel, 102 U. S. 187; Lincoln Co. v. Luning, 133 U. S. 532, 10 Sup. Ct. 363. Meyer v. Porter was a case in which a mandate was sought against the treasurer of Sacramento to compel him to pay out of funds in the city treasury certain past-due and payable coupons belonging to bonds issued by the city under a statute passed in 1858, and which provided an interest and sinking fund for the payment of the interest annually, and the bonds at maturity. It was claimed on behalf of the city, among other things, that the coupons should have been presented for examination, audit, and allowance to the board of trustees and auditor, pursuant to a statute in 1863. This court held, however, that, as the law under which the bonds issued made it the duty of the treasurer to pay the coupons in the manner and out of the fund provided for that purpose, no warrant was necessary to authorize their payment. In Freehill v. Chamberlain the same question was raised, and the court held that the statute under which the bonds were issued established them as debts to be paid, and hence that neither the auditor nor the board of trustees had any discretion or authority to reject them, or prevent payment. It will be observed that these cases involved contracts entered into by the city under and pursuant to a statute authorizing them so to do, and providing the time, place, and manner of payment, and that the act of 1863 (St. 1863, p. 415) was a law passed long subsequently, and imposing new burdens upon the holders of city bonds. In County of Greene v. Daniel, where a like question was raised, it was held that the issuing of the bonds by the county court, signed by its presiding officer, was the equivalent of auditing by the same body, as required by a statute in case of claims against the county, and that the amount and validity of the liability were definitely fixed when the warrants issued. In Lincoln Co. v. Luning, it was held that a similar clause, requiring claims to be presented to the county commissioners, etc., applied only to unliquidated claims and accounts, and did not apply to bonds and coupons. Sawyer v. Colgan (decided April 24, 1894) 36 Pac. 580, related to the duty of the controller to issue his warrant in payment of coupons upon bonds issued under an act passed in 1857, known as "Indian War Bonds"; and it was held that, in view of the provisions for their payment under the law, it was not necessary to present such coupons to the examiners. The board of examiners was not provided for until 1858 (St. 1858, p. 212). Since that date it has been in force, and section 672 of the Political Code embodies substantially the same provision as section 5 of the original act. A "claim" is a demand of some matter, as of right, made by one person upon another, to do or forbear to do some act or thing, as a matter of duty. The controller must not draw his warrant for any claim unless it has been approved by the board, and, if directed so to do, it must be subject to section 672, supra, unless the direction is accompanied by a special provision exempting it from the provision of said section 672. The statute in regard to bounties for killing coyotes may be construed to direct the controller to draw his warrant, but it does not in any way exempt it from the operation of such section. Whatever the rule may be in cases which do not come within the technical definition of the term "claim," we are of opinion that, if any force is to be given to this section in any case, it applies to the present one. The controller can never draw his warrant upon the treasurer except when directed so to do by some law; and, if such direction alone is sufficient to require it, then we at once do away with the force and effect of a salutary provision of the statute, enacted as a safeguard of the treasury. It will not do to say that the supervisors have audited the claim, and that that is sufficient. The statute has designated the board of examiners as the body by which the audit must be made, and either such audit of a claim must be had, or a special provision exempting the claim from such audit must be contained in the direction to the controller, before it becomes his duty to issue his warrant. For this reason we are of opinion the court below erred in awarding the writ of mandate against the controller, and the judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the writ.

about 3½ years after the transfer. Held, that the facts supported a finding that the transfer was not made with intent to defraud his creditors.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Charles C. Knox against Fred Moses, Watson A. Bray, Julia A. Bray, and John Doe. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Sharp and S. C. Denson, for appellant. Chickering, Thomas & Gregory and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment, and as a defense it is claimed that the realty involved is the separate property of respondent Julia A. Bray. Her title rests upon the validity of a deed given to her by Watson A. Bray, her husband and co-respondent, August 3, 1881. It is here claimed that this transfer of the realty was void upon the ground that it was made with intent to defraud Watson A. Bray's creditors, and the determination of the court as to the validity of this deed points the judgment in the case. The trial court, by its findings of fact, declared in favor of the deed, and those findings of fact are now assailed as unsupported by the evidence. This action was tried and submitted upon testimony taken in two other cases, and it is now insisted that for such reason this court should take a first and original view of the evidence introduced, and weigh and measure it by the same standard and test that the trial court was required to apply. In other words, it is contended that the evidence should be examined and gauged the same as though the question here presented arose by an original proceeding pending in this court. This position of appellant is unsound. The court has declared the rule contrary to the principle sought to be invoked. Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 215, 30 Pac. 208; Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433.

The question still remains, is there a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether or not W. A. Bray made this conveyance to his wife with intent to defraud his creditors? Appellant's counsel say: "Assuming, then, that Bray was insolvent, and the deed was a gift, the question arises, does not the law pronounce the gift fraudulent and void even as against Bray's denial of a fraudulent intent? We say it does, notwithstanding the provisions of the Code that the fraudulent intent is a question of fact." It was held in Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, in language plain and positive, that in this state there are no conditions under which the law will or can pronounce a gift void, as having been made with intent to defraud creditors. Courts and juries may so declare as matter of fact, but it cannot be so declared as a matter of law. It is further stated in appellant's brief that the case of Bull v. Bray "simply decides a question of practice in regard to findings." It is evident that the scope and effect of that decision are entirely misunderstood by counsel, for a most important principle of law is laid down in that decision; a principle which will certainly maintain in this state as long as the present legislation upon this question remains upon the statute books. Threlkel v. Scott (Cal.) 34 Pac. 851, does not limit the effect of the principles declared in Bull v. Bray, and in no way militates against anything there decided.

Did Watson A. Bray transfer this real estate to his wife for the purpose of preventing his creditors from applying the same to the payment of his debts? The court found that the transfer was made with no such purpose, and with that finding of fact we entirely concur. Probably a finding to the contrary could not be supported by this record. Let us note the salient facts. At the time Bray made the deed to his wife, he was a man of large affairs, and engaged in many business enterprises. His assets and liabilities each approximated $700,000. He had numerous tracts of real estate in various localities, and personal property of almost every kind and character. His credit was good, as conclusively evidenced by the fact that he continued to carry on these vast business enterprises for 3½ years subsequent to the transfer of this land to his wife. The land so transferred was of the value of about $6,000, a trifling value as compared to his vast assets. At this time he was the owner of, and residing with his family upon, residence property of equal value with the property transferred, and upon this property he filed no homestead, but it finally passed to his creditors. To our minds, these circumstances are amply sufficient to sustain the findings of fact bearing upon the honesty of Bray's intention in conveying this tract of land to his wife. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

PAYMENT TO ATTORNEY—RECOVERY.

Money received by an attorney from his client under a misapprehension on the part of the latter as to the purposes for which it is being paid, and under circumstances which require the attorney in good conscience to refund the same, may be recovered back.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by August and Katie Lutz against Joseph Rothschild. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pierson & Mitchell, for appellant. John Flournoy, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action in form for money had and received, to recover from defendant and appellant, an attorney at law, the sum of $500, alleged to have been received by him from the plaintiffs and respondents as their attorney, and to and for their use, and which defendant refused to repay after demand. The answer was a denial of the allegations of the complaint, except as to nonpayment. The case was tried by a jury. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiffs for the sum demanded, and from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

The only question involved in the appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. It is objected by respondents that there is no sufficient specification of insufficiency to enable the court to look into the evidence, but we find it unnecessary to determine that objection, since we have seen fit, under the circumstances, to examine the evidence in the record, notwithstanding the objection, and entertain no doubt of its sufficiency. Without stating the facts in detail, the evidence for plaintiffs tended to show that defendant had received the money in dispute under a misapprehension on the part of plaintiffs as to the purposes for which it was being paid, and under circumstances which, if true, required the defendant in law and good conscience to refund it; while that of defendant went to establish that the money was voluntarily paid to him as a part of an entire fee for legal services performed, upon a distinct and perfect understanding of the parties. The jury found for plaintiffs upon evidence not only substantially conflicting, but which, it seems to us, fully sustains their verdict; and, of course, this finding cannot be disturbed.

It is urged by appellant that an action will not lie to recover money paid voluntarily and without compulsion where the party receiving the money is not guilty of fraud, and where both parties are equally cognizant of the facts upon which their rights depend. Conceding this to be true, the existence of the very facts upon which this principle is predicated were involved in the finding of the jury, which, as we have seen, was against appellant's contention. Judgment and order affirmed.

HERRLICH et al. v. McDONALD. (No. 15,562.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1894.)

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—LIMITATIONS.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a judgment until it is entered and recorded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by Julie Herrlich and another against Maggie McDonald. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James G. Maguire, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This action was commenced June 20, 1891, and is based upon a judgment averred to have been duly given and made by the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, in favor of Julie Herrlich and against Maggie McDonald, the defendant herein, on the 24th day of June, 1886. It is further averred that an appeal was taken by said defendant from said original judgment to the supreme court of the state of California, where the same was on the 7th day of September, 1889, affirmed with 15 per cent. damages. The complaint further avers that the original action was brought to recover for money had and received by defendant from Julie Herrlich, the plaintiff therein, in a fiduciary capacity, etc., and that plaintiff John F. Hanlon is the assignee of an interest in said original judgment. The answer of defendant, among other things, denies that the original judgment was entered after November 28, 1881, or that the action was brought to recover money had or received by the defendant in a fiduciary capacity, and pleads the statute of limitations and a discharge from said judgment under the insolvent law of the state of California by a decree duly entered on the 29th day of January, 1883, etc. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, written findings filed, and a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs, from which judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Upon the plea of the statute of limitations interposed by defendant, the court below found in favor of plaintiffs. This plea involved the question as to the date of the entry of the judgment upon which the action was brought. The judgment roll was introduced in evidence, and showed it to have been entered and recorded in the judgment book on the 24th day of June, 1886, on which last-mentioned day the judgment roll was made up, filed, and certified by the clerk, as required by sections 668 and 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On behalf of defendant, testimony was introduced showing that the findings of the court in the original cause were filed in the superior court November 28, 1881, and that, pursuant to the conclusion of law therein contained that plaintiff was entitled to judgment, the clerk of the court on the same day made in his minute book the following entry: "This cause having been submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and due consideration being had, it is ordered that judgment be and the same is hereby entered for plaintiff for $4,705 and costs, without interest."

In Crim v. Kessing, 89 Cal., at page 491, 26 Pac. 1074, it was said, in discussing the question of the statute of limitations in a somewhat similar case: "This, however, we think, cannot be considered an open question in this state. In Trenouth v. Farrington, 54 Cal. 273, it was expressly held that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the entry of the judgment, and in Condee v. Barton, 62 Cal. 1, it was held that a judgment is not final until it is recorded." It follows from the rule enunciated in the foregoing cases that the statute of limitations in the present case did not begin to run until June 24, 1886, and, as the action was commenced within five years next thereafter, the bar of the statute cannot be maintained.

The findings of the court are also against defendant upon her defense of a discharge in insolvency.

The judgment roll which was in evidence is the same one passed upon by this court in Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 Pac. 299, where it was held that it appeared defendant acted in a fiduciary capacity, as an agent of plaintiff, and was not discharged from the judgment therein by the decree in insolvency. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

VON SCHMIDT v. VON SCHMIDT. (No. 15,574.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1894.)

APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant is based on the judgment roll alone, it will be presumed, in support of the judgment, that a judgment by default rendered in the action in favor of plaintiff was for good cause set aside.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Julius H. Von Schmidt against Alexey W. Von Schmidt to establish the interest of plaintiff in certain patented inventions. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan and Moses G. Cobb, for appellant. Pierson & Mitchell, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to establish the interest of plaintiff in certain patented inventions, the patents for which inventions issued to the defendant; to have defendant decreed to be a trustee of plaintiff, and to have him account to plaintiff for the profits arising therefrom. A final judgment was rendered in favor of defendant September 10, 1892, from which plaintiff appeals. The cause comes up on the judgment roll without any statement or bill of exceptions.

The point made on behalf of appellant is that there are two judgments in the case, the latter of which (being the one from which this appeal is taken) is void. The record shows that the amended complaint was filed May 6, 1890. Defendant answered September 29, 1890, denying all the material allegations of the complaint, and setting up the statute of limitations. There is in the record what purports to be a decree in the cause, and to have been entered and recorded July 18, 1892, which recites that in February, 1892, defendant, pursuant to notice, was subpoenaed to appear before John P. Poole, a notary public, to be sworn and to testify as a witness in said cause; that he appeared before the notary at the time and place named, and that he then and there refused to be sworn as a witness in said cause, or to testify as a witness therein, without any reason for such refusal, whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the benefit of his testimony, whereupon it was, on motion of the plaintiff, ordered that the answer of the defendant be stricken out; and no leave to answer having been applied for, and the default of defendant for want of an answer having been entered, etc. The decree then proceeds in the usual form to adjudge plaintiff and defendant joint inventors of certain patents, and equally interested therein, etc.; it then proceeds to decree the defendant to be a trustee of plaintiff of an undivided one-half of the profits, etc., recites that the examination of a long account is necessary to a complete determination of the rights of the parties, and refers the cause to a referee to take and report an account, etc. The record further shows that thereafter, and on the 17th day of August, 1892, the cause came on regularly to be heard before the court sitting with a jury, to try special issues submitted by the court, and to render a verdict advisory to said court; that counsel appeared for the respective parties, evidence was introduced by the parties, the cause argued by counsel, and submitted to the jury upon certain special issues; that the jury rendered a verdict upon each of the special issues in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, which verdict was received and recorded, and the cause submitted to the court for decision. Then follow the facts as found by the court, which are full and explicit in favor of the defendant, and negating all the material allegations of the complaint. Whereupon, on the 10th day of September, judgment was entered in favor of defendant and against plaintiff, dismissing the action.

The appeal, as before stated, is from this judgment. Upon an appeal from a judgment upon the judgment roll alone, all intendments will be made in support of the judgment, and all proceedings necessary to its validity will be presumed to have been regularly taken, and any matters which might have been presented to the court below which would have authorized the judgment will be presumed to have been thus presented, if the record shows nothing to the contrary. Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. 411; Brown v. Johnson, 45 Cal. 76; Parker v. Altschul, 60 Cal. 380; Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 388, 31 Pac. 264. Under the doctrine enunciated in these cases, it may well be presumed, in favor of the judgment appealed from, that the former judgment striking out defendant's answer and giving judgment against him was for good cause set aside, as it might well have been done, and as such order setting aside defendant's default and the judgment against him, and restoring his answer to the files, forms no part of the judgment roll, under section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it would not appear in this record. It is true there cannot be two final judgments by the same court in the same case existing at one and the same time; but if, by some error, such a state of facts actually existed, it would have been quite easy for the appellant by a bill of exceptions to have established the fact, to the exclusion of the presumption that the first judgment was annulled and set aside before the entry of the second. Having failed to do so, the presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of the court below must prevail. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

KULLMANN et al. v. SIMMENS. (No. 15,098.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1894.)

STOCK SALES ON MARGIN—CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION—CHARACTER OF TRANSACTION—EVIDENCE.

1. Whether transactions between broker and customer for the purchase of stocks not immediately delivered, or of which an immediate delivery was not contemplated, were in contravention of Const. art. 4, § 26, prohibiting the sale of stocks on margin, is a question of fact to be determined in each particular case.

2. A finding of the court that the transactions between the plaintiff brokers and their defendant customer were in violation of Const. art. 4, § 26, prohibiting the sale of stocks on margin, will not be disturbed where there was any evidence to authorize it.

3. A written agreement between a broker and his customer regarding dealings in stocks is not necessarily determinative of the legality of their transactions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by one Kullmann and others against one Simmens for brokers' commissions. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wal J. Tuska, for appellants. Cobb & Loefler and Scrivner & Schell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The questions involved in this appeal have been determined adversely to the contention of the appellants in the cases of Cashman v. Root, 89 Cal. 373, 26 Pac. 883; Wetmore v. Barrett (Cal.) 37 Pac. 393; and Sheehy v. Shinn, Id. 393; and upon the authority of those cases the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed. There is nothing in Kutz v. Fleisher, 67 Cal. 93, 7 Pac. 195, inconsistent with the above cases. That action involved a series of transactions extending over several years, most of which were had prior to January 1, 1880, and the provisions of the present constitution were, of course, inapplicable to them. In the account upon which the action was brought there were two purchases of stocks by the plaintiff for the defendant after that date, and the trial court was requested to hold as a matter of law that the mere fact that the plaintiff had purchased and paid for these stocks at the request of the defendant, and, instead of immediately delivering them, had retained them until he should be repaid the advances, was in violation of the statute of frauds, and in contravention of the provisions of article 4, § 26, of the constitution. The trial court refused so to hold or rule, and this court affirmed its action, and held that the statute of frauds and the above provision of the constitution had no application. Whether a transaction or a series of transactions between a broker and his customer for the purchase of stocks that are not immediately delivered, or of which an immediate delivery is not contemplated, is in contravention of this provision of the constitution, is a question of fact to be determined in each particular case; and the circumstances under which the transaction is had, and the conduct of the parties in reference thereto, will naturally have great influence in determining this fact. Whether the transaction is a legitimate one, or one which is within the inhibition of the constitution, is to be determined by the actual course of dealing, and the evident purpose of the parties to such transaction, rather than by what they may have termed it, or by the form in which it may have been entered in their books, and is to be determined by the trial court from the evidence before it; and the finding of the court upon this question of fact is entitled to the same consideration upon an appeal as is any other finding of fact, and must be accepted here as conclusive if there was any evidence in support of it. If the stocks purchased are of a rapidly fluctuating character, and the money therefor is wholly advanced by the broker with whom the stocks are left, either with or without an agreement that they shall be held as security for his advances, and while in his hands are sold under the directions of the customer, and within a short time repurchased and again sold while their market value is fluctuating, and the only connection that the customer may have with them is to pay or receive the balance that the broker's account may show, there would be more reason for finding that such transactions were "on margin," within the meaning of the constitution, than in a case in which there was a single purchase of a stock of a fixed value yielding a regular income, and where the customer was seeking to find a suitable investment for his money. It is not the purpose of this provision of the constitution to interfere with legitimate business, or to make void all time contracts for the purchase of shares in incorporated companies. It was held in Cashman v. Root, supra, that this court will take judicial knowledge that the object with which this provision was inserted in the constitution was to strike down a species of gambling in mining stocks which had been rife in this state, wherein individuals were wont to contract for the purchase of stocks to be delivered at a future day, upon the speculation that they would advance in price sufficiently to meet their agreements or purchases; and in Sheehy v. Shinn, supra, it was said: "To give effect to the constitution, it is as much the duty of the courts to see that it is not evaded as that it is not directly violated." The court has found in the present case "that the object of the transactions and of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant was that the defendant might realize a profit by speculating in the fluctuations of the market in such stock"; and, as a conclusion therefrom, that the said transactions were within the prohibition of the constitution, and therefore void. As there was evidence before the court from which it was authorized to make this finding, its conclusion thereon must be accepted as determinative of the point. The written agreement between the parties, under which it is contended the transactions were had, was not all of the evidence before the court, and cannot be invoked as determinative of their character. The transactions themselves are challenged as illegal, and they are to be judged by their intrinsic character, rather than from the designation which the parties have given them. If they are within the prohibition of the constitution, it is immaterial that the parties thereto have signed an agreement that they shall bear a different name, or be differently classified from what they were in fact and in legal contemplation, or from what a jury may determine them to be. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by one Baldwin against one Zadig and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Edmund Tauszky, for appellants. T. C. Van Ness, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. This cause involves similar questions to those presented in Kullmann v. Simmens (No. 15,098, this day decided) 38 Pac. 362, and the other cases therein referred to. The agreement between the parties in Wetmore v. Barrett (Cal.) 37 Pac. 140, included all the terms of the agreement under which the transactions between the plaintiff and defendants herein were had, and nearly all the points presented on this appeal were presented and considered in that case. The court, however, erred in the present case in allowing interest to the plaintiff upon the several sums of money which she paid to the defendants. This money was not loaned by her to the defendants, but was voluntarily placed by her in their hands for an illegal purpose. As the money was applied by the defendants to the express purpose for which the plaintiff placed it in their hands, she cannot claim that it was detained by them from her until after she had made a demand for Rehearing denied. See 38 Pac. 722.

its return. Both of the parties to the transaction were in pari delicto, and, except for the provision of the constitution, there would be no right of recovery in the plaintiff, and we think that this right of recovery must be measured by the terms of the constitution in which it is given. The court below is directed to modify the judgment by deducting therefrom the amount allowed for interest on the sums deposited by the plaintiff with the defendants, and, as so modified, the judgment and order will stand affirmed.

PRIVILEGE OF WITNESS—CRIMINATING TESTIMONY
—“PURITY OF ELECTION LAW”—EVIDENCE OF OFFENDER.

1. Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that “no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself,” relieves such witness from giving any evidence which in a criminal prosecution against himself might tend to establish the offense with which he may be charged.

2. Unless he is at the same time liable to prosecution and punishment for such violation, a witness in a proceeding in which he is not the defendant, whose testimony tends to show that he has violated the laws of the state, cannot refuse to testify under Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that “no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.”

3. The “Purity of Election Law,” § 32 (St. 1893, p. 26), making a person offending against the act a competent witness against another person so offending, and providing that he may be compelled to attend and testify against the latter, but that such testimony shall not be used in any prosecution against said witness, and that said witness shall not thereafter be liable to indictment or presentment by information, nor to prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which he so testified, is not in violation of Const. art. 1, § 13, which provides that “no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.”

Department 1.

On the application of Louis Cohen in habeas corpus. Writ discharged.

Carroll Cook and H. I. Kowalsky, for petitioner. J. N. Nougues, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. At the close of the argument herein time was given the attorneys in which to hand in a memorandum of the authorities upon which they relied in support of their respective arguments; but, although such memorandum has not been received, inasmuch as the matter presented is of public interest we have determined to render our decision without any further delay. While Louis Steinberger was under examination before the Honorable W. T. Wallace, one of the judges of the superior court of San Francisco, sitting as a committing magistrate, in which said Steinberger was charged with a felony in “having willfully caused, procured, and allowed one Louis Cohen to be registered upon the precinct register of the 1st precinct of the 43d assembly district of the state of California, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, knowing said Louis Cohen not to be entitled to such registration,” the petitioner was called as a witness on the part of the people, and, having been sworn as such witness, was asked the following questions, viz.: “Q. Mr. Cohen, where do you reside? Q. On the 3d day of October, 1894, where did you reside? Q. Do you know the defendant, Louis Steinberger? Q. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Steinberger on the 3d day of last October respecting your going and procuring yourself to be placed upon the great register of this county? Q. Or the precinct register of this city and county? Q. Did you register or procure your name to be placed upon the precinct register of the 1st precinct of the 43d assembly district on the 3d of last October? Q. Were you present at the Baldwin Hotel with Mr. Steinberger on the 3d day of October? Q. At Mr. Steinberger's direction, did the clerk of the Baldwin Hotel furnish you with a key to a certain room in the hotel?” The witness refused to answer each of these questions as they were propounded to him, on the ground that his answer might incriminate him, whereupon the judge stated to him: “It is a legal impossibility in this case to expose yourself by your testimony here. I instruct you that you are bound to answer. You must answer.” But, notwithstanding such direction, the witness still refused to answer, and was thereupon adjudged guilty of contempt, and ordered to be imprisoned in the common jail of the city and county of San Francisco until he answer said questions, and each of them, before said judge.

The right of the legislature to determine who shall be competent witnesses to establish any fact under judicial examination, and to compel the attendance of such witnesses, cannot be disputed. Every person is subject to the power of the legislature to compel him in any judicial proceeding to give testimony of any fact within his knowledge and material to the issue, except in so far as the constitution restrains the legislature from exercising this power, or protects the individual from a compulsory compliance with its attempted exercise. The constitution of this state has limited the extent to which the legislature may exercise this power, and has given to the individual a protection against its exercise by providing in article 1, § 13, that “no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.” It is needless to review the history and development of this provision. It is an outgrowth of the common law of England, and almost at the commencement of our present government was incorporated into the national constitution, and is found in the constitution of every state in the country. The object of the provision is the immunity of the individual from compulsory self-accusation. This immunity is, however, to be limited to the purpose for which it is given, viz. the protection of the witness from being compelled to furnish any evidence from which he may be subjected to prosecution or punishment, and is not to be extended so as to include an exemption from being compelled to give evidence that could not under any circumstances tend to his conviction of an offense against the laws of the state. The provision that a person shall not be compelled "in a criminal case" to be a witness "against himself" is to be construed as protecting him from being compelled to give any evidence which in a criminal prosecution against himself might in any degree tend to establish the offense with which he may be charged. It is only when his evidence may tend to establish an offense for which he may be punished under the laws of the state that he is a witness "against himself" in a criminal case. The "criminal case" in which he is a witness need not be against himself, but his immunity from compulsion extends to all evidence which may be used in any criminal case against himself, under whatever circumstances such evidence may be sought; but the fact that in a proceeding in which he is not the defendant his testimony may tend to show that he has violated the laws of the state is not sufficient to entitle him to claim this protection of the constitution, unless he is at the same time liable to prosecution and punishment for such violation. If, at the time of the transactions respecting which his testimony is sought, the acts themselves did not constitute an offense; or if, at the time of giving the testimony, the acts are no longer punishable; if the statute creating the offense has been repealed; if the witness has been tried for the offense and acquitted, or, if convicted, has satisfied the sentence of the law; if the offense is barred by the statute of limitations, and there is no pending prosecution against the witness,—he cannot claim any privilege under this provision of the constitution, since his testimony could not be used against him in any criminal case against himself, and consequently he is not compelled to be a witness "against himself." Equally is he deprived of claiming this exemption from giving evidence if the legislature has declared that he shall not be prosecuted or punished for any offense of which he gives evidence. Any evidence that he may give under such a statutory direction will not be "against himself," for the reason that, by the very act of giving the evidence, he becomes exempted from any prosecution or punishment for the offense respecting which his evidence is given. In such a case he is not compelled to give evidence which may be used against himself in any criminal case, for the reason that the legislature has declared that there can be no criminal case against him which the evidence which he gives may tend to establish.

Section 32 of the "Purity of Election Law" (St. 1893, p. 26), under which the examination of Steinberger was had, provides: "A person offending against any provision of sections * * * [enumerating certain sections of the act] is a competent witness against another person so offending, and may be compelled to attend and testify upon any trial, hearing, proceeding, or lawful investigation or judicial proceeding, in the same manner as any other person. But the testimony so given shall not be used in any prosecution or proceeding, civil or criminal, against the person so testifying. A person so testifying shall not thereafter be liable to indictment or presentment by information, nor to prosecution or punishment for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given, and may plead or prove the giving of testimony accordingly in bar of such indictment, information or prosecution." This section is taken from the statute of New York known as the "Corrupt Practices Prevention Act," and is also found in the English statute upon the same subject; and the closing paragraph of the section is also found in the statutes of New York passed in 1869 for the punishment of bribery, and subsequently incorporated in section 79 of the Penal Code of that state. Statutes containing similar provisions have been passed in many of the states of this country for the purpose of securing conviction for offenses in which two or more persons are required to participate in order to constitute the offense, such as bribery, gambling, usury, selling intoxicating liquors, and others; the legislatures doubtless considering that the offense would be effectually suppressed if one of the offenders only could be punished, and for that purpose making his participant in the offense a competent witness by exempting him from punishment. In the greater number of these statutes the provision of exemption was that the testimony should not be used against the witness; and prior to the decision in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, in 1891, the decisions under these statutes were nearly uniform that this was a sufficient immunity; but, under the rule laid down in that case, such a provision does not meet the requirements of the constitution, and, unless there be an absolute immunity from all punishment for any offense respecting which the witness may be called upon to testify, he may claim the protection of the constitution against being compelled to give evidence against himself. Rulings similar to that in Counselman v. Hitchcock had been previously made in Emery's Case, 107 Mass. 172, and in Cullen's Case, 24 Grat. 624; and in Ex parte Clarke, 37 Pac. 230, the same principle was established in this state.

In State v. Nowell, 58 N. H. 314, it was held, under the provisions of a statute that the evidence given by a witness should not be used against him, and that he should not be thereafter prosecuted for any offense so disclosed by him, that this exemption gave him all the protection which was guaranteed by the constitution, upon the ground that his legal immunity from prosecution was equivalent to his legal innocence of the crime disclosed by his testimony. A statute is to be construed with reference to its manifest object, except as such object may be defeated by the language of the statute itself. The language used is not to be enlarged beyond its ordinary construction for the purpose of effecting such object, nor, on the other hand, is the language to receive such a technical or limited construction as will defeat the manifest purpose of the statute. If the language is susceptible of two constructions, one of which will carry out and the other will defeat such manifest object, it should receive the former construction. So, too, if a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent with the constitution and the other repugnant thereto, it should be so construed as to be effective rather than void. Any statute involving a personal privilege or right conferred upon an individual by the constitution, is to be liberally construed in favor of the individual. The manifest object of section 32, aforesaid, is to secure evidence for the conviction of offenders against the provisions of the other sections of the statute which are enumerated therein; but it is only upon a "trial, hearing, prosecution, lawful investigation or judicial proceeding" against another person for offending against the provisions of those enumerated sections that a witness who has himself offended against these provisions of the sections can be compelled to testify. The offenses referred to in the enumerated sections are those against the purity of election, which require the co-operation of two or more persons; and the provision that one of these parties offending may be compelled to give testimony would be nugatory, in view of his constitutional protection, unless the legislature had at the same time furnished him with a shield for any offense with reference to which he would be compelled to testify. By the provisions of this section, the petitioner has the full protection guaranteed to him by the constitution against any self-accusation of crime. In addition to providing that his testimony shall not be used against him, it is declared that he shall not thereafter be liable to indictment or presentment by information, nor to prosecution or punishment, "for the offense with reference to which his testimony was given," and that he may plead or prove the giving of testimony in bar of such indictment, information, or prosecution. The immunity thus given includes not only the offense with which the defendant then under examination is charged, and in which the witness was a participant with such defendant, but also any other offense with which the witness may be charged, and to which such testimony may have reference, or which it may tend to establish. "The offense with reference to which his testimony was given" is broader in its terms, and has a wider scope, than "the offense with which the defendant is charged"; and the exemption from prosecution or punishment consequent upon his giving testimony in reference thereto, when considered in view of the personal privilege given by the constitution, must receive a liberal construction in his favor. The statute purports to compel him to testify "in the same manner as any other person," and, as the equivalent for his constitutional protection, gives him a legislative protection of equal scope and effect by exempting him from all liability to punishment for the offense with reference to which he testifies. The exemption is as broad as the compulsion, and the protection is equal to that given by the constitution. The testimony which he may be compelled to give is the same as that which could be required of any other witness, and includes any matter within his knowledge which is relevant to the offense under investigation and material to its determination. If, in giving such testimony, the testimony has reference to another offense committed by himself, he is within the protection of the statute, and, upon any prosecution for such offense, is authorized to plead or prove in bar thereof that, under the compulsion of this section, he gave testimony with reference to such offense. We hold, therefore, that the petitioner should have answered the questions propounded to him, and that he was rightly adjudged guilty of contempt in refusing to answer them. The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

INGRAM v. COLGAN. (No. 18,372.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1894.)

In bank. On motion for rehearing. Motion granted.

For former report, see 38 Pac. 315.

PER CURIAM. The parties to this cause unite in asking the court to determine the question whether or not the act entitled the "Coyote Scalp Act" makes an appropriation for the payment of claims under it. In order to comply with this request the judgment herein is set aside and a rehearing granted, and it is ordered that the cause be forthwith resubmitted, and that either party may within 15 days from this date file additional points and authorities on the question of such appropriation if he so desires.

for reversal, where the answer shows that defendant was not misled to his prejudice by such ambiguity, and the cause was tried on issues defined by the answer.

2. In an action for personal injuries it appeared that in unloading lumber for defendant, plaintiff was standing upon a platform consisting of two boards, only one of which was fastened, while the other could shift itself towards the rack from which he was taking the lumber, leaving a space of seven or eight inches between the two, and that in attempting to move a refractory piece of lumber this board, on which he was standing, did so shift, in consequence of which he fell, and was injured. The platform had been erected some time before, but plaintiff had only been upon it a few times, and was unaware of this defect. Held, that it was for the jury to determine whether plaintiff had assumed the risk of the defect in the platform.

3. In an action against a corporation by an employé to recover for personal injuries resulting from a defective platform on which he was working, it was not prejudicial error to refuse to allow defendant's president to answer the question, "Did you notice at any time any defect in this platform?" on the ground that it called for his opinion, where he was allowed to testify as to all the facts from which his conclusion could have been drawn.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Julius Alexander against the Central Lumber & Mill Company, a corporation, to recover for personal injuries received while in defendant's employ. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Powell, for appellant. H. H. Davis and Dunne & McPike, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent was in the employ of appellant at its lumber yard in the city of San Francisco. He was standing upon a high platform engaged in removing lumber from a rack, and while so engaged he fell therefrom, and received serious injury. He recovered a judgment of $5,000 for such injuries, and this appeal is prosecuted from that judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

Appellant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and such ruling of the court is now insisted upon as error. That portion of the complaint attacked by demurrer is as follows: "That said platform near said rack was carelessly and negligently constructed and built by defendants, who built and constructed said platform out of light lumber and scantling, the flooring of said platform not being nailed or fastened, and without a railing around said platform, instead of building said platform by nailing the flooring thereof, and placing a railing around said platform; and by reason of not nailing down the flooring of said platform the boards shifted, and plaintiff, in endeavoring to hold himself, caught hold of a piece of said gutter lumber piled on the said rack, which piece of gutter lumber broke, and plaintiff fell to the ground." It is claimed by demurrer

ALEXANDER v. CENTRAL LUMBER & MILL CO. (No. 15,489.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1894.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—RISKS OF EMPLOYMENT—AMBIGUITY IN PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

1. Abstract error in overruling a demurrer to the complaint for ambiguity is not cause that the foregoing allegations of the complaint are uncertain in this: "That it does not appear whether the alleged injury resulted from the weight and character of the lumber used in the construction of a certain platform therein mentioned, or whether it resulted from the absence of nails in the flooring of said platform, or whether it resulted from the absence of a railing around the same, or whether it resulted from the breaking of a certain piece of gutter lumber piled near said platform." This paragraph of the complaint does not comprise a perfect form of pleading. It does not contain that clear and concise statement of the facts constituting the cause of action contemplated by the Code. At the same time, upon a close inspection of it, we do not think the uncertainty of which appellant complains really exists. Useless and surplus matters are stated therein, yet it is fairly apparent therefrom that the fall of respondent was occasioned by the shifting of the boards of the platform, and that the cause of the shifting of the boards lay in the fact that they were not nailed. Aside from these reasons, if we concede the complaint defective in this regard by reason of uncertainty, yet that uncertainty is not such as demands a retrial of a case which has gone to judgment upon the facts. It is not in all cases where error has been committed by trial courts in overruling demurrers to complaints upon the grounds of ambiguity or uncertainty that this court will order a reversal of a judgment based upon a trial of the issues made by the complaint and answer. The same rule applies to errors of this character as is invoked as to all other errors of the court. It must not be mere abstract error, but it must be prejudicial and injurious error, in order to avail appellant, for otherwise he has no cause of complaint. It is apparent to the court from this record that no harm resulted to appellant by reason of the order of the court overruling the demurrer. The denials of the answer are full and complete as to the manner in which the platform was constructed, and especially upon the issue as to whether or not the boards were fastened by nails, and as to whether or not they shifted by reason of the fact that they were not so fastened. The case was tried upon these issues, and the form of the complaint in this regard could not have misled and injured appellant. As was said in Gassen v. Bower, 72 Cal. 555, 14 Pac. 206: "Where a pleading is demurred to for ambiguity, we think that if the party was not misled to his prejudice the ambiguity cannot be said to affect the substantial rights of the parties." See, also, Reynolds v. Lincoln, 71 Cal. 183, 9 Pac. 176, and 12 Pac. 449. In Stark v. Wellman, 96 Cal. 400, 31 Pac. 259; Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 644, 33 Pac. 757; and Thelin v. Stewart, 100 Cal. 372, 34 Pac. 861.—the complaints reviewed by this court presented facts entirely different from those here stated by the pleader. The remaining questions raised by the demurrer have no force.

It is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The platform upon which respondent was standing at the time of his fall consisted of two boards about 10 inches wide and 2 inches thick, and about 12 feet long, stretched upon scantlings or wooden supports. Of these two boards the one nearer the rack may be called the "inside" board, and the one further from the rack the "outside" board. Between the outside and inside boards there was a space of one or two inches, and between the inside board and the rack there was a space of between four and six inches. The inside board was without nails, fastenings, or other attachments to keep it in place. Between this inside board and the rack there was this margin of from four to six inches for shifting, and upon the other side of this board, and between it and the outside board, a margin of one or two inches. While in the act of pulling a refractory piece of molding from the rack, the inside board, upon which respondent was standing, shifted or moved towards the rack, and in consequence thereof he was precipitated to the ground below. This scaffolding and platform had been erected by defendant some years prior to the accident, and was in the same condition upon that day as when first erected. Respondent had been upon the platform but a few times prior to the accident, and knew of no defect or infirmity existing therein. As to some of the foregoing facts there may be a slight conflict in the evidence, but prima facie they are all shown. It is now claimed that the evidence fails to support the verdict in this: that, conceding the platform to be defective in that the boards constituting the same were not nailed, still such defect was either known to respondent or should have been known by him, as he had equal means with his employer of possessing such knowledge; and for these reasons it is claimed that he assumed the danger and the risk. Conceding the principle of law contained in the statement of this position to be sound, still these things were matters of defense to respondent's right of recovery. Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 437, 21 Pac. 114. The burden was upon appellant to show one or both of these conditions, and the evidence is not at all conclusive that he showed either. It is not shown that respondent was aware that these boards were not fastened; neither is it at all clear that he had equal means with his master of becoming acquainted with such fact. His master erected this scaffold and laid these boards, and by doing so must be held to have known that they were not nailed. Respondent had not been notified of this condition. He had seen the platform but a few times. The defect could hardly be said to be a patent defect; and by no principle of law was the servant required to make a minute inspection of this appliance as to its being entirely safe and free from defects before he was justified in assuming the risk of working upon it. It was the duty of the master to provide a scaffold and platform suitable to the purposes for which it was intended, and in so providing he was required to exercise reasonable care. And what constitutes reasonable or ordinary care must be determined in the light of the special facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. Again, the master is required to use the same care in the inspection and supervision of the appliance, for the purpose of discerning defects that may subsequently occur therein, as is required of him originally in furnishing the appliance or instrument. To defeat the servant's right of recovery he must not only be aware of the defect in the appliance, but know and appreciate the risks and dangers resulting or likely to follow from such defects, although he is in no better position if he is ignorant of the defects and the risks and dangers by reason of his failure to exercise ordinary common sense and prudence in the examination of the instruments and appliances placed in his hands with which to labor. These questions are involved in the present case, and the true solution of them is entirely and solely dependent upon the evidence introduced at the trial. In almost every case they are issues of fact to be found upon by the jury, and not matters of law to be declared by the court. Upon an examination of the evidence contained within the lids of this record we have no hesitation in saying that the present case, as to its facts, was one preeminently for the jury, and not for the court.

The president of the corporation appellant when upon the witness stand was asked the following question by his counsel: "Did you notice at any time any defect in this platform?" Objection was sustained thereto upon the ground that it called for the conclusion of the witness, and the ruling of the court in this regard is insisted upon as prejudicial error; but for many reasons we think it furnishes no occasion for a reversal of the judgment. Conceding the ruling erroneous, the witness in effect subsequently testified to all the matters involved in the question. The respondent presented his case to the jury upon the theory that the boards of the platform were not fastened, and that while standing upon the inside board it shifted by reason of not being so fastened, and the fall and injury followed. This witness testified: "My attention had never been directed to any defect, by anybody, in this platform. * * * I can't say whether the inside board of the top platform was nailed or loose at the time." Again we are not prepared to say that the question was unobjectionable. It was very general, and if it had been answered in the negative we are unable to see how the answer would have enlightened the jury or aided appellant's cause. Defects in the construction of this platform, in the minds of the jury, may not have been defects in the mind of the witness. The failure to fasten the platform may have been a serious defect in its construction, viewed from the juror's standpoint, and no defect whatever viewed from the standpoint of the witness. Hence this answer, whatever it may have been, would point to no definite and certain conditions. The witness had the opportunity to testify as to the manner of the platform's construction in all its details, and there can be no question but that such would have been the better practice to have followed. The case was not one demanding the introduction of expert testimony, for the jurors, after they had been fully advised as to the manner of its construction, were just as competent to determine whether or not it was defectively constructed as was any expert that might be produced upon the witness stand. Again, looking at the matter from appellant's point of view, if we concede that the answer to the question called for a statement of fact, it certainly was near the border line of objectionableness, and the trial court, in the exercise of its discretion and the conduct of the examination of witnesses, had the legal right to sustain an objection thereto. The principle discussed in Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 31 Pac. 109, is directly in point here; and, while the evidence was admitted in that case, it was held in effect that no material error would have been committed if it had been rejected, the court saying: "So in this case the trial judge might properly have required the plaintiff to ask questions touching all the details of the work of constructing the walk, its dimensions, and the grade upon which it was laid, and the quality of the materials used in its construction; but it was clearly a matter within the discretion of the trial judge to permit the general question, and the defendant could, if he had so desired, have called for more minute particulars upon the cross-examination of the witness." The court in that case also quote approvingly from Brink v. Insurance Co., 80 N. Y. 108, wherein it was said: "While it would not have been a legal error to have sustained the objection, I am of the opinion, under the circumstances of this case, that it was not a legal error to overrule it. The object of all examinations in judicial tribunals is to elicit truth, and there are many cases where the form of questions and the manner of examination must be left to the discretion of the trial judge."

There are no other questions raised by the record of sufficient importance to demand extended notice. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

JAGER v. CALIFORNIA BRIDGE CO.

(No. 15,619.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1894.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYEE — DEFECTIVE PILE DRIVER — EVIDENCE—ACTION AGAINST CORPORATION—VENUE.

1. An action against a corporation for personal injuries may be begun in the county where the injuries were received, though defendant's principal place of business is in another county.

2. Error in overruling a demurrer to a complaint for uncertainty is not ground for reversal where it appears from the record that defendant was not injured thereby.

3. In an action for injuries due to defects in a pile driver, the evidence showed that the driver, as it was lifted preparatory to its descent, forced from the top of the machine a headblock or crossbeam, which fell on plaintiff, who was working at the foot of the machine. It appeared that the headblock had been originally secured by bolts, but that prior to the accident one side became loosened through the breaking or loosening of the bolt. Held, that the evidence justified a finding that the machine was defectively constructed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Julius Jager against the California Bridge Company for injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Hill, for appellant. A. P. Black (Martin Stevens, of counsel), for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent was injured while employed by appellant in working upon and about a machine engaged in driving piles. He recovered a judgment for such injuries, and this appeal is taken from that judgment, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

In due time appellant moved for a change of venue of the action from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Alameda, upon the ground that appellant's principal place of business was in Alameda county, and alleging that such fact was so declared in its articles of incorporation. This motion was denied, and complaint is now made of the action of the court. Appellant was not entitled to a change of place of trial upon the ground presented, for a corporation may be sued and trial had in the county where the injuries are received. It has no absolute right to have the action tried in the county where its principal place of business is located. Trezevant v. W. R. Strong Co., 102 Cal. 47, 36 Pac. 395.

It is insisted that a special demurrer to the complaint upon the ground of uncertainty was well taken. The complaint alleged "that the defendant so carelessly and negligently constructed said pile driver, and so carelessly and negligently provided unsafe and unsuitable machinery and appliances with which to do the work, that upon raising the hammer to drive the first pile the crossbeam on the top of the said pile driver was pulled off, and the said crossbeam fell upon the plaintiff while in the line of his employment and duty aforesaid." This allegation could have been made more definite and certain. At the same time it states the facts as to the manner and cause of the accident fairly well and sufficiently in detail to defeat a reversal of the judgment upon the ground of a technically defective pleading. It is not every error of the trial court committed in overruling a special demurrer to a pleading that will justify this court in sending the case back for a new trial. When the issues are fairly made by the answer, and the evidence bearing upon the issues is fairly presented to the court, there is no reason why a defective allegation in the complaint, even though it be unsuccessfully assailed by a special demurrer, should cause a reversal of the judgment and a retrial of the case. It is fully apparent by the record that no injury resulted to the appellant by the action of the court, even conceding it to be erroneous; and when there is no injury there is no ground for reversal. See Alexander v. Mill Co. (this day decided) 38 Pac. 410.

It is insisted that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of fact made by the court as to the imperfect construction of the pile driver, and appellant states that he makes this contention fully realizing the force of the rule that this court will not disturb the findings of fact when a conflict of evidence is presented. When the accident occurred respondent was at the base of the pile driver, near the foot of the brace ladder, and he was struck down and injured by the crossbeam or headblock falling upon him from its proper position at the top of the pile driver, some 85 feet above. It is insisted by respondent that it fell by reason of the defective and unsubstantial manner in which it was fastened to the gins and the ladder, taken in connection with the way in which the rope or "runner" (as it is termed) that raises and lowers the hammer was connected thereto, it being claimed that this connection was of such a character as to deprive the hammer of sufficient space to allow it to be chocked at the top of the platform and below the crossbeam or headblock. Upon the part of appellant it is claimed that the headblock was knocked off by the hammer by reason of the negligence of the engineer—a fellow servant—in raising the hammer too rapidly, and in not stopping it sufficiently soon to avoid contact with the headblock. The headblock was fastened to the top of the driver by two bolts, but a short time before the accident occurred, in hoisting the pile, one end of the block became loosened and displaced from its proper position, and, while it was subsequently replaced, nothing was done to fasten it more securely, and the block was in this condition when the accident occurred. As to the contention of appellant that the engineer was guilty of negligence in raising the hammer too rapidly, it is sufficient to say that the evidence is squarely conflicting upon this point, and by its judgment the court found against the commission of negligence by the engineer in this regard. But upon the other hand we are satisfied that the evidence is entirely sufficient to support a finding of fact to the effect that the pile driver was defectively constructed in this: that the headblock thereof was insecurely placed and fastened in its position. A large amount of evidence was introduced bearing upon the question as to the proper manner of fastening the headblock upon a pile driver, some witnesses testifying that iron bands or straps should be used, while others declared that bolts, as used in this instance, were sufficient. The evidence is conflicting as to this point, but it is not necessary to rest the validity of this judgment upon such conditions. Even if the appliance was originally a proper and suitable one, tested by the requirements of the law, still at the time of the accident it was not in the same condition as when first constructed. The evidence plainly indicates that the headblock had become loosened at one end, and whatever efficacy may have arisen from the original bolting thereof was gone at the moment of the accident. Under these circumstances the original bolting goes for naught, and the case stands exactly as though one end of the appliance had never been fastened. If it had been constructed in this manner in the first instance, measured by the evidence in the record, there can be no question but that such construction would have been defective, and that the defendant would have been guilty of a lack in the exercise of the most ordinary care in such construction. It is not necessary to cite authorities to the point, for the rule is elementary that the same duty devolves upon the master in subsequently maintaining the appliance in a safe and suitable condition as rested upon him when it was originally furnished to his servant. Alexander v. Lumber Co., supra. There is nothing in the record to indicate that respondent knew the defective character of the appliance and assumed the risk of working with such an appliance. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

Appeal of MERRITT. (No. 15,626.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1894.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—CONTRACT BY HEIR RELINQUISHING INTEREST IN ANCESTOR'S ESTATE—RELEASE OF RIGHT TO CONTEST WILL—VALIDITY—PRIVITY OF EXECUTOR.

1. Where defendant moves to dismiss the petition, after an answer setting up an instrument as an affirmative defense, and failure of plaintiff to reply, the court may assume that the grounds urged in opposition to the motion are the only grounds on which plaintiff opposes it, and the latter cannot, on appeal, claim that under the pleadings he is entitled to show facts, not mentioned below, constituting an avoidance of such affirmative defense.

2. Civ. Code, § 700, provides that "a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind." Section 1045 provides that "a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred." Held, that a contract between an heir and his ancestor, made in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whereby the heir relinquishes all interest in the estate of such ancestor which might in the future vest in him, is valid.

3. An heir agreed with his ancestor to relinquish all interest in the latter's estate which might otherwise in the future vest in him as such heir, and covenanted with her "her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, and administrators," that he would "never in any manner or to any extent question, dispute, or contest any disposition of the property" named in the agreement "which she may have made, or may hereafter make, by either deed or by her last will and testament." Held, that the executor of the estate of such ancestor was in such privity with testatrix that he might invoke the benefit of such covenant, as against an attempted contest of the will by such heir.

4. Such agreement estops the heir from contesting an instrument, executed in due form of law as the will of such ancestor, disposing of the property referred to in such agreement, whether or not testatrix had the capacity, or was induced by undue influence, to make it.

5. A release by an heir apparent of his contingent right to contest the will of his ancestor is not void as against public policy, even though it estops the heir from contesting the will of an insane person, or a will executed under the influence of fraud or duress.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Petition by one Merritt to revoke the probate of an instrument purporting to be the will of Catherine M. Garcelon, deceased, to which the executor and the administrator with the will annexed filed answers. From a judgment dismissing the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

The appellant is a nephew of Catherine M. Garcelon, deceased, and this appeal is taken from an order of the superior court of Alameda county dismissing his petition contesting the validity of a document theretofore admitted to probate in that court as the last will and testament of said decedent, and praying that the probate thereof be revoked. The petition avers that the document so admitted to probate is not the will of said decedent, by reason of the fact that she was of unsound mind and incompetent to make a will at the time she signed it, and upon the further ground that the execution of the same was procured by undue influence exerted upon the decedent by Stephen W. Purington, one of the residuary legatees named therein, and by other persons unknown to the petitioner; and, in its statement of the facts constituting the alleged undue influence, the petition avers in substance that at the date of the said will, and long prior thereto, Catherine M. Garcelon was "a very aged woman, feeble and weak in body and mind, and mentally incompetent to manage, care for, or dispose of her property, and was unaware of the extent, amount, or nature of her property, or of its value, and was obliged to rely entirely upon other persons for the management of her property and affairs"; and that during all that time the said Purrington and other persons unknown to petitioner were in constant intercourse with her, and exercised an actual authority and dominion over her mind, and said persons, for the purpose of preventing the petitioner, as heir and next of kin, from coming into any portion of her estate by succession, or under her will, "had, prior to the making of said will, poisoned the mind of said Catherine M. Garcelon against the petitioner, and so induced her to dispose of almost all her property in trust, and to appoint the said Stephen W. Purrington and others as trustees thereof." Immediately following this statement the petition alleges: "The said Catherine M. Garcelon obtained all of her said property from the estate of her brother, Dr. Samuel Merritt, who died on or about the 14th day of August, 1890, and prior to that date she had not been, and was not, possessed of any property, real or personal, but was dependent upon the said Samuel Merritt for her support and subsistence." The petition then proceeds to state certain alleged false representations which were made to the decedent for the purpose of injuring the petitioner in her estimation, and to cause her to make the will in question, and alleges "that the said Catherine M. Garcelon, being thereby influenced and not otherwise, and not of her own voluntary act or will, made the said purported will." The petition further states that the said Purrington and others, for the purpose of securing a great benefit to themselves, "coerced and caused" the said decedent to subscribe her name to said will, and finally avers that she, at the time the "said purported last will and testament was made, was mentally unable to resist the said dominion and controlling influence of said persons, and was unable to understand the contents of said document, and never did understand or know the same." The petition also alleges that the petitioner and his brother, Frederick A. Merritt, are the nephews and the only next of kin of said Catherine M. Garcelon, and this averment is not denied.

The executor and the administrator with the will annexed answer separately, but both answers are in all respects the same, and deny that the said Catherine M. Garcelon was of unsound mind, or incompetent to make a will, or that the will probated as her last will and testament was executed under undue influence; and, in addition to these denials, state the following facts as a separate defense to the matters alleged in the petition: On or about August 17, 1890, one Samuel Merritt, a brother of Catherine M. Garcelon, died, leaving a large estate and a will by the terms of which the greater part of his estate was given to his said sister, and only a small portion thereof to his nephews, the petitioner here and his brother, Frederick A. Merritt. This will was duly admitted to probate on September 15, 1890. The petitioner and his brother were dissatisfied with its terms, and threatened to contest the probate thereof, and employed a lawyer for that purpose; but a compromise was effected, and said Catherine M. Garcelon and the petitioner and his brother entered into a written contract, by the terms of which the former was to pay to her said two nephews the sum of $125,000, and also to convey certain real property to a trustee upon a certain condition subsequent, the trustee to collect and pay over the income to the nephews, and in consideration of which the latter were to release to their said aunt their claims as heirs of her brother, Samuel Merritt, and for that purpose were to execute to her a proper deed of conveyance of their interest in said estate; and it was further agreed that this deed should "contain such apt words of warranty and covenant as may be prescribed and approved by the counsel of the parties of the first and second parts, respectively, to the end of securing to the party of the first part full right and ample power to dispose of all of the property derived by her from the said Samuel Merritt, or by the deed of conveyance and transfer herein provided for; also of all the income to be derived therefrom, and of all the property, real and personal, which the party of the first part now owns or hereafter may acquire, either by deed or last will and testament, without any right, power, or authority of the parties of the second part hereto, or either of them, or their respective heirs or assigns, to question, dispute, or contest the same in any manner or to any extent whatever." And it was further provided that said nephews should also execute any other separate agreements and covenants which might be deemed necessary to secure to the said Catherine M. Garcelon the right to dispose of the property mentioned in the deed, either by deed or will, free from any possibility of contest by them. On the same day the petitioner and his brother executed to the said Catherine M. Garcelon an agreement which, after referring to the death of Samuel Merritt, and the fact that he had left a large estate and a will by which the great bulk of it was devised and bequeathed to their aunt, and that they were dissatisfied with said will, and had threatened to contest the same, proceeded as follows: "And whereas, the undersigned and said Catherine M. Garcelon have mutually agreed upon a settlement and adjustment of their respective property rights and interests in the property and estate of which the said Samuel Merritt was seised or possessed, and in such settlement and adjustment the said Catherine M. Garcelon has made satisfactory provision for the undersigned; and, whereas, the said Catherine M. Garcelon has been induced to make such settlement and adjustment and such provision for the undersigned in reliance upon their respective promises and agreements that they, nor either of them, would never, at any time hereafter, in any manner, or to any extent, question, dispute, or contest, as her heirs at law or otherwise, any disposition which she may have made, or may hereafter make, by deed or will, of any or all of the property derived by her from the estate of the said Samuel Merritt: Now, therefore, for and in consideration of the premises, the undersigned do hereby promise, covenant, and agree to and with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her devisees, legatees, and assigns, that they, nor either of them, nor their respective heirs, shall or will, at any time hereafter, assert any right, title, or interest, as the heir or heirs at law of the said Catherine M. Garcelon, to the property, real and personal, derived by her under the said last will and testament of the said Samuel Merritt." In addition to the foregoing agreement, the petitioner and his brother also executed to their aunt a deed purporting to convey and assign to her all their interest in the property of the estate of Samuel Merritt, real, personal or mixed, or in which they could have an interest as heirs at law of said Merritt. This deed also contained a covenant on their part whereby they agreed "with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, administrators, and assigns," not to question or contest any disposition of any of the property belonging to said estate which the said Catherine M. Garcelon "may have made, or may hereafter make, either by deed or by her last will and testament," and that neither of them would ever make any claim to any portion of the property derived by her under the will of Samuel Merritt, except such as he might be able to assert as a devisee or legatee under her last will and testament. The answers further aver that the said Catherine M. Garcelon fully complied with all the terms of the compromise agreement on her part to be kept and performed, and that all of the estate of which she died possessed was derived from her deceased brother, the said Samuel Merritt, and under the terms of his will. The genuineness and due execution of the several contracts and writings set out in the answer were not denied by the petitioner; but he moved to strike from the answers all the averments relating to the same as irrelevant and immaterial, and also demurred to the separate defense based upon the said alleged contracts. The motion to strike out was denied, and the demurrer overruled. The petitioner also filed in due time a written request that the issues of fact relating to the competency of the decedent and her freedom from undue influence be tried by a jury. This request was denied, and thereafter the case came on for trial before the court without a jury, and upon the hearing the defendants "offered in evidence" the original contracts and deeds referred to in their answers, and also offered to prove the truth of the recitals therein contained, and that said terms were fully performed by the said Catherine M. Garcelon. The court ruled that none of said evidence was necessary or proper, the genuineness and due execution of said contracts and deeds being admitted; and thereupon the defendants moved to dismiss the petition of the appellant upon the ground that he was estopped by said contracts and deeds from questioning the validity of the will of said Catherine M. Garcelon, and upon the further ground that it appeared that he had no interest in the estate of said decedent. This motion was opposed by the petitioner upon certain specific grounds, which will be hereafter stated. The objections of petitioner were overruled, and the court made an order dismissing the petition upon the grounds stated in the motion of defendants.

DE HAVEN, J. (after stating the facts). 1. Notwithstanding the genuineness and due execution of the compromise agreement, as contained in the several instruments set out in the answers, were admitted by the failure of petitioner to file an affidavit denying the same (Code Civ. Proc. § 44S), he still insists that the court erred in dismissing the petition without giving him an opportunity to show that such agreement was in fact without consideration, or that his consent thereto was obtained by fraud, or that it had been extinguished by rescission, or that performance thereof had been waived by the deceased. It is true that by the terms of section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure new matter in an answer is deemed to be controverted without any special replication, and under that section a plaintiff has the right, while not denying the genuineness and due execution of an instrument set out in an answer, to show other matters in confession or avoidance thereof. But, unless he brings to the attention of the trial court his purpose to offer such evidence, that court cannot assume that he desires to make any such defense; and in this case the motion of defendants for a dismissal of the petition was not opposed upon the ground that the petitioner desired to offer any proof tending to show that the contracts and deeds set out in the answers were not freely entered into by the parties thereto, and for an adequate consideration, or that the same were superseded by any subsequent agreement, or that the said Catherine M. Garcelon had ever waived performance of the agreements therein contained. On the contrary, the motion was opposed upon the grounds—First, that the instruments set out in the answer contained no matter sufficient to estop the petitioner from maintaining this proceeding, or from showing that he has an interest in the estate of Catherine M. Garcelon; and, second, that no trial of the issues of fact tendered by the petition had been had, and that petitioner had been denied a trial of such issues by a jury. The court below, therefore, properly assumed that these were the only grounds upon which the petitioner opposed the motion, and it is too late to suggest here for the first time that he was entitled to make proof of other facts showing his right to contest the will of deceased, and which would have been sufficient to avoid the estoppel which the trial court held resulted from the compromise agreement.

2. The main question arising upon this appeal relates to the construction and effect of the compromise agreement set out in the answers. That agreement seems to have been prepared with great care, and there is no ambiguity in any of its provisions. By its terms the appellant and his brother waived their right as heirs of Dr. Merritt to contest the will left by him, or to claim any portion of the estate bequeathed and devised by him to their aunt, other than the portion thereof which she gave and relinquished to them by that agreement; and in consideration of the property thus secured to them they further agreed "that they, nor either of them, nor their respective heirs, shall or will at any time hereafter assert any right, title, or interest, as heirs or heirs at law of the said Catherine M. Garcelon, to the property, real and personal, derived by her under the said last will and testament of the said Samuel Merritt"; and, doubtless for the purpose of making the foregoing agreement upon their part more effectual, the appellant and his brother, in the deed executed by them for the purpose of carrying out the compromise agreement, and which is to be construed as a part of such agreement, covenanted "to and with the said Catherine M. Garcelon, her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, administrators, and assigns," that they would not "in any manner, or to any extent, question, dispute, or contest any disposition of the property above mentioned or referred to, or any part thereof, or of any property which may be acquired therefrom or thereby which the said Catherine M. Garcelon may have made or may hereafter make by either deed or by her last will and testament." There is not the slightest contention that the parties to this agreement were not fully competent to contract in relation to their property rights, and the agreement itself recites that it was entered into "after full examination into the facts, and full and deliberate consideration of the premises"; and there is nothing upon its face to suggest that the differences thereby compromised were not settled upon fair and equitable terms, nor was there any offer to prove extrinsic facts for the purpose of im-peaching the agreement in this or any other respect. The questions for decision, therefore, are whether such an agreement, based upon a full and adequate consideration, and entered into with deliberation by parties in every way competent to contract, is valid and binding; and, if valid, is the petitioner thereby estopped from maintaining this proceeding to revoke the probate of the alleged will of his aunt? The agreement, as we have seen, in addition to his promise not to contest the will of his uncle, Dr. Merritt, contains two distinct covenants upon the part of the petitioner: First, that he would not thereafter, as an heir at law of his aunt, Mrs. Garcelon, assert any right to the property derived by her under the will of his said uncle; and, second, that he would never in any manner question or dispute any disposition which she might make of that property, by deed or will. The first of these covenants is in substance and effect an agreement upon the part of the petitioner to relinquish, as heir apparent, his expectancy in that portion of the estate of his aunt to which the agreement related. It is claimed by the petitioner that such an agreement is void under sections 700 and 1045 of the Civil Code of this state, the first of which provides that "a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, is not to be deemed an interest of any kind," and the latter section declaring that "a mere possibility, not coupled with an interest, cannot be transferred."

These sections simply state the well-settled and well-understood rule of the common law upon the subject to which they relate. At common law, a mere possibility, such as the expectancy of an heir apparent, was not regarded as such an existing interest as to be the subject of a sale or capable of passing by assignment; but in equity the rule was different, and agreements for the sale or release of expectancies, if fairly made, and for an adequate consideration, were enforced upon the death of the ancestor; and it was not the intention of the legislature, in enacting the sections of the Code just referred to, to make any change in the rule by which courts of equity were theretofore governed in dealing with this class of contracts. This construction of these sections is in harmony with section 5 of the same Code, which declares that the provisions of that Code, "so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes or the common law, must be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments"; and also follows the presumption that the legislature, in the enactment of statutes, does not intend to overturn long-established principles of law unless such intention is made to clearly appear, either by express declaration or by necessary implication. Mr. Story, in section 1040c (volume 2) of his work on Equity Jurisprudence, states the equitable rule upon the subject of such agreements as the one before us as follows: "So, even the naked possibility or expectancy of an heir to his ancestor's estate may become the subject of a contract of sale or settlement; and in such a case, if made bona fide for a valuable consideration, it will be enforced in equity after the death of the ancestor; not, indeed, as a trust attaching to the estate, but as a right of contract." And see, also, as sustaining the same proposition, Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) §§ 168, 953; Bacon v. Bonham, 33 N. J. Eq. 614. In accordance with this principle, it has been held in many cases in which the question has arisen that an heir may release to the ancestor his expected share in the ancestor's estate. Thus in Havens v. Thompson, 26 N. J. Eq. 383, it was held that a son, by such release to his father, estopped himself from claiming as heir any portion of the father's estate. In that case it appeared that the father gave to the son the sum of $600, upon the condition that it should be accepted in full satisfaction of his interest in the father's estate, the son executing a receipt stating that the money was received "in full in lieu of dowry." The chancellor construed the receipt in view of the facts surrounding its execution as a release, and said: "I regard this instrument as an agreement by which Benjamin, in consideration of the money paid to him by his father, agreed with the latter that he would make no claim to a share of his father's estate, should the latter die intestate, but therefrom would be debarred by that instrument, made upon what was a satisfactory compensating consideration. Such an agreement may be made between a father and his child in regard to the interest of the latter in the estate of the former, and effect will be given to it in equity according to the intention of the parties." And the rule thus declared was afterwards approved in Brands v. De Witt, 44 N. J. Eq. 545, 10 Atl. 181, and 14 Atl. 894. In Bishop v. Davenport, 58 Ill. 105, it was shown that the father in his lifetime gave to certain of his children property, and took from them an instrument in writing in which they acknowledged that such property was received by them as their full share of his estate. The father died intestate, and the court, in passing upon the question, held that the transaction was not an advancement, and that the instrument signed by the children operated as a release by them of their expectancies in their father's estate, and should be upheld as such. So, also, in Kershaw v. Kershaw, 102 Ill. 307, a son accepted from his father a deed, the deed reciting that "said land is deeded as an advancement to said John W. Kershaw out of the estate of said Joseph Kershaw, and the deed is accepted by said John as his full share of his father's estate." The court in that case held that the acceptance of the deed bound the son to the same extent as if he had signed it, and that the conveyance did not constitute an advancement, but operated as "an executed contract whereby an heir released his expectancy in his father's estate in consideration of a present grant of real estate." And it was further there decided that the son was estopped from making any further claim as heir at law to any portion of his father's estate. In Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 443, 24 N. E. 956, the court in a well-considered opinion held that a husband might for an adequate consideration enter into a valid contract with his wife releasing all his interest as her heir in her lands and personal estate, saying: "There can be no question, then, that the complainant's contingent interest or expectancy, as the heir of his wife, in her real and personal estate, was a proper subject of contract; and, the contract in question having been made upon a valuable consideration by parties capable of contracting with each other, and, so far as the evidence shows, with entire fairness, it should, as to such contingent interest or expectancy, be enforced according to its terms." And in Powers' Appeal, 63 Pa. St. 443, it was decided that a father might make a contract with his child which would bar the latter as his heir at law, and that when property had been received by the son from the father, the son giving a receipt reciting that the same was received in full of his share as heir at law, he was thereby estopped, upon the death of the father, from claiming any further part of his estate. Without multiplying authorities upon this point,—and many others might be cited to the same effect,—it is sufficient to say that we are entirely satisfied with the rule declared in the foregoing cases, and hold that it is competent for an heir, under the limitations stated in that rule, to relinquish to his ancestor all interest in the estate of the latter which might otherwise in the future vest in him as such heir. In Crum v. Sawyer, 132 Ill. 462, 24 N. E. 956, it was held that such a relinquishment would inure to the benefit of the other heirs, whether mentioned or not, and in all the cases we have cited the release so made to the ancestor was enforced in behalf of other heirs. In this case, however, it is claimed by the petitioner that the pleadings admit that he and his brother are the only heirs of Mrs. Garcelon; and it is thence argued—First, that, if in fact she died intestate, her property must, under the statutes of this state, be distributed to them, notwithstanding they may by the compromise agreement have relinquished to her their rights as such heirs; and, second, that the defendants are strangers, in no way in privity with that agreement, and therefore are not entitled to claim the benefits of its provisions. In the view we take of this case, it is not necessary to determine what force, if any, there might be in the first of these contentions, if Mrs. Garcelon had in fact died intestate, and the question arose upon the distribution of her estate as that of an intestate. It is admitted that Mrs. Garcelon executed, apparently in due form of law, a document which upon its face purports to be her will, and which, if valid, disposed of all her estate, consisting of all the property referred to in the compromise agreement of which she died possessed, and the same has been duly admitted to probate as her last will and testament. So long as this judgment stands, it cannot be said that the deceased died intestate, and, unless the petitioner succeeds by this proceeding in annulling the said judgment of probate, the question as to what would have been his rights as her heir at law if she had died intestate can never arise. The court below held that the petitioner was estopped by the compromise agreement from attacking the validity of the alleged will of the deceased, and this was one of the grounds upon which the court based its judgment dismissing the present proceeding.

3. This conclusion of the learned judge of that court was doubtless based upon a consideration of that part of the compromise agreement in which the petitioner covenanted with Mrs. Garcelon, "her heirs, devisees, legatees, executors, and administrators," that he would "never, in any manner or to any extent, question, dispute, or contest any disposition of the property" mentioned in that agreement "which she may have made, or may hereafter make, by either deed or by her last will and testament." If this covenant is valid, and is sufficiently broad to apply to and include the will in controversy here, it is clear that the defendants, as executors of the disputed will, are in such privity with the alleged testator that they have the right, as against the petitioner, to invoke the benefit of this covenant not to contest (Dakin v. Dakin, 97 Mich. 289, 56 N. W. 552); and it would follow that the court below was correct in its ruling upon this point. This particular covenant was evidently introduced for the purpose of supplementing the other part of the compromise agreement, in which the petitioner relinquished to his aunt his expectancy as her heir at law, and was intended by him as a complete relinquishment or release of all right to contest any will which his aunt might in fact sign, and purporting to be executed in due form, and which right of contest might otherwise, as a matter of possibility, come to him in the future as her heir at law; and the covenant is not to be construed as applying solely to such a will as the petitioner might deem valid, or which might be adjudged valid after a long and tedious litigation of the question of its validity. To place such a construction upon the agreement would deprive it of all practical meaning and effect. The agreement not to contest was made in view of the fact that under the law an heir is given the right to contest, upon various grounds, the validity of the document which may have been intended by the ancestor as his last will and testament, some of these grounds often involving doubtful questions of law and fact, the latter, perhaps, depending for their decision upon the conflicting evidence of witnesses, and also upon the verdict of a jury which may be more or less influenced by sympathy or caprice; and the covenant of the petitioner was that he would not bring such questions concerning any will made by his aunt into dispute or litigation. Such being its true construction, we are brought to the consideration of the question, is such an agreement upon the part of an heir binding upon him? The covenant not to sue for a breach or for the enforcement of an existing obligation operates as a release of such obligation; and, unless void as against public policy (a point to be hereafter noticed), this covenant not to contest the will of Mrs. Garcelon should be given effect as a release by the petitioner of his right to make such contest. It is true that at common law a mere possibility was not the subject of release, and that a release was held to operate only upon a present interest. Pierce v. Parker, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 80; Reed v. Tarbell, Id. 93. A covenant made by one person not to sue another for or in respect to any matter arising out of future contracts between them, or by reason of any future tort, would of course be utterly void, as the parties to such contract could not have in view any particular subject-matter, or have any conception of the amount which might be involved in the causes of action upon which the covenant was to operate. But in this case the subject-matter of the covenant was in the mind of the contracting parties, and was in its nature no more fleeting and unsubstantial than the assignment of an expectancy; and the same principle upon which courts of equity uphold such assignments will sustain the proposition that a release by an heir apparent of his contingent right to contest the will of his ancestor may also be enforced when fairly obtained, and for an adequate consideration. The two contracts stand upon the same basis. Both relate to possibilities, and both concern the same subject-matter,—the expectancy of the heir; the purpose of the latter agreement being to take away from the heir any right to assert any claim to such expectancy, in the face of a will bequeathing or devising it to another,—and both are equally entitled to enforcement.

4. It is argued, however, in behalf of petitioner, that such an agreement is void because against public policy; and in support of this contention the case of Insurance Co. v. Morse, 20 Wall. 451, is cited. In that case it was held that an agreement by an insurance company, in its contract of insurance, not to litigate in the federal courts any claim arising upon the contract, was void; and in Nute v. Insurance Co., 6 Gray, 174, a similar question was decided in the same way, and the reasons for such a conclusion were very fully and carefully stated by Chief Justice Shaw in a clear and comprehensive opinion. But we can see no analogy between these cases and the one before us now.

5. The petitioner further contends that it is against the policy of the law that the will of an insane person or a will executed under the influence of fraud or duress should be established as a valid will, and that this particular covenant is void, because it attempts to bind the petitioner not to show such facts, and thereby to set aside the will in controversy. In passing upon this question, we start with the proposition laid down by Sir G. Jessell, M. R., in his opinion in the case of Registering Co. v. Sampson, L. R. 19 Eq. 465: "It must not be forgotten that you are not to extend arbitrarily those rules which say that a given contract is void, as being against public policy, because, if there is one thing which, more than another, public policy requires, it is that men of full age and competent understanding shall have the utmost liberty of contract, and that their contracts, when entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held sacred, and shall be enforced by courts of justice. Therefore, you have this paramount public policy to consider: that you are not lightly to interfere with this freedom of contract." The sole object which the parties had in mind in entering into the covenant now under consideration was to secure to Mrs. Garcelon the right to make such disposition of her property as she might desire, free from the contingency that her right so to do, or the fact that in so disposing of it she acted freely or voluntarily, might after her death be disputed by the petitioner or his brother; and, as before stated, the agreement was made in contemplation of the fact that controversies concerning the validity of wills or deeds frequently involve doubtful questions of fact, and that, by reason of false testimony or the weakness of juries, their final decision may not always be in accordance with the actual justice and truth of the case; and we see no reason why persons whose rights of property would be affected by the decision of such questions may not in advance, for an adequate consideration, waive their right to engage in such litigation. The contract is one that concerns the parties alone, and does not appear to us to be against public policy. There never has been any doubt that parties actually engaged in contesting a will upon any of the grounds upon which such contests are permitted may compromise all matters in difference arising out of such contest, and allow the disputed will to be established, and such agreements, when fairly made, are always enforced. It is difficult to understand why such a compromise agreement is any less against public policy than an agreement made by an heir apparent with his ancestors not to contest a future will of the latter. In addition to this, we think the principle upon which the case of

Cooke v. Turner, 14 Sim. 493, was decided, is sufficient to sustain the validity of this covenant, so far as relates to the question of public policy. The question in that case arose upon a condition in a will to the effect that, if a devisee should dispute the will, or the competency of the testator to make it, the devise thereby given to her should be revoked. It was argued in that case that such a condition was void, as against public policy, because having a tendency to set up the wills of insane persons by restraining heirs named therein as devisees from contesting such wills; but the court in that case said: "There appears to be no more reason why a person may not be restrained by a condition from disputing sanity than from disputing any other doubtful question, whether of fact or of law, on which the title to a devise or grant may depend." And the court then, after calling attention to certain conditions which are void as against public policy when appearing in a will, such as a condition in restraint of marriage or of lawful trade, proceeded to say: "But in the case of a condition such as that before us, the state has no interest whatever apart from the interest of the parties themselves. There is no duty, either perfect or imperfect, on the part of an heir, to contest his ancestor's sanity. It matters not to the state whether the land is enjoyed by the heir or by the devisee; and we conceive, therefore, that the law leaves parties to make just what contracts and engagements they may think expedient as to raising or not raising questions of law or of fact among themselves, the sole object of which is to give the enjoyment of the property to one claimant rather than to another." This reasoning is applicable to the case at bar, for it must be admitted that that which is valid by way of condition, whether in a will or deed, would also be valid as a covenant contained in a contract. See, also, as sustaining the decision in Cooke v. Turner, just cited, Bradford v. Bradford, 19 Ohio St. 546, 2 Jarm. Wills, *902, 2 Redf. Wills, 679.

We have given to the earnest and able argument of the attorneys for the petitioner careful consideration, and, while we have not noticed in detail all the points urged by them in support of this appeal, the views above set forth are really conclusive of every question discussed by them. Our conclusion upon the whole case is that the compromise agreement is valid in the particulars discussed in the foregoing opinion, and that the petitioner is thereby estopped from maintaining this proceeding; and it follows therefrom that the superior court did not err in refusing petitioner's demand for a trial of the issues relating to the sanity of the testator, or her freedom from undue influence. If the petitioner was not entitled to litigate these matters, the orderly course of procedure required that the court should dismiss his petition, as it did. The respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal, but, in view of our conclusion upon the merits, it is not necessary to discuss the grounds of such motion. We think the motion should be denied. Motion to dismiss appeal denied, and judgment affirmed.

FARNUM v. WARNER, County Treasurer.
(No. 19,504.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

COUNTY AUDITOR—COMPENSATION—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

1. County government act, § 182, as re-enacted March 31, 1891, providing that the salary of auditor in counties of the twentieth class shall be $1,800 per annum, "and one clerk at a monthly salary of not exceeding fifty dollars," authorizes a salary of $1,800 per annum, plus the salary, not exceeding $50 per month, of one clerk employed by the auditor.

2. A statute allowing a certain compensation to certain county officers in all counties of a certain class is not local or special legislation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. Gregg, Judge.

Petition by Mattie A. Farnum against E. L. Warner, county treasurer, for a writ of mandate to compel defendant to issue a warrant for salary. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Knight & Heggerty, for appellant. Venable & Goodchild, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is a proceeding by writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as treasurer of San Luis Obispo county, to pay an auditor's warrant in favor of plaintiff for $50, alleged to be her salary as clerk of the auditor of said county for the month of July, 1893. The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and dismissed the proceeding; and whether or not the court erred in sustaining the demurrer is the only question involved in this appeal.

C. A. Farnum was elected auditor of said county in November, 1892, and on January 10, 1893, after having qualified and entered upon the duties of that office, appointed and employed the plaintiff as his official clerk, at a salary of $50 per month, which salary was paid by the treasurer, upon warrants of the auditor, for the first five months after her appointment; but payment of her warrant for July, 1893, was refused. Section 182 of the county government act, as re-enacted March 31, 1891, provides: "In counties of the twentieth class the officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their office, or as ex-officio officers, the following salaries, to wit: (1) County clerk, * * * (2) sheriff, * * * (3) recorder, * * * (4) auditor, one thousand eight hundred dollars per annum, and one clerk at a monthly salary of not exceeding fifty dollars." St. 1891, p. 374. And the county of San Luis Obispo belongs to the twentieth class. This, though not so explicit as it might have been, means that the salary of the auditor is to be $1,800 per annum, plus the salary of one clerk, employed by the auditor, not exceeding $50 per month. It does not compel the auditor to employ a clerk, but permits him to do so, limiting the salary, however, to $50 per month. So understood, the fourth subdivision of the section regulates the salary of the auditor in a manner not objectionable upon any constitutional ground, whatever may be said of its wisdom or policy; and it admits of no other rational construction than that above given. The auditor needed no express authority to employ a mere clerk; and if such authority had been requisite it was clearly implied in section 61 of the same act (St. 1891, p. 314), which authorizes the auditor to appoint deputies (whose services may be merely clerical); and the petition shows that plaintiff was appointed and qualified in the manner prescribed by said section 61 for the appointment of deputies. It is, therefore, clear that it was not the intention of the legislature merely to authorize the employment of a clerk to be paid by the auditor from a salary of $1,800. The language of the statute clearly expresses the intention to add something to the salary of $1,800. What was intended to be thus added? To say that merely a clerk was intended to be added to a specific salary would be nonsense, if not absurd. But to say that the salary of one clerk not exceeding $50 per month was intended to be added to $1,800 would be both sensible and rational. The evident reason why the legislature did not fix the salary of the auditor at a specified or lump sum, out of which he must pay his clerk or deputy, was that it could not be foreseen whether or not the auditor would appoint a clerk or deputy, nor whether he would pay a salary of $50 or less. Yet the compensation of the auditor is so regulated that in no event can he receive for his services more than the net sum of $1,800 per annum; and, if he employ more assistants than one clerk, he must pay them out of the $1,800 per annum allowed him. Such a regulation of the compensation of a county officer is complete obedience to the behest of the constitution in this respect. Nor has it been otherwise decided by this court. Nor is this regulation of the compensation of the auditor open to the objection that it is local or special legislation, since it applies uniformly to all counties of the twentieth class. Welsh v. Bramlet, 98 Cal. 220, 33 Pac. 66; Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. 1081. So much in answer to the arguments of counsel for respondent in support of the demurrer.

I think the court erred in sustaining the demurrer, and that for this reason the judgment should be reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. LEHMANN. (No. 21,133.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

MARRIAGE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—CONSENT AND COHABITATION.

On trial for seduction under promise of marriage, evidence that prior to a day which was set for the marriage, and while no marriage previous to such day was contemplated, defendant, without objection from plaintiff, introduced her as his wife, and subsequently registered her name as his wife, and occupied the same room with her, at a hotel, where the alleged offense was committed, does not show the "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties or obligations" which, in addition to consent, is necessary, under Civ. Code, § 55, to constitute a valid marriage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

E. Lehmann was convicted of seduction under promise of marriage, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Gould and W. R. Jacobs, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HAYNES, C. Appellant was found guilty of the seduction of Rosa Hunzeker under promise of marriage, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $500. He now appeals from said judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. Appellant contends that at the time of the commission of the alleged offense he and Rosa were husband and wife; and whether such relation existed is the sole question made upon this appeal.

The defendant, a man 43 years of age, lived near Lemoore, in Tulare county. In August, 1893, he visited a marriage bureau in San Francisco, where he was introduced to Rosa Hunzeker. During this visit of defendant to the city, mutual promises to marry were made between them. Defendant then returned to his ranch in Tulare county, and while there wrote several letters to Rosa, appropriate to such relation only. In October defendant again came to the city, and at this time it was arranged that on Saturday they should leave the city, go to Lemoore, and there be married on the following Tuesday. Before leaving the city, defendant purchased carpets for his house, the carpets being selected by Rosa. Defendant also hired a man and his wife, who were to accompany them, the man to work on the ranch, and the wife to assist Rosa.

It was further arranged that they should go by way of Stockton, defendant saying that he wished to purchase lumber there for the erection of a dry house. Defendant bought a steamer ticket for a stateroom from San Francisco to Stockton, purporting to be for himself and wife, and upon the boat introduced her as his wife, she being silent and making no remonstrance. Upon the witness stand Rosa denied that she saw the steamer tickets, but admitted that on the way to the boat defendant said he had two rooms, "one for those people, and one for us." She further testified that defendant said on the boat that they would marry on Tuesday; that she did not want to go to the room, and wept; and that defendant said she should not be so foolish, there were but two days more. Upon cross-examination she said, in reply to leading questions, that they occupied the stateroom as man and wife, and were so registered at the hotel in Stockton, and there occupied the same room, and she was introduced as Mrs. Lehmann, and upon the boat and at the hotel had sexual intercourse with defendant. The testimony of Mrs. Skelly, with whom Rosa lived up to the day she went to Stockton, is explicit as to the intended marriage at Lemoore, and that defendant did not claim or pretend that they were then man and wife. Mrs. Skelly suggested to defendant that it was not prudent for Rosa to go with him without being first married, to which defendant replied: "I have a great many men working for me upon my ranch, and I am losing a great deal of money. I have everything prepared up there to be married next Tuesday." There is not a scintilla of evidence of any agreement or understanding that they should become husband and wife before the designated day, or before their arrival at Lemoore, nor without the usual solemnization, unless it is found in the introduction by defendant of Rosa as his wife, and their occupying the same room upon the boat and at the hotel, and the admitted copulation. The defendant left Rosa at Stockton, without explanation, and, so far as the record discloses, did not again see her until the trial of this case.

Section 55 of our Civil Code is as follows: "Marriage is a personal relation arising out of a civil contract, to which the consent of parties capable of making it is necessary. Consent alone will not constitute marriage. It must be followed by a solemnization or by a mutual assumption of marital rights, duties or obligations." What constitutes a "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations" has been so fully discussed and repeatedly declared by this court that a brief reference to some of these cases is all that is either necessary or profitable now. In Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 9, 16 Pac. 345, it was said that "the contract out of which the marriage relation arises must be a contract then and there to become husband and wife." But in this case there was no such contract, unless the copulation and the introduction may be held to be sufficient to show such contract to have been made. In Kilburn v. Kilburn, 89 Cal. 50, 26 Pac. 636, it was said: "The mutual agreement of the parties to live together in the professed relation of husband and wife is essential to create a contract of marriage, and the contract, therefore, imposes upon the parties to it the obligation to do so; and, where the agreement to marry is not followed by solemnization, there is no assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations, within the meaning of section 55 of the Civil Code, until the commencement of cohabitation by the parties to the agreement; and by cohabitation is not meant simply the gratification of the sexual passion, but 'to live or dwell together, to have the same habitation, so that where one lives and dwells there does the other live and dwell also.' * * * Mere copulation without such cohabitation is insufficient." See, also, Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 670, 22 Pac. 26, 131, and People v. Beevers, 99 Cal. 286, 33 Pac. 844.

Here there was no cohabitation. The parties were in transit from San Francisco to Lemoore. Passengers using a boat for a short trip, as a means of conveyance, or transient guests at a hotel during a short journey, are not habitants of the boat or hotel. It is true that registering upon the boat and at the hotel as husband and wife, introductions as such, and occupying the same room, is evidence tending to show that such relation existed; but, taken alone, is wholly insufficient to establish the existence of so sacred and important a relation, which so directly concerns the public morals. Such conduct, though natural and proper where the parties are in fact married, is for that very reason often resorted to for the concealment of relations purely meretricious. Indeed, if such conduct were held conclusive proof of marriage, the number of persons who could be legally convicted of bigamy would be alarmingly increased. In this case, neither the prosecutrix nor the defendant claimed or asserted that there was a marriage, or that the relation of husband and wife ever existed between them, by any act or word done or uttered after the defendant left the prosecutrix at the hotel in Stockton. There is no conflict in the evidence, and the question is therefore one of law, whether the facts developed by the evidence constituted a marriage or created the relation of husband and wife; and this question must be answered in the negative.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PEOPLE v. MORASCO. (No. 21,165.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—APPEAL.

An appeal from a judgment in a capital case will not be affirmed merely because no counsel has appeared to support the appeal by brief or oral argument.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Rico Morasco was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Dobbins, Oscar Coughlan, and J. A. Spinetti, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. His appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. We are furnished with an affidavit of the county clerk of the county in which the case was tried, which shows that a copy of the record was served on "the attorney of record" of the defendant on the 20th day of August, 1894, and we are asked upon this affidavit to affirm the judgment and order appealed from, upon the ground that no brief has been filed in behalf of the defendant, and no counsel has appeared to suggest any error in the proceedings. The affidavit, however, is insufficient. The gentleman upon whom the record was served is not the attorney who acted as counsel for the defendant at the time of his arraignment and plea or during the trial, and his name is not signed to the notice of appeal. And, besides, we should not feel justified, in a capital case, in affirming the judgment without an examination of the record, merely because no counsel has appeared in support of the appeal by brief or oral argument. In view of the gravity of the case, we have directed further notice to be given to the attorneys who signed the notice of appeal, and, they having failed to respond, we have examined the record, in which we discover no error. The judgment and order of the superior court are therefore affirmed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to take the proceedings necessary for the execution of its judgment.

DUFFY v. DUFFY. (No. 15,495.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

SUIT FOR LAND—CHANGE OF VENUE—APPEAL—AMENDMENT OF RECORD.

1. Const. art. 6, § 5, providing that an action to recover land must be "commenced" in the county where the land is situated, does not prohibit such a suit, after having been so commenced, from being removed to another county for trial.

2. Error in the admission of evidence is not ground for reversal if its exclusion would not have changed the result.

3. Where the admission of certain testimony is assigned as error, the court may allow respondent to amend appellant's transcript by inserting evidence tending to show that the exclusion of such testimony would not have changed the result.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Bridget Duffy, as executrix of the estate of James A. Duffy, deceased, against Michael Duffy. Judgment for defendant. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for appellant. Estee & Miller, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought by Bridget Duffy, as executrix of James A. Duffy, against Michael Duffy, for the purpose of compelling the defendant to convey to her, as such executrix, certain real estate situate in the city of Oakland, Alameda county, which, it is alleged, was bought by the said James in September, 1888, with his own money, but which was conveyed to the defendant, who, it is alleged, took such conveyance in trust for James, and that he still holds the same in trust. The answer alleged that the whole of the purchase money paid therefor was the money of the defendant, and denied that the estate had any interest in the real estate, or that defendant held it in trust. The cause was tried by the court, and findings and judgment were for defendant, and this appeal is from the judgment and an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. No question is made as to the sufficiency of the findings to support the judgment, nor as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, but it is insisted (1) that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; and (2) that the court erred in admitting certain evidence over plaintiff's objection, and in refusing her motion to strike out the same evidence.

1. The real estate, the subject of the action, is situate in Alameda county. The action was commenced in that county, but was afterwards transferred to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for trial; the order changing the place of trial being based on a stipulation of counsel for the respective parties, the ground therein stated being "that the convenience of witnesses would be promoted by such change."

This question is conclusively settled by the case of Hancock v. Burton, 61 Cal. 70, where it was said: "The constitution (section 5 of article 6) does not provide that the action must be tried, but simply that it must be commenced in the county in which the land is situated; and we are of the opinion that section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes the change of the place of trial where the judge of a court in which the action is brought is disqualified to try the case, is not obnoxious to any provision found in the constitution." See, also, Warner v. Warner, 100 Cal. 11, 15, 34 Pac. 523. In Upton v. Woolsey, 87 Cal. 38, 25 Pac. 154, the action was to foreclose a lien upon lands in Tulare county, and was commenced and proceeded to judgment in Fresno county. Upon appeal the judgment was reversed, and the action dismissed, upon the ground "that no court has jurisdiction to entertain an action like the one at bar unless it has been commenced in the county where the land is situated." In Fritts v. Camp, 94 Cal. 393, 29 Pac. 867, cited by appellant, a similar conclusion was reached. None of the cases cited by appellant sustain her contention. They all go either to the point that in "actions for the recovery of possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate," if the action be commenced in a county other than that in which the real estate is situated, the court is without jurisdiction; or that, where such action is commenced in the proper county, the place of trial will not be changed upon the ground that the defendant resides in another county, as may be done in personal actions. While the constitution very properly provides that the actions concerning real estate therein mentioned should be commenced in the county in which it, or some part of it, is situated, it could not have been intended that, under the circumstances mentioned in subdivisions 2, 3, and 4 of sections 397, the place of trial could not be changed.

2. The deceased, James A. Duffy, had long been a resident of California, and the defendant, Michael, was and still is a resident of the state of Michigan. The deposition of the defendant was taken by the plaintiff upon written interrogatories, but upon the trial she declined to read the deposition, and the same was read on behalf of the defendant. Plaintiff objected to the reading of portions of the answers to three of the interrogatories in chief, and afterwards moved to have the same portions stricken out. Her objections were overruled, and the motions to strike out were denied. We think it is not necessary to discuss the correctness of these rulings, inasmuch as the substance of the evidence objected to appeared in other portions of the deposition to which no objection is urged, as well as by the testimony of another witness. It appeared without conflict or contradiction that defendant had at different times sent large sums of money to his brother

James for investment in California, and that James held defendant's power of attorney. The original deed from the vendors of the property in question to the defendant as grantee was not produced, but a certified copy showing that it was recorded in the county of Alameda at the request of the grantee was put in evidence by the plaintiff. The answers objected to were to the effect that the defendant had received a letter from his brother James in October, 1888, informing him of the purchase of the property; that he had bought it for him, and taken the deed to him, and stating the price paid at $4,900. The real controversy in the case was as to whether the money paid for the property was the money of James or of the defendant, Michael; and in answer to an interrogatory in the same deposition the defendant testified: "I did not personally pay the money to the Owens, but James A. Duffy had money in his hands at this time belonging to me, and what money was paid to the Owens was paid by him for me." No error was assigned in relation to this interrogatory or answer; and Mr. Estee, a witness on behalf of defendant, testified that the deceased, at the time of the transaction, informed him that he was purchasing the property for the defendant with the defendant's money. The controlling facts in this case are wholly undisputed: That the defendant sent from Michigan to his brother James, who resided here, large sums of money to be invested for the defendant; that James held a power of attorney from defendant; that the deed of the property in question recited a consideration of $4,900 paid by the defendant, the grantee therein named, and the deed was recorded at the request of the grantee, showing that in the matter of recording the deed, at least, James acted as the authorized agent of defendant. As against these facts there appeared—First, that the business was transacted by James; and, second, that about the time of the purchase he sold certain stocks, and from that source may have had sufficient money of his own to make the purchase. In Anthony v. Chapman, 65 Cal. 73, 2 Pac. 889, it was said: "The deed recites that the consideration was paid by Mary A. Smith, the grantee therein; and, while the express declarations of the deed in that respect may be controlled by parol proof alone, it is well settled that such evidence must be full, clear, and satisfactory." See, also, Millard v. Hathaway, 27 Cal. 142; Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johns. Ch. 590; Whitemore v. Leonard, 70 Me. 276. It must be apparent that the exclusion of the evidence sought to be stricken out could not have changed a single finding of the court or the result of the case. A plaintiff who fails to make out a case is not prejudiced by any error which does not prevent him from making out a case. McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 116, 25 Pac. 266; In re Spencer, 96 Cal. 449, 450, 31 Pac. 453. In the case last cited it was said: "But it is difficult to conceive how the verdict and judgment could have been different if the court had ruled throughout the trial as asked by appellant; and in such case a judgment will not be reversed, even though some errors have occurred during the progress of the trial."

Appellant contends that, in case of affirmance of the judgment and order appealed from, respondent should be taxed with a large proportion of the cost of printing the transcript. The statement on motion for new trial, prepared and proposed by appellant, was very short, reciting that plaintiff gave evidence tending to sustain the allegations of her complaint, and rested; that the defendant thereupon introduced evidence tending to disprove the allegations of the complaint, and to sustain the allegations of his answer, and as part of such evidence offered said deposition, and set out the three questions and answers hereinbefore noticed. The defendant proposed amendments by incorporating in the statement the greater part of the evidence in the case, and the court required the insertion of other portions. We think the defendant had the right to have so much of the evidence inserted as would show that the exclusion of the testimony sought to be stricken out would not have changed the result, and was not obliged to rest upon the correctness of the ruling upon the motion to strike out for the affirmance of the judgment and order appealed from, and that the court did not err in permitting the amendments proposed by defendant, nor in requiring the insertion of other evidence pointed out by the court. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

LUNDY et al. v. DELMAS et al. (No. 15,556.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

STATE UNIVERSITY—BOARD OF REGENTS — INCORPORATION—LIABILITIES.

1. The members of the board of regents of the state university are not individually liable to one injured by a telegraph wire fallen from a line maintained by the university along a highway.

2. The regents of the state university constitute a corporation, the organic act of March 23, 1868, having provided that they should incorporate, and they having taken steps to incorporate and exercise corporate powers.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Isaac Lundy and others against D. M. Delmas and others for injuries causing death. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. B. Mhoon and D. M. Delmas, for appellants. Frs. E. Spencer, for appellees.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants, who are 16 of the regents of the University of California, to recover damages against them, in their individual capacity, for the death of Daniel Lundy, plaintiffs' father. It is alleged in the complaint: "That on and for a long time prior to the 16th day of November, 1891, each and all of said defendants were, and from thence hitherto have been, and yet are, the regents of the University of California, and during all of said time were acting as such, and exercised the duties and assumed the obligations of such regents and as the board of such regents; that, among other things, said defendants, as said regents and as such board of regents, all of said time, as part of their power and duty, constructed and during all of said time maintained a telegraph and telephone line from the city of San José, in said county of Santa Clara, to the Lick Observatory on Mount Hamilton in said county, which said line consisted of wires strung upon poles planted in the ground along and near the public highway; that said defendants, as said regents, so negligently maintained said telegraph and telephone line that by their culpable negligence and inattention they allowed divers of said poles thereof to rot and decay away, and to fall to the ground by reason of their rotten condition; that a short time prior to said 16th day of November, 1891, one or more of said poles had become rotted, as aforesaid, and by reason of such rotting allowed to fall to the ground in such manner and place that the said wires attached thereto were brought across the public highway in such near position to the ground as to endanger the lives of persons traveling thereon; that said wires were so negligently left in said dangerous position by said defendants, and that by reason thereof one Daniel Lundy, who was then on said 16th day of November, 1891, traveling along said highway, was without any fault on his part caught by said wires and thrown to the ground, and instantly killed." The case was tried before a jury, and the verdict was in favor of plaintiffs for $10,000, on which judgment was entered.

At the close of plaintiffs' evidence, the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds: "(1) The evidence shows that the 'Regents of the University of California' is, and has been since 1868, a corporation duly organized under the laws of this state; that at the time of the injuries complained of, and for more than a year before, said corporation owned, managed, and maintained the telegraph and telephone lines mentioned in the complaint; that the duty of maintaining said lines rested upon said corporation, and it alone is responsible for any negligence in the performance of said duty. * * *

(3) The action being based upon negligence,

It is necessary for the plaintiffs to show negligence on the part of the defendants; but there is no evidence of such negligence. The negligence shown, if any, is the negligence of the corporation called the 'Regents of the University of California,' which, as owner of the lines in question, owed to the plaintiffs' father the duty of maintaining said lines in proper condition. The defendants did not owe said duty, and cannot be found guilty of negligence from the fact—if fact it be—that said duty has not been discharged." The court denied the motion, and whether it erred in so doing or not is the only question presented for decision.

In 1868 an act was passed by the legislature, and approved March 23d, entitled "An act to create and organize the University of California." St. 1867-68, p. 248. Section 1 of the act declares that "a state university is hereby created pursuant to the requirements of section four, article nine of the constitution of the state of California"; and section 11 provides: "The general government and superintendence of the university shall vest in a board of regents to be denominated the 'Regents of the University of California,' who shall become incorporated under the general laws of the state of California by that corporate name and style. The said board shall consist of twenty-two members, all of whom shall be citizens and permanent residents of the state of California, as follows." There were to be six ex officio members, namely, the governor, lieutenant governor, superintendent of public instruction, and three others, "eight other appointed members, to be nominated by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate," and "eight additional honorary members, to be chosen from the body of the state by the official and appointed members." The section further provides that "no member of the board of regents or of the university shall be deemed a public officer by virtue of such membership, or required to take any oath of office; but his employment as such shall be held and deemed to be exclusively a private trust." On June 18, 1868, a certificate properly executed by the governor, lieutenant governor, and superintendent of public instruction was filed in the office of the secretary of state, certifying that, in pursuance of the provisions of the said act of March 23d, they, "three of the persons indicated in and by such enactment as trustees and directors of the corporation thereby directed to be created, have associated ourselves together for the purposes mentioned in and by said enactment, and to form a corporation for such purpose by the name and style designated in and by said enactment, which is the 'Regents of the University of California.'" By section 343 of the Political Code, which took effect January 1, 1873, it is provided: "The number and designation of the civil executive officers are as follows: A governor, a private secretary for the governor, * * * twenty-two regents of the University of California"; and by section 9 of article 9 of the constitution it is provided: "The University of California shall constitute a public trust, and its organization and government shall be perpetually continued in the form and character prescribed by the organic act creating the same, passed March twenty-third, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight (and the several acts amendatory thereof)."

The first question is, did the regents, under the provisions of the organic act and the steps taken to incorporate, become a corporation? We think this question must be answered in the affirmative. At least, when they exercised corporate powers they became a corporation de facto, the validity of which could only be attacked and tested by proceedings on behalf of the people of the state. This conclusion seems to be fully warranted by the provision of the constitution above quoted, that "its organization and government shall be perpetually continued in the form and character prescribed by the organic act." The organization of the university, prescribed by the act referred to, was to be in form and character a corporation, denominated the "Regents of the University of California," and in that corporation the government of the university was to be vested.

This being so, the only remaining question is, were the defendants individually liable for the damages sustained by plaintiffs by reason of the death of their father? The rule undoubtedly is that public officers are answerable in damages to any one specially injured by their neglect or omission to perform the duties of their offices. But the defendants were not public officers. The act of March 23, 1868, declared that no member of the board of regents should be deemed a public officer by virtue of his membership, and the provision of the Political Code, naming the regents as "civil executive officers," was in effect abrogated by the constitutional provision above quoted. The question in hand has never, so far as we are advised, been before this court, but a similar question was before the court of appeals of the state of New York in the case of Bassett v. Fish, 75 N. Y. 303, and was very elaborately considered and discussed by Mr. Justice Folger. The action was brought against the defendants as trustees of a school district for negligence in suffering the floor of one of the recitation rooms in the schoolhouse in the district to become and remain out of repair, in consequence of which plaintiff, who was employed as a teacher in the school, stepped through a hole in the floor and was injured. It was held that under the statute the defendants constituted a corporation, and that, "for a neglect to perform a duty imposed upon such a corporation, the members of the board are not individually liable. The neglect is that of the corporate body, not of the individuals composing it, and the liability rests upon it."

We think that case was correctly decided, and it follows, therefore, that the court below should have granted the motion for nonsuit in this case. The judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

LAY v. PARSONS. (No. 15,318.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

ELECTION CONTEST—REVIEW ON APPEAL—INSUFFICIENT MARKING OF BALLOT.

1. In an election contest, a ruling excluding a ballot on account of the insufficiency of the marking will not be reviewed unless the record contain the original ballot, or a fac simile copy thereof, a verbal description of the mark being insufficient.

2. The law requiring a voter to place a cross opposite the name of each candidate for whom he votes is mandatory.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1122, providing that in an election contest the court shall be governed by the rules of law governing the determination of questions of law and fact, so far as applicable, the rulings of the trial court cannot be reviewed if exceptions are not taken thereto.

Election contest by Alfred G. Lay against Henry F. Parsons. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Spalsbury & Burke and Charles B. Younger, for appellant. C. N. Goldsby, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is a contest under section 1111 of the Code of Civil Procedure, involving the right of the parties hereto to the office of supervisor in district No. 1 in Santa Cruz county. The contest involved simply a question as to which of the parties had received the highest number of legal votes for that office at the general election in November, 1892, and the trial, as is usual in such instances, consisted substantially in a recount of the ballots from the precincts comprised within the supervisor district. The court found that the respondent had received 317 votes, and the appellant but 316, and, by its judgment, declared respondent elected. Defendant appeals from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions, in which the only questions presented are as to the correctness of rulings made by the lower court in counting certain ballots for respondent, which were objected to, and rejecting other ballots, which appellant claims he was entitled to have counted for him. The record is not such as enables us to review any of the alleged errors satisfactorily, while most of them are not open to review at all, by reason of appellant's failure to reserve exceptions to the rulings complained of.

Among the ballots produced at the trial was one described in the bill of exceptions as being a ballot "upon which there appeared in the blank margin opposite the name of the defendant an irregular blot, without the semblance of a cross, apparently made with the same ink with which all the other ballots were marked," and "that on said ballot, in the blank margin opposite the names of all candidates for supervisor other than defendant, no mark or stamp appears." The respondent objected to the counting of this ballot for appellant upon the ground that his name was not marked with a cross, as required by law, and it was rejected, and the action of the court is now assigned as error. We cannot say that there was any error in this ruling. It is manifest from the description of the ballot above given that a perfect apprehension and understanding of the alleged defect could be best had only by a visual inspection. This the court below had an opportunity to make, with the ballot before it, but this court has not, as neither the original ballot nor a copy is either incorporated into or accompanies the record. We have nothing by which to test the correctness of the conclusions of the court below but the word picture of the ballot, as it appeared to the judge who tried the case. The law requires the voter to mark his ballot by means of a stamp, by putting a cross opposite the name of each candidate thereon for whom he intends to vote. This provision of the law is, we think, mandatory, and no other method will satisfy it. The court below found that this ballot was not so marked, and we cannot, on the record as presented, disturb its finding in that regard. In instances involving defects like the one here complained of, in order to put this court as nearly as possible in possession of the facts as they appeared to the lower court, either the original ballot, authenticated and identified in some appropriate manner, and properly referred to in the bill of exceptions, should accompany the record, or a copy, by photographic or other process by which a fac simile can be produced, should be in the bill of exceptions. Certain ballots were produced before us at the argument, which appellant claimed to be the original ballots involved, but they were in no way identified or authenticated so as to entitle them to be considered by this court for any purpose. These considerations apply equally to the ruling of the court in excluding the ballot designated as "Ballot 3," from Branciforte precinct. The objectionable features of the ballot were, in all substantial respects, identical. These were the only rulings of the court to which any exception has been reserved.

Five other ballots were ruled upon adversely to the contention of appellant, but in none of the five instances did he take an exception. It is contended by appellant, however, that he is entitled to have these rulings reviewed, notwithstanding no exception was taken in the court below. His argument is that this is a case in which the people are interested in the result, and is not to be treated as an ordinary adversary proceeding; that if the lower court erred in any of its rulings the public is entitled to have it set right, whether any exception was preserved by the parties or not. We know of no case that has carried the doctrine invoked to the length contended for. We are aware that it has been held in several of these contested election cases that they are not to be regarded as of purely an adversary character; that the public has an interest in their proper determination, which will prevent their being disposed of otherwise than on their merits; and hence, that a default cannot be taken, or a dismissal had, which will preclude an examination into the merits of the controversy. Searcy v. Crow, 15 Cal. 117; Minor v. Kidder, 43 Cal. 229; Lord v. Dunster, 79 Cal. 477, 21 Pac. 865. But none of the cases carry this principle to the extent of holding, or even intimating, that the usual and ordinary rules for the introduction and taking of evidence, and other rules for the orderly conduct of judicial proceedings, do not apply as much to cases of this character as to any ordinary civil action. Not only has this always been the practice in such cases, but it is the rule provided by the Code itself. Section 1122 provides that "the court must be governed in the trial and determination of such contested election by the rules of law and evidence governing the determination of questions of law and fact, so far as the same may be applicable." We perceive no good reason why the rule as to preserving exceptions to adverse rulings is not, in its nature, as applicable here as in any other proceeding. Any other rule would but lead to confusion and uncertainty, and subserve no good purpose. We may add, however, that, notwithstanding the absence of exceptions in this case, we have taken occasion to examine the rulings in question, and find none which, in our judgment, should reverse the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA & N. R. CO. v. MECARTNEY. (No. 15,548.)

TAX SALE—APPLICATION FOR DEED—SUFFICIENCY OF NOTICE—RAILROAD PROPERTY—ASSESSMENT FOR TAXATION.

1. Pol. Code, § 3780, provides that redemption from a tax sale may be made within 12 months from the date of the purchase, "or" at any time before the filing of certain affidavits and the application for a deed. Section 3785 provides that 30 days before the time for redemption expires, or 30 days before the purchaser applies for a deed, he shall serve a notice stating "the time when the right of redemption will expire, or when the purchaser will apply for a deed." Held, that a notice stating that the time allowed by law for redemption will expire on a certain date, and, unless redeemed sooner, the purchaser will "hereafter" apply for a deed, is insufficient.

2. Under Const. art. 13, § 2, providing that "land" and the improvements thereon shall be separately assessed, assessments against a railroad, in which the description of the property assessed is the "land" occupied by the company as a right of way, "together with" the track, etc., are invalid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by the California & Nevada Railroad Company against A. Mecartney. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Moses G. Cobb and Edward J. Pringle, for appellant. N. Hamilton and R. M. F. Soto, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a suit to quiet plaintiff's title to a strip of land described as "that certain strip of land twelve and one-half (12½) miles in length, situate in the county of Contra Costa, state of California, commencing at a point on San Pablo creek, on land owned by H. Brockhurst, in said county, and running thence in a westerly and southerly direction to the Alameda county line, in said state, together with a railroad track thereon, and all the substructures and superstructures supporting the same, and the appurtenances, which during all said times were and now are used by said plaintiff to pass, repass, and occupy, with trains, engines, and cars belonging to it." The defendant pleads title acquired through a tax sale for taxes due for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals therefrom, and from an order denying a new trial. Respondent, to sustain the judgment, points out a great many alleged defects in defendant's pleading and in the evidence. We do not think it necessary to notice all of them, for, if any one is well founded, the judgment must be affirmed.

1. We think the "notice of redemption," as it is called, is insufficient. It is provided (section 3780, Pol. Code) that a redemption may be made within 12 months from the date of the purchase, or at any time prior to the filing of certain affidavits and the application for a deed. "Or" may be read "and," for it is evident that all the recited events must happen before the owner will be deprived of his right to redeem. The mode of applying for a deed is prescribed in section 3785, Pol. Code. It provides that 30 days before the time for redemption expires, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, the purchaser must serve upon the owner a notice in which, among other things, must be stated "the time when the right of redemption will expire, or when the purchaser will apply for a deed." The notice served by the defendant was, on this point, "that the time allowed by law for the redemption of said property will expire on the 14th day of May, A. D. 1892; and, unless redeemed sooner, the undersigned will hereafter apply to said tax collector for a deed." If by the phrase "time allowed by law for redemption" is meant when the 12 months from the purchase will expire, the time was incorrectly stated. If it is intended to indicate that the time for redemption will then be ended by the application for a deed, the statement is insufficient, because the notice immediately proceeds to state that the purchaser will at some indefinite time (hereafter) apply for a deed. Had the notice omitted to state anything in regard to the application for a deed, it is possible that the notice that the time for redemption would expire on the day named might be held to mean that the purchaser would then put an end to the right by applying for a deed. For the purchaser could not put an end to the period allowed for redemption except by the performance of the acts designated, one of which is the application for a deed. But a notice that at an indefinite time the purchaser will apply for a deed fixes no time when the right to redeem will expire.

2. If the foregoing were the only fatal objection to defendant's title, it would still leave him with a lien, and he could still give the required notice and demand his deed. But the decree is to the effect that defendant has no rights in the premises. It becomes necessary, therefore, to inquire whether the assessment is valid. The description in the assessment is: "The land claimed and occupied by the California and Nevada Railroad Company as a right of way for the California and Nevada Railroad, together with the track and all substructures and superstructures which support the same, comprising twelve and one-half miles of railroad, commencing at a point on San Pablo creek, on land owned by Henry Brockhurst, and running thence in a westerly and southerly direction to the Alameda county line, valued and assessed at $6,000 per mile. Value, $75,000; total value, $76,000; total tax, $975.00." Although land is here mentioned, still it is said that it, with the track and all substructures and superstructures, "comprises twelve and one-half miles of railroad," which is assessed at $6,000 per mile. There is no separate assessment of land and improvements, and it is contended that therefore the assessment is void. It is provided in the constitution (section 2, art. 13): "Land and the improvements thereon shall be separately assessed." In section 3617, Pol. Code, which is found in title 9 of the Code, in regard to revenue, are some definitions of terms as used in the Code. The second subdivision reads: "Second. The term 'real estate' includes (1) the possession of, claim to, and ownership of or right to the possession of land," etc. If the question were a new one, there might be some plausibility in claiming that the right of way acquired by a railroad company is not real estate, but a mere easement, leaving the title and even the right of possession subject to the easement in the landowner. That position would not help the appellant here. The right of way was valued as land, and as part of the railroad. If the land did not belong to the plaintiff, it was improperly assessed to it; if it did, or if the interest of the corporation in it is properly designated land, then, by virtue of the constitutional provision and the Code, both the roadway and the improvements (the roadbed, track, etc.) should have been assessed separately. Huntington v. Railroad Co., 2 Sawy. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 6,911, and cases there cited. Counsel for appellant cites several provisions from the Code in regard to the assessment of railroads by the state board of equalization, which seem to indicate that the roadway, roadbed, and rolling stock are to be valued together. This matter is fully explained in Railroad Co. v. State Board, 60 Cal. 12. The constitution provides a mode in which the state board shall fix its valuations. This must be construed, so far as it differs from the general rule, as an authorized exception. In the above case, reference is made to the Code provisions requiring the county assessor to specify and separately assess different species of property, and it is said: "It thus appears that while, as to assessments made by the assessor, the kinds are to be separately stated, the assessment by the state board of the franchise, roadbed, etc., is entered in one column, and as a single item." There may be nothing in the point that the right of way cannot pass, because the franchise is not sold with the right of way. If the statute authorizes such sale, possibly there is nothing more to be said. But it is somewhat difficult to determine what a purchaser would get. The right of way is in the nature of an easement, and is acquired only for the purpose of the railroad. When the road is abandoned or removed from the strip of land over which the railroad has a right of way, the land is discharged of the burden. The right of way no longer exists. The plaintiff may be in no condition, however, to raise this point. The judgment and order are affirmed.

STOUTENBOROUGH et al. v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,446.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

ORDER OF DISMISSAL — MOTION TO SET ASIDE — ENTRY NUNC PRO TUNC — RETRAHIT.

1. Where a case was, on motion of plaintiff, dismissed in open court, but no order of dismissal was entered at the time, and an order of dismissal was afterwards entered, without notice to plaintiff, which recited that the case had been settled, and a judgment of dismissal was entered on such order, the court will, 11 years after the entry of the order, set aside the order and judgment, and enter an order nunc pro tunc, as of the date of dismissal, showing that the case was dismissed in open court on plaintiff's motion.

2. An order of dismissal, to operate as a retraxit, must be made on motion of one party on the written consent of the other.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco, C. W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Stoutenborough and others against the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco to quiet title. The complaint was dismissed on motion of plaintiffs, but no order of dismissal was entered by them. Defendant, without notice to plaintiffs, entered an order and judgment of dismissal. Plaintiffs moved to vacate both, and to enter a different order, nunc pro tunc as of the date of dismissal. From an order granting the motion, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Grant, for appellant. D. H. Whittemore, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs commenced this action in March, 1876, to quiet their title to a lot of land in the city and county of San Francisco. In due time an answer and cross complaint were filed, setting up the defendant's ownership of the lot, and thereafter an answer to the cross complaint was filed, denying the defendant's ownership, and setting up the statute of limitations. On July 18, 1881, an order was entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court, which, after setting out the title of the court and cause, reads as follows: "This cause was called on the general calendar this day, and, it appearing to the court that the same has been settled, it is ordered that the said action be, and the same is hereby, dismissed." Nothing further appears to have been done in the case until September 20, 1892, when a formal judgment of dismissal was recorded, and a judgment roll made up and certified by the clerk. In January, 1893, the plaintiffs served on defendant, and filed in court, a notice that on a day named they would move the court to set aside and vacate the said judgment of September 20, 1892; also, to set aside and vacate the said order of July 18, 1881, and to enter an order nunc pro tunc, as of August 4, 1880, reading as follows, after setting out the title of the cause: "On motion of plaintiffs, made in open court, the above-entitled cause is hereby dismissed." The notice stated that the motion would be made upon the grounds that the said judgment and order were entered inadvertently and without notice, and that the cause had been dismissed in open court on August 4, 1880, and the court had lost jurisdiction to make said order of July 18, 1881. The motion was submitted for decision upon affidavits and exhibits presented and filed by the plaintiffs,—no counter affidavits or proofs of any kind were offered,—and on February 20, 1893, "the court granted plaintiffs' motion on the payment of the sum of $4, which sum was paid, and received and receipted for by the attorney for defendant." From the order thus made, this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears from the affidavits and exhibits introduced that in April, 1879, the attorney for defendant submitted to it a written opinion, in which he stated that, after a thorough examination of the matter, "I am satisfied that the board has no title to the property in question." And, after setting out the facts shown by his examination, he concluded by saying: "My opinion is, * * * the legal title is in the plaintiffs, and that it would be useless expense to defend the action." It further appears that the attorney for defendant informed plaintiffs' attorneys that the said board had no title to said lot, and disclaimed all title or interest in the same, and that thereafter plaintiffs' attorneys instructed a clerk in their office to move for the dismissal of said action, and said clerk did so, in open court, on August 4, 1880; and the court ordered the same dismissed at that time, but the clerk failed to make any entry of such order. It also appears that another attorney, in September, 1880, who was examining the title to the lot in question, called on the secretary of the board of education, and was informed that the board did not claim said lot, and that he then called on the attorney for the board, and was informed by him that said board of education did not claim said lot, and had no title thereto. It would seem, too, that the plaintiffs had no notice or knowledge of the order made and entered on July 18, 1881, until after the recording of the judgment of September 20, 1892. Upon these facts, it is argued for appellant that the court below had no power to set aside, on motion, the order of July 18, 1881, because it was the act of the court, and complete and final in itself, and had been for more than 11 years in force; and it is said that respondents, if entitled to any relief, must seek it by an independent action in equity. It is also argued that the court had no power to set aside the judgment of September 20, 1892, because the recording of it was a mere clerical act, which was authorized by, and followed as a consequence of, the prior order. No objection is made to that part of the order appealed from which ordered and directed an order to be entered nunc pro tunc as of August 4, 1880, dismissing the action. But, when the last-named order was so entered, it took effect as of the date of August 4, 1880, and the action was in fact not pending in July, 1881. Whether, therefore, the court erred in setting aside the order of July 18, 1881, or not, is immaterial, since the appellant was in no way aggrieved thereby. And besides, unless the order and judgment set aside operated as a retraxit, and so barred any future action by the plaintiffs for the same cause, the appellant was not aggrieved by the order complained of. Under our statute, an action may be dismissed "by either party upon the written consent of the other" (section 581, (Code Civ. Proc.); and only such a dismissal will operate as a retraxit (Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542). In view of the facts shown, the order of dismissal of July 18, 1881, could not have been made on motion of the respondents, or upon their written consent, and it could not, therefore, have operated as a retraxit. We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

BJORMAN v. FT. BRAGG REDWOOD CO.
(No. 15,502.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action for injuries, where the defense was negligence of a fellow servant, the burden is not on plaintiff to show that the injuries were not caused by such negligence.

2. In the absence of knowledge on the part of an employé of danger in working with or near defective machinery, he is not chargeable with negligence for not abandoning the employment.

3. Whether plaintiff's injuries were caused by his own negligence or by that of his fellow servant is a question of fact.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by Henry Bjorman against the Ft. Bragg Redwood Company for personal injuries. Verdict and judgment for defendant. From an order granting a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Cooper, T. L. Carothers, and C. E. Wilson, for appellant. A. Morgenthal and J. M. Mannon, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for a personal injury sustained by him, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence and gross carelessness of the defendant. The case was tried, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, and its motion was granted, and on appeal to this court the order was affirmed. 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591. The case was again tried, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff then moved for a new trial, and his motion was granted, and from that order the defendant prosecutes this appeal. The motion was granted upon the ground that the court had erred in giving to the jury two instructions, numbers 5 and 12, at the request of defendant.

Instruction number 5 was as follows: "The plaintiff claims that the injury to his leg was caused by the negligence and carelessness of the defendant in having a brake upon its car that was defective and improperly constructed. I charge you that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of evidence that such injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant as claimed by plaintiff, and not by any one else, or by a fellow servant of defendant, and, unless the plaintiff has so proven it, it will be your duty to find for the defendant." One of the defenses set up in the answer was that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. This was an affirmative defense, and the burden was clearly upon the defendant to establish it. The instruction, however, seems to tell the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove primarily that the injury was not caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. This, if so, was erroneous and misleading. Instruction number 12 was in these words: "I charge you that the law also requires of the servant the use of ordinary care and watchfulness on his part to avoid danger or injury. And in this case, if you believe from the evidence that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the brake on the defendant's car being defective or unsafe, and that the plaintiff knew of such defect or unsafeness, or if in the course of plaintiff's employment he had the same means of knowledge concerning the said defects or unsafeness that the defendant had, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to know of such defect by the exercise of ordinary care, and yet he continued in the employ of defendant, he cannot recover in this action." This instruction wholly ignores a well-settled rule of law in regard to the liability of an employer in a case like that supposed. That rule is that the employer is not exempt from liability unless the employé knows or ought to know of the danger to which he is exposed by working with or near the defective machinery or appliances. In the absence of such knowledge, the employé is not chargeable with negligence because he does not abandon his employment, and he cannot be said to have voluntarily exposed himself to such danger. Sanborn v. Flume, etc., Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710; Colbert v. Rankin, 72 Cal. 197, 13 Pac. 491; Gisson v. Schwabacher, 99 Cal. 419, 34 Pac. 104.

It is claimed, however, that if the instructions above referred to were erroneous in the respects named, still the plaintiff was not injured by the errors, for the reason that under the evidence he was not entitled to recover in any event. But whether the injury sustained by plaintiff was caused by the negligence of a fellow servant or resulted from his own negligence was a question of fact, and not of law. Magee v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 430, 24 Pac. 114; Martin v. Railway Co., 94 Cal. 326, 29 Pac. 645. We cannot, therefore, say that the court abused its discretion in granting the motion, even though it felt "constrained to say that had the instructions been so framed as to meet all the requirements of the law the verdict of the jury would have been the same."

Numerous other errors are assigned and urged by counsel for respondent, but they need not be considered. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE'S HOME SAV. BANK v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 15,802.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

CORPORATE STOCKHOLDER — VOTING BY PROXY—LIMITATION IN BY-LAWS—VALIDITY.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 312, providing that stockholders of corporations may be represented at all corporate elections by proxies, a stockholder may choose any person to cast his vote, and a by-law providing that no proxy shall be voted by one not a stockholder is unreasonable and invalid.

2. Civ. Code, § 303, providing that a corporation may, by its by-laws, provide for "the mode of voting by proxy," does not authorize a by-law forbidding all but stockholders from casting proxy votes.

In bank.

Action by the People's Home Savings Bank against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Motion for a substitution of attorney for plaintiff. Granted.

Delmas & Shortridge, for petitioner.
James Alva Watt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The present proceeding is a motion for a substitution of attorneys in the above-entitled cause. Mr. James Alva Watt, claiming authority to represent the petitioner, makes the motion. The solution of the question here presented is dependent upon the following state of facts: One E. H. Knight, a creditor, commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department No. 4, against the petitioner, People's Home Savings Bank, and its directors, for the purpose of enforcing his demand, and asked that the board of directors be enjoined from the further transaction of business; that they be removed from office; that a receiver be appointed; and that the bank corporation be thrown into liquidation. Certain allegations of plaintiff's complaint, charging fraud of the board of directors in the administration of the business of the corporation, and insolvency of the bank, form the basis for the relief prayed for. In this action, John F. Sheehan was by the court appointed receiver to take possession of the assets of the corporation, etc., and he retained James Alva Watt as his attorney and legal adviser in carrying on the business of the receivership. Thereafter, the petitioner in the above-entitled cause, to wit, the People's Home Savings Bank, made an application to this court for a writ of prohibition, asking that the proceedings of the superior court in the matter of the appointment of the receiver be annulled as being in excess of its jurisdiction. This application was made to the court by the petitioner through its regularly appointed attorneys, Messrs. Delmas & Shortridge. Thereafter, a motion for a substitution of James Alva Watt as attorney for petitioner in the above-entitled cause, to act in the place and stead of Messrs. Delmas & Shortridge, was made. This motion was based upon a showing by affidavits to the effect that subsequent to the inception of the prohibition proceeding the directorate of the petitioner corporation had been changed at an election held by the stockholders, and that the corporation petitioner, by its new board of directors, appointed said Watt attorney for the corporation in the above-entitled cause, and revoked the authority of Messrs. Delmas & Shortridge to act for it in any litigation then pending. The legality of Watt's appointment as attorney for the bank depends upon the validity of the election of the board of directors appointing him, and the only serious question presented as to the validity of such election involves the right of a person not a stockholder to participate in the election by virtue of his position as a proxy of a bona fide stockholder; and to this question we shall direct our attention.

While it is provided by section 312 of the Civil Code that stockholders of corporations may be represented at all elections by proxies, yet the by-laws of the petitioner bank provide that no proxy shall be voted by any one not a stockholder of the corporation; and it is upon the validity of such by-law that the merits of this case hinge. It is suggested in argument of counsel that all banking corporations have a by-law of similar import; but, notwithstanding this general practice, we have arrived at the conclusion, after careful consideration, that the making of such a law is without the power of the corporation. Corporations have no power to create by-laws that are unreasonable in their practical application, or that are violative of the statute of the state; and we think this by-law an infringement upon the statute, and a most substantial limitation upon the rights of stockholders granted by section 312 of the Civil Code. That section is broad in its terms, and when it says that a stockholder in a corporation may appoint a proxy—an attorney in fact—to represent him at elections held by the corporation, in the absence of limitations in the law, it must be held that the statute gives him the right to name an attorney in fact of his own selection. Any other construction would entirely nullify all benefits intended to be conferred by its provisions. To declare that, though the statute in general terms gives all stockholders of corporations the right to vote by proxy, yet the corporation, by its by-laws, has the power to say who that proxy shall be, is to give the corporation full power to throttle the statute. The stockholders of many of our corporations are limited in number, and the case would undoubtedly often arise where the absent stockholder, desirous of being represented at an election, would be unable to find a friend among them in whom to trust his interests. The statute contemplates no such conditions, and neither says nor intended to say that such a stockholder would be deprived of his right to vote by proxy. If you may limit by by-law the right of holding a proxy to stockholders, you may limit it to directors, or the president, or the secretary, and thus the interests in control would have the power to compel the minority interests, if unable to be present in person, to be represented by the very interests to which they are opposed, and to reinstate in office the very men whose election they desire to defeat. The principle of cumulative voting has been authorized and approved in the interests of minority representation, yet this by-law squarely strikes at this principle which has been so carefully fostered. The substantial rights of a stockholder under the law cannot be taken from him, or even abridged, by the by-laws. The right to vote by proxy is a most substantial right, and this by-law handicaps this right out of all usefulness.

While no authority for or against the principles we have here declared was cited by counsel upon the elaborate argument of the case, we had no doubt at the time that they rested upon solid grounds, and since the submission of the cause our investigation has brought to light a recent case fully in line with all that we have said upon the question. The principle here involved was the sole question there involved, and in an opinion covering the entire ground the court there said: "It has not restricted the right of the stockholder to select any person whom he may consider to be advisable for that object to vote under his authority upon his shares as a stockholder. In this respect the largest liberty has been secured and provided for the stockholders, and, being entirely unrestrained by the legislature, this privilege was maintained by the authority of the law. Without having so declared expressly, the clear implication of the section is that it was not intended to impose any restriction whatever upon the stockholder as to the person he should be at liberty to select to act under his proxy; and, the statute having in this manner created this right in as general a manner as it did, the trustees of the corporation were not at liberty to restrict or declare by their by-laws that it should not be so used." In re Lighthall Manuf'g Co., 47 Hun, 258. Section 303 of the Civil Code provides: "A corporation may by its by-laws, where no other provision is specially made, provide for: * * * (3) The mode of voting by proxy." This provision does not give the corporation power to pass the by-law here assailed. It refers to the preliminary requirements to be followed in order that the proxy may be entitled to vote, as that the authorization must be in writing, properly witnessed, acknowledged, filed with the records, etc. In creating this provision it was not in the mind of the legislature to curtail the right of voting by proxy, but rather that such right might be exercised by stockholders within any reasonable restrictions which the corporation deemed proper to incorporate into their by-laws. The statute gives to the corporation the power to regulate the exercise of the right, but no power to either qualify or limit the right, and certainly no power to so shackle the right as to result in its nullification.

As a second ground of opposition to the granting of the motion for substitution, it is insisted that James Alva Watt, by reason of his relations to the respondent as attorney, is disqualified to represent the petitioner in the prohibition proceeding. We attach but little importance to this contention, and do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of the questions, namely: (1) Are the interests of the receiver and the bank antagonistic? or (2) is Watt attorney for the respondent in the above-entitled cause? The conclusion we have arrived at upon the preceding question discussed declares the business relations theretofore existing between the bank and its attorneys, Messrs. Delmas & Shortridge, were severed by virtue of the action of the newly and legally elected board of directors, and, such being the case, the attorneys opposing this motion stand before us as strangers to the proceeding, having no interest or standing in the litigation; and we are unable to see that it is of any concern to them who represents the various parties in this proceeding. As to Mr. Watt's conduct in the litigation, all that he has done has been open and upon the record. There has been no concealment, no imposition practiced upon the court, but, upon the contrary, all that has been done in the past, and all that he proposes to do in the future, he has done and proposes to do under a claim of right, supported by the law. These things being so, until some party to the litigation objects, we will not investigate. If all parties to the litigation are satisfied, we know of no proper party to object. We might suggest, in conclusion, that Mr. Watt states in open court that he desires to be substituted as attorney for the petitioner bank, in order that he may dismiss the prohibition proceeding. The bank retains him as its attorney to dismiss the proceeding, and there is no reason why it has not the right so to do. Such a dismissal in no aspect of the case prejudices the interests of the respondents, and the bank, the petitioner, has the right to dismiss its petition if it deem such the proper course. The motion for a substitution as prayed for is granted.

BYRNE v. LUNING CO. (No. 15,628.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

CITY IMPROVEMENT—ENFORCEMENT OF ASSESSMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—RECITALS IN CONTRACTOR'S BOND—EFFECT.

1. In an action to enforce an assessment for street improvements, a complaint which, after alleging that the work was to be done according to specifications to be provided by the city, alleges general performance of the requirements, without specially setting out the specifications, is not subject to general demurrer.

2. Where a bond given for the faithful performance of a contract for public work recites that it is of "even date with the contract," the fact that it is dated one day earlier is not sufficient to prove, in an action to enjoin an assessment levied therefor, that the bond was in fact executed a day earlier than the contract.

3. The fact that such a bond provides that the superintendent of streets shall not be liable for any delinquency on his part does not vitiate the entire bond, though such provision be against public policy.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Thomas Byrne against the Luning Company to enforce a street assessment. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Langhorne, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce a street assessment upon a lot of land in the city of San Francisco for the sum of $181.40, in which judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendant's motion for new trial was denied. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellant contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action, because the specifications for the work, furnished by the city engineer and made part of the contract were not set out in haec verba in the complaint. The complaint, however, does not purport to state any part of the contract in haec verba, but only the substance of it, according to its legal effect. The work to be done was described in the resolution of intention passed by the board of supervisors, and in the complaint, as follows: "That a 16-inch iron stone pipe sewer, with manhole and cover, be constructed in Jones street, from Vallejo to Green street." And it is alleged in the complaint that the specifications for this work were furnished at the proper time by the city engineer, and that they were attached to and made a part of the contract; that, by the contract, plaintiff agreed "that he would do and perform all the aforementioned work under the direction and to the satisfaction of the said superintendent of streets, in a good and workman-like manner, and with the materials required by said specifications, which were also to be to the satisfaction of said superintendent of streets, and were to be furnished by the said party of the first part therein [plaintiff] according to the said contract and specifications." It is then alleged "that plaintiff duly performed all the terms and conditions of said contract therein contained to be performed on the part of said plaintiff, in every respect, within the time fixed in said contract, and according to the terms of said contract and specifications, under the direction and to the satisfaction of said superintendent, and with the materials required by him, and called for by said specifications; and the said work was duly approved and accepted by said superintendent." The complaint is in the usual verbose form which seems to have been generally adopted by the profession, specifically detailing all proceedings of the board of supervisors and other municipal officers relating to the street work in question; but the foregoing extracts contain all that relates to the specifications attached to the contract, and all that is necessary to illustrate the alleged ground of demurrer. I think the complaint states the substance of a contract, and the performance thereof on the part of plaintiff, the legal effect of which is to entitle plaintiff to the relief demanded. This is sufficient to shield it against attack by the general demurrer, however vulnerable it may be to a special demurrer. Whether a copy of the contract upon which an action is based is or is not set forth in the complaint, the defendant may always demand and obtain an inspection of the original by pursuing the course prescribed by section 1000 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and if, upon such inspection, it appear that the complaint misrepresents the contract, or has omitted a substantial part of it, to the prejudice of the defendant, such misrepresentation or omission is matter of defense, but is not available as a ground of general demurrer, because it does not appear on the face of the complaint. And in this case the defendant, to maintain the issues on his part, obtained and introduced in evidence the original contract, with the specifications thereto attached; and it appears by the statement on motion for new trial that they were substantially as alleged in the complaint, and in due form, omitting nothing required by law. The case of Libbey v. Elsworth, 97 Cal. 316, 32 Pac. 228, cited by appellant, is not in point. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained in that case on the grounds that the complaint did not show that the contract to do the work was entered into within 15 days after the first posting of the notice of its award, and did not show that the superintendent of streets fixed the time for commencement of the work within 15 days from the date of the contract, nor fix a time for the completion of the work. But it is alleged in this case that notice of the award of the contract was posted March 30, 1892, and that the contract was entered into April 12, 1892; and it is also alleged that the superintendent of streets fixed the time in said contract for the commencement of said work at 14 days from the date of the contract, and the time for the completion thereof at 90 days from said date.

2. It is urged that the finding by the court that, at the time of entering into the contract, the plaintiff executed a bond for the faithful performance of the contract, is not justified by the evidence. The original bond was introduced by defendant, and is admitted to be sufficient and in due form, with the following exception: It bears the date April 11, 1892, whereas the contract bears the date April 12, 1892; and it is contended that the bond is void, because it appears to have been executed the day before the execution of the contract. Conceding, for the sake of argument, this extremely doubtful proposition, yet there is no evidence, except the written dates, tending to prove that the bond was delivered before the contract was executed. The true date of the execution of bond was the time of its delivery. It recites that it is of "even date with the contract." If this recital is true, it follows that there was a mistake of one day in the date of either the bond or the contract, and that such mistake is immaterial. At all events, the recital in the bond neutralizes the tendency of the written dates to prove that the execution of the bond was not contemporaneous with that of the contract; and, in this state of the evidence furnished by the bond and contract, the court was justified in finding that it did not overcome the prima facie case for plaintiff made by the warrant, assessment, diagram, etc. Street Work Act March 18, 1885, § 12, as amended (St. 1889, p. 168). This view obviates any necessity for deciding what effect a defective or even a void bond would have upon the contract.

3. In addition to the statutory and lawful requisites, the contract contains a superfluous provision, to the effect that neither the superintendent of streets nor his bondsmen shall "be liable or holden * * * for any delinquency on his own part." It is contended that this provision is against public policy, and therefore is not only void, but that it vitiates the whole contract. The provision is probably void, for the reason that the superintendent of streets had no authority to require or to make it; but it is easily separable from all other provisions of the contract, and therefore does not vitiate any one of them. The contract contains all the provisions required by law, and the finding of the court (not excepted to) is that plaintiff fully performed it on his part. It seems inconceivable, therefore, that the defendant, not being a party to the contract, could have been injured by the superfluous clause, whether it be valid or void. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GRAHAM v. FRANKE. (No. 15,483.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

PARTIES—ACTION ON CONTRACT—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, the party in whose name a written contract is made, though partly for the benefit of another, may sue thereon without joining the latter.

2. Error in admitting evidence is not ground for reversal, unless it was prejudicial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by A. L. Graham against R. Franke. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Ayer, for appellant. G. S. Langan and W. R. Davis, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Two points only are made for a reversal. They are (1) that the court erred in admitting certain evidence over the objections of defendant; and (2) that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence.

The complaint contains two counts. The first is based upon a written contract executed by the parties, and dated April 26, 1890, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant certain vegetable products, and defendant agreed to purchase and pay for the same certain stipulated prices. The second count is for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered. In each count it is alleged that defendant had not made full payment, and judgment is asked for the amount still due and unpaid. The evidence objected to by the defendant at the trial, and the admission of which is assigned as error, was to the effect that on April 4, 1890, the plaintiff and one Worthington became partners in the business of raising vegetables, and that this partnership continued up to the time of the trial; and the objection was that the evidence was immaterial, and irrelevant to any issue raised by the pleadings. Conceding that this objection was well taken, still it is evident that the defendant was in no way prejudiced by the ruling. The evidence did not, to any extent, tend to fix, establish, or enlarge the liability of defendant.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, and after he had rested his case, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground "that the evidence shows that the plaintiff, A. L. Graham, is not the real party interested, and that this suit should not and cannot be maintained by him alone; that the evidence shows that the transaction, the matter of the suit, is a partnership debt." The motion was denied, and we see no error in the ruling. The plaintiff's contract with the defendant was in writing, and under section 369, Code Civ. Proc., he was authorized to sue upon it without joining Worthington, even if it was partly made for the benefit of the latter. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

In re DONOVAN'S ESTATE. (No. 15,740.)
FITZPATRICK v. SECORD.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR—RESIDENCE.

D., who has only been in the state a few days, to look after the interest of his deceased brother's estate, and who came in order to claim a residence, so as to be able to control the administration of the estate, and could not tell whether he would remain or not, and only brought his daughter with him, leaving his wife in the foreign state, where he had lived for 38 years, was not a bona fide resident, so as to be competent to nominate an administrator, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1379.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Timothy Donovan, deceased. Contest between Edwin F. Fitzpatrick and J. K. Secord for the office of administrator. From an order appointing the latter administrator, the former appeals. Affirmed.

Edw. F. Fitzpatrick, in pro. per. C. D. Wright and Wm. L. Gill, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Timothy Donovan died intestate in Santa Clara county, in this state, leaving an estate in said county. Appellant and respondent each applied for letters of administration, the latter being the public administrator of said county. John Donovan, a brother of the deceased, requested the appointment of appellant. This request was denied upon the ground that John Donovan was not a bona fide resident of this state, and therefore not entitled to administer the estate, under section 1369, Code Civ. Proc., nor competent to nominate another, under section 1379 of the same Code. See In re Beech's Estate, 63 Cal. 458, and In re Bell's Estate, 97 Cal. 342, 32 Pac. 323. The sole question, therefore, is whether John Donovan was, at the time he made the request, a bona fide resident of this state. If he was, he was first entitled to administer, and so had the right to nominate appellant.

Timothy Donovan died January 10, 1894. John Donovan was then residing, and for about 38 years had resided, at Chicopee, in the state of Massachusetts. On January 20, 1894, he and others entitled to share in the estate signed and forwarded to appellant a written request for his appointment as administrator, and on January 25th appellant filed his petition praying that letters of administration be issued to him. Both petitions came on for hearing February 9, 1894. Three days before the hearing, John Donovan arrived in California, and on the day of the hearing filed a written request for the appointment of appellant; describing himself therein as a resident of San Mateo county, in this state. He was called as a witness by appellant, and, after testifying that he resided in Redwood City, he was asked, upon cross-examination: "Q. How came you to California? A. Well, because I was sent for. Q. Who sent for you? A. The death of my brother. Q. Who sent for you? A. Mr. Fitzpatrick. Q. And that is the reason you came out here? A. I came out here to live. Q. He sent for you? A. Of course. I came out here to see about the interests of my brother's estate. He told me— He sent for me. He wrote me, and, of course, I wanted to come out, to see to the interests of my brother's estate. He sent for me, that I should come out here and claim I have a residence here, to have any say in this matter." The witness gave other testimony of like character upon cross-examination, and upon redirect examination he was asked: "Q. You are now a resident of this state, are you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is it your intention to remain? A. I cannot tell that. I will remain here if I can,—as long as I can. It is my intention to remain here." When he came he brought an unmarried daughter with him, leaving his wife with a married son and daughter in Massachusetts. We think the evidence failed to show that John Donovan was a bona fide resident of this state. Appellant contends that the court was bound by the direct evidence of the witness that he was a resident. But it was conceded that for many years he was a resident of Massachusetts, and "union of act and intent are necessary to make a change of residence." Pol. Code, § 52. He had been in this state but three days, and nothing could be inferred, from his presence for so short a time, as to his intention in coming, and it was for the court to determine from the whole of his testimony what his intention was. Appellant cites Hansen v. Graham, 82 Cal. 631, 23 Pac. 56. That case does not sustain his contention. The question there was as to what constituted nonresidence, under the attachment laws. It was there said (page 633, 82 Cal., and page 56, 23 Pac.): "In statutes relating to taxation, settlements, the right of suffrage, and qualification for office, it may have a very different construction from that which belongs to it in the statutes relating to attachments." Our attachment laws use the expressions "not residing" and "nonresident," without other qualification, while the Code provision in relation to the office of administrator requires that the petitioner, or the person requesting his appointment, must be "a bona fide" resident of this state. This must involve an abandonment of his domicile in Massachusetts, and that was not shown. The order refusing to appoint appellant, and the order appointing respondent, should each be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the orders appealed from are affirmed.

CHAPMAN v. STATE. (No. 15,706.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

STATE LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE OF OFFICERS—ACTION ON CONTRACT—LIABILITY OF BAILEE.

1. In the absence of statute, a state is not liable for the negligence of its officers in the discharge of their ordinary official duties.

2. Under Const. art. 4, § 31, which prohibits the legislature from making a gift of public money or other thing of value to any person, it cannot, by statute, create a liability against the state for acts of past negligence on the part of its officers.

3. A complaint in an action against the state, alleging that defendant, for a valuable consideration, received on the public wharf coal belonging to plaintiff, to be delivered to him, and that the coal was lost by the giving way of the wharf, and that plaintiff was damaged thereby, states a cause of action on the contract of bailment, and not on negligence.

4. A wharfinger is impliedly bound to use ordinary care for the safety of property entrusted to him, and must see that the wharf is reasonably safe.

5. Under Act Feb. 28, 1893, providing that all persons who shall thereafter have claims against the state on contract, which have not been allowed by the state examiners, may sue the state, an action may be maintained against the state on a contract on which the right of action accrued before the passage of the act.

6. The rejection by the state examiners of a claim against the state is not a bar to an action to enforce it, as provided in Act Feb. 28, 1893.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by one Chapman against the state of California for damages. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dodge & Fry, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the State.

DE HAVEN, J. Action for damages, brought by the plaintiff as assignee of the firm of John Rosenfeld's Sons. In the superior court a demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereupon rendered in favor of the defendant. The complaint, omitting merely formal and immaterial averments, may, as against a general demurrer, be construed as alleging, in substance, that on August 10, 1891, the defendant, in consideration of wharfage and dockage charges paid to its officers, the state board of harbor commissioners, received upon one of its public wharves, situate in the city of San Francisco, and under the jurisdiction and control of the state board of harbor commissioners, about 130 tons of coal belonging to the assignors of plaintiff, and to be removed by them from such wharf; and that on said day a large portion of the wharf on which this coal was placed broke and gave way "by reason of the negligence, omission, and carelessness of defendant, its officers and agents, the state board of harbor commissioners and said wharfinger, in failing and neglecting to keep said wharf in good and sound condition and repair," and all the coal of plaintiff's assignors then on the wharf was sunk in the bay of San Francisco, and became a total loss, to their damage in the sum of $1,266.47, the alleged value of said coal. The complaint further alleges that a claim for the damages so sustained was duly presented to the state board of examiners for allowance, and the same was by said board rejected on September 13, 1893. The prayer of the complaint is for a judgment against defendant for the sum of $1,266.47, and interest thereon from August 10, 1891. The demurrer was upon the general ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and also set forth, as a special ground, that "the said complaint shows upon its face that the claim against the state, which is the subject-matter of the action of plaintiff, was duly and legally presented to the state board of examiners of this state prior to the commencement of this action for allowance, and was by said board rejected and disallowed, and the said action of said board in the premises has never been reversed, but remains in full force and effect."

1. It is claimed by the plaintiff that he is entitled to maintain this action under the permission and authority given by the act authorizing suits against the state, approved February 28, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 57). The first section of this act provides as follows: "All persons who have or shall hereafter have claims on contract or for negligence against the state not allowed by the state board of examiners, are hereby authorized, on the terms and conditions herein contained, to bring suit thereon against the state in any of the courts of this state of competent jurisdiction, and prosecute the same to final judgment." The cause of action set forth in the complaint arose prior to the passage of the act just referred to; and it is argued by the attorney general that, at the time when the coal belonging to the assignors of plaintiff was lost, the state was not liable for the damage occasioned by said loss, and growing out of the alleged negligence of said officers in charge of the wharf mentioned in the complaint, and that the act should not be construed as intended to create any liability against the state for such past negligence. It is well settled that, in the absence of a statute voluntarily assuming such liability, the state is not liable in damages for the negligent acts of its officers while engaged in discharging ordinary official duties pertaining to the administration of the government of the state. Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. 951; Story, Ag. § 319. It is also true that under section 31 of article 4 of the constitution of this state, which forbids the legislature from making any gift of public money or other thing of value to any person, the legislature has no power to create a liability against the state for any past act of negligence upon the part of its officers; and a statute undertaking to assume a liability upon the part of the state for the negligence of its officers in cases where, under the general rules of law, a master would have to respond for the negligent acts of his servant, would only be valid in so far as it might relate to future acts of negligence. If, therefore, the present action is to be regarded as one for the recovery of damages arising out of the negligence of the officers of the state in the discharge of a strictly governmental duty, it cannot be sustained. But we are clearly of the opinion that the cause of action alleged in the complaint is not of this character. It is not founded upon negligence constituting a tort pure and simple, and unrelated to any contract, but is substantially an action for damages on account of the alleged breach of a contract. The facts stated in the complaint show that the defendant, in consideration of wharfage paid to it, received upon one of its public wharves the coal belonging to plaintiff's assignors, and to be delivered to them on such wharf for removal therefrom. A wharfinger is one who for hire receives merchandise on his wharf, either for the purpose of forwarding or for delivery to the consignee on such wharf; and the matters alleged in the complaint show a contract of the latter character, and the state is bound thereby to the same extent as a private person engaged in conducting the business of a wharfinger would be under a similar contract. The principle that a state is bound by the same rules as an individual in measuring its liability on a contract is well expressed by Allen, J., in his concurring opinion in the case of People v. Stephens, 71 N. Y. 549, in which he said: "The state in all its contracts and dealings with individuals must be adjudged and abide by the rules which govern in determining the rights of private citizens contracting and dealing with each other. There is not one law for the sovereign, and another for the subject. But when the sovereign engages in business, and the conduct of business enterprises and contracts with individuals, whenever the contract, in any form, comes before the courts, the rights and obligations of the contracting parties must be adjusted upon the same principle as if both contracting parties were private persons. Both stand upon equality before the law, and the sovereign is merged in the dealer, contractor, and suitor." See, also, Carr v. State, 127 Ind. 204, 26 N. E. 778.

What, then, was the nature and extent of the obligation assumed by the state when, in consideration of the wharfage paid by them, it received the coal of plaintiff's assignors upon its wharf? "The wharfinger is bound to return or deliver the goods according to his contract." Edw. Bailm. (3d Ed.) § 362. A wharfinger is impliedly bound, by his contract as such, to exercise ordinary care for the preservation and safety of property intrusted to him (Id. § 359), and this imposes upon him the duty to exercise ordinary care to ascertain the condition of his wharf, that he may know whether it is reasonably safe for the purposes for which he hires it; and, if merchandise is received by him upon a wharf which is unsafe, and is thereby lost so that he cannot deliver it according to his contract, the wharfinger is liable therefor if ordinary care would have enabled him to know the condition of his wharf, and such negligence on his part will be treated as a failure to exercise ordinary care for the safety of the property intrusted to him. This negligence, however, and the consequent loss of the goods intrusted to him, would be a breach of the terms of his contract, and his liability therefor could have been enforced at common law by an action of assumpsit (1 Chit. Pl. *114; Baker v. Liscoe, 7 Term R. 171); and under our practice the owner or consignee may sue upon the contract for the damages sustained by reason of such negligence. "The wharfinger's responsibility begins as soon as he acquires the custody of the goods, and ends when he has fulfilled his express or implied contract with respect to both." Edw. Bailm. § 357. And the supreme court of Washington, in the case of Oregon Imp. Co. v. Seattle Gaslight Co. (Wash.) 30 Pac. 672, in passing upon the question of the liability of a wharfinger, upon his contract as such, by reason of his wharf giving way and precipitating into the waters beneath a quantity of shale which had been received thereon, said: "This was a contract of bailment. The contract was proven, the loss was proven, and the negligence of respondent was proven, and the measure of the damages is the value of the shale." We are entirely satisfied that plaintiff's cause of action, as alleged in the complaint, arises upon contract, and that the liability of the state accrued at the time of its breach,—that is, when the coal was lost through the negligence of the officers in charge of the state's wharf,—although there was then no law giving to the plaintiff's assignors the right to sue the state therefor. At that time the only remedy given the citizen to enforce the contract liabilities of the state was to present the claim arising thereon to the state board of examiners for allowance, or to appeal to the legislature for an appropriation to pay the same; but the right to sue the state has since been given by the act of February 28, 1893, and, in so far as that act gives the right to sue the state upon its contracts, the legislature did not create any liability or cause of action against the state where none existed before. The state was always liable upon its contracts, and the act just referred to merely gave an additional remedy for the enforcement of such liability, and it is not, even as applied to prior contracts, in conflict with any provision of the constitution. "The fact that the state is not subject to an action in behalf of a citizen does not establish that he has no claim against the state, or that no liability exists from the state to him. It only shows that he cannot enforce against the state his claim, and make it answer in a court of law for its liability. What is made out by this objection is not that there is no liability and no claim, but that there is no remedy." Coster v. Mayor, etc., 43 N. Y. 407.

2. It is further argued, in behalf of the state, that the rejection of plaintiff's claim by the state board of examiners has the effect of a judgment, and constitutes a bar to this action; and in support of this contention the case of Cahill v. Colgan (Cal.) 31 Pac. 614, is cited. That case is not authority for such a proposition. The court there decided that when a claim had been presented to the state board of examiners and approved, and an appropriation made by the legislature to pay it, the approval by the board of examiners was conclusive upon the comptroller as to the value of the services rendered by the claimant, and the amount to which he was entitled; and the general language found in the opinion in that case, as to the conclusive effect of the approval or rejection of a claim by the state board of examiners, must be construed with reference to the particular facts then before the court. But a sufficient answer to the contention of the defendant on this point is that the act under the authority of which this suit is brought contemplates that claims against the state shall first be presented to the state board of examiners for allowance; and, as we construe its language, it is only on claims so presented, and "not allowed by the state board of examiners," that the state gives its consent to be sued, and certainly as to claims which have been approved by that board there could be no necessity for such a remedy. Judgment reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

HOMESTEAD—DECLARATION—SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION—USE OF PART OF BUILDING FOR BUSINESS PURPOSES—EFFECT.

1. Where a declaration of homestead states that the family resides on the lot, and such statement and the description which follows clearly designate the premises "intended" to be claimed as such homestead, the description is sufficient.

2. Premises claimed as a homestead consisted of a lot on which was a one-story house, with a partition extending to the ceiling running lengthwise through the center of it. The husband used one side of the house as a tin shop. The family lived in the other half, and the wife also did millinery business there. There was a kitchen at the rear. The whole rear part of the lot was used as a back yard for flowers, stable, etc. Held, that the homestead character of the premises was not destroyed by the uses made of such building.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Petition by H. U. Ogburn, surviving husband of Caroline Ogburn, deceased, to have certain property set apart to him as a homestead. From an order granting the petition, deceased's heirs appeal. Affirmed.

Lawyer & Burnett, for appellant. S. C. Denson, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by heirs at law of the deceased from an order granting the petition of H. U. Ogburn, her surviving husband, that certain property be set apart to petitioner as a homestead, and from an order denying a new trial. Two points, only, are made by appellants which need to be noticed.

1. It is contended that the declaration of homestead offered in evidence was void because it describes no property. This contention cannot be maintained. The declaration stated that the family then resided upon the lot and premises sought to be erected into a homestead; and this statement, together with the description which followed, clearly enough designated the premises intended to be claimed as such homestead. This was sufficient.

2. It is contended that the premises did not constitute a homestead, because they were partly occupied for business purposes. Shortly after the marriage of petitioner and deceased, and when they were without means, his father, in 1866, bought a lot for them in Woodland, for $170, which money they afterwards repaid. The lot was 37 feet wide and 190 feet deep, fronting on Main street. They borrowed money, and built on this lot a one-story house 37 feet wide by 50 feet deep. It was all one house; but a partition as high as the ceiling was run lengthwise through the building, dividing it into two nearly equal parts. Petitioner was a tinner, and one side of the house was used by him as a tin shop. The other half was used for ordinary family living purposes, and the wife also did millinery business there. A kitchen was afterwards built to the rear. The whole rear part of the lot was used as a back yard for flowers, shrubbery, drying clothes, stable, chicken house, etc. The whole property was claimed as a homestead. There was no division of the building above the ceiling. We do not think that the homestead character of the premises was destroyed, either in whole or in part, by the fact that the husband and wife thus used parts of the building for doing their work as artisans. This work which they did there did not constitute such a pretentious business as to blot out the character of the place as a residence and a home, or to make the latter merely incidental to the former. The case is within the rule of Heathman v. Holmes, 94 Cal. 291, 29 Pac. 404; Ackley v. Chamberlain, 16 Cal. 181; Skinner v. Hall, 69 Cal. 195, 10 Pac. 406; Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 226, 22 Pac. 1145; and many other cases. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GARBE v. WILKS. (No. 15,726.)

FINDINGS—INADEQUACY.

A finding "that the plaintiff did not on the 18th day of November, 1892, lend the said defendant the sum of eight hundred dollars in U. S. gold coin," is insufficient on an issue framed by a complaint which states that "within two years last past, and on or about" that day, plaintiff loaned defendant "eight hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by Henry Garbe against Nellie Wilks to recover a certain sum of money loaned to defendant by plaintiff. There was judgment for defendant, and from that, and an order denying him a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. D. Talcott, for appellant. Alex. Campbell, Jr., for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought to recover money alleged to have been loaned to the defendant. The defendant recovered judgment, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial.

One of the points made is that there is no adequate finding upon a material issue, and that without such finding the judgment cannot be sustained. The complaint states that "within two years last past, and on or about the 18th day of November, A. D. 1892, the said plaintiff lent to the said defendant, at her request, the sum of eight hundred dollars in gold coin of the United States." It further states that the money was loaned to enable defendant to purchase a lodging house, and was so used, and that defendant agreed to pay the same in installments of $50 per month, but has failed and neglected to do so, and, though requested, refuses to pay any part thereof. The only finding relating in any way to these allegations is in the following words and figures: "That the plaintiff did not on the 18th day of November, 1892, lend the said defendant the sum of eight hundred dollars in U. S. gold coin." With a strong desire to avoid the reversal of a judgment for the insufficiency of a finding, when it appears probable that the court intended by the finding to cover that issue, we yet think this finding cannot be sustained. Under the present practice, unless findings are waived, so far as the issues are concerned, which must be determined in order to justify the judgment, no findings are presumed. It is true, if the judgment is thus supported, the fact that there are other issues upon which there are no findings will not always necessitate a reversal. As to the fact of a loan here, the evidence was highly conflicting. There was even some evidence which appellant thinks corroborated his evidence, to the extent that he loaned defendant $780. He might have done so, and yet the finding be exactly true. The language of the finding is not as broad as the language of the complaint. It is not averred that plaintiff loaned the money to defendant on the 18th day of November, but within two years last past, and on or about November 18th. Potentially, this is an allegation as to every day of the past two years, and as to every imaginable sum included in $800. The finding seems carefully worded so as not to negative the loaning on any other day, or of any other sum. Of course, we know the judge did not intend a finding so evasive, but we have no right to suppose he intended more than he has said. No construction can be given to the language which will make it cover the whole issue; and we cannot, with due regard to the statute or to proper practice, sanction such looseness in preparing findings,—premissing that we can suppose the judge really intended to negative the entire allegation.

Plaintiff is not injured by the fact that the counterclaim is entitled "Cross Complaint and Counterclaim." It is evidently a counterclaim only, and plaintiff did in fact file an answer to it. Had it been doubtful whether it was a cross complaint or a counterclaim, and, because of the fact that defendant called it a "counterclaim," plaintiff had filed no answer to it, then, if a default had been claimed, the considerations expressed in Shain v. Belvin, 79 Cal. 262, 21 Pac. 747, would have been in point. But here no injury has resulted. The judgment and order should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

DARCY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF SAN JOSE. (No. 15,632.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

CLASSIFICATION OF CITIES—SALARIES OF OFFICERS—SPECIAL LAW—INCREASE DURING TERM.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 6, empowering the legislature by general laws to provide for the organization, incorporation, and classification of municipal corporations, the legislature has no power to pass a classification law which does not classify all the municipal corporations in the state, or which is not amendatory of a law classifying all such corporations.

2. The classification of municipal corporations according to population, authorized by Const. art. 11, § 6, must be based on such a difference in population as rationally calls for, or at least justifies, diversity in organization.

3. Act March 23, 1893, in providing that police officers of cities having from 10,000 to 25,000 inhabitants shall receive a certain salary, violates Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 29, which provides that the legislature shall not pass local laws affecting the salary of any officer.

4. Under Const. art. 11 § 9, providing that the compensation of any municipal officer shall not be increased during his term of office, Act March 23, 1893, which provides that police officers in certain cities shall receive a certain salary, and that the city councils shall fix such salary in the following July, is void as to an officer appointed for one year from January 1, 1893, at a salary less than that fixed by said law.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Action by James Darcy against the mayor and common council of the city of San José for a mandate directing the fixing of plaintiff's salary. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Morehouse and Hiram D. Tuttle, for appellant. Wm. B. Hardy, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon demurrer to the complaint. The complaint shows that San José is a municipal corporation, whose mayor and common council have full power to create and establish a city police for said city, and prescribe their duties and compensation and the terms of their employment; that prior to December 1, 1892, said mayor and common council did duly and regularly pass and adopt an ordinance creating a police force, and in December, 1892, appointed plaintiff as a policeman, and fixed his compensation at $75 per month, and the term of his employment as one year from the 1st day of January, 1893; that in March, 1893, the legislature passed an act requiring the mayor and common council of all cities containing a population of not less than 10,000 nor more than 25,000 inhabitants, at its first regular meeting in July of each year, to fix by ordinance the compensation of the policemen of the city at not less than $100, nor more than $125, per month; that San José had more than 10,000, and less than 25,000, inhabitants; that at the first meeting of the common council in July, 1893, plaintiff demanded from said council that they proceed to fix his salary as required by said act; that the council refused, and still refuse, to fix his salary; that the ordinance fixing compensation was repealed by the act of the legislature alluded to, and there is now no law or ordinance fixing the compensation which plaintiff is entitled to receive. He asks for a writ of mandate directed to the mayor and common council, requiring them to fix his compensation. The demurrer is upon the ground that the act of the legislature upon which plaintiff relies is unconstitutional and void, because: (1) It contravenes subdivision 29, § 25, art. 4, of the constitution. It confers special privileges upon policemen, and imposes burdens upon cities arbitrarily selected from those which stand in the same relation to the subject of the law, and the classification contained in the act is not founded upon any constitutional distinction. (2) The act contravenes sections 9-12, art. 11, and section 32, art. 4, of the constitution.

The city of San José was incorporated by a special act of the legislature, March 17, 1874. The act of March 23, 1893, consists of two sections, as follows:

"Section 1. The police officers and captains of police in all cities of this state containing a population of not less than ten thousand and not exceeding twenty-five thousand shall receive a salary of not less than one hundred dollars, and not exceeding one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month; and the chief of police in all such cities shall receive a salary of not less than one hundred and twenty-five dollars and not exceeding one hundred and fifty dollars per month.

"Sec. 2. The city council of such cities shall, by ordinance, at its first regular meeting in July of each year, fix the compensation of said chief, captain and police officers, at a sum not less nor exceeding the amounts herein provided."

It is said by appellant that the legislature may classify municipal corporations (section 6, art. 11, Const.), and may amend this classification at any time; that a law is general which operates upon all of a class. The manner of the classification is for the legislature. People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 442, 18 Pac. 413. By this act the legislature amended the act of 1883 classifying cities, and made a class containing from 10,000 to 25,000 inhabitants. The law applies alike to all within the class. It is therefore a general law. The statute in question says nothing about classifying. Counsel is right, however, as to the construction of the statute. Every special law classifies unless applied to named individuals, and hence by this logic no limitation is imposed upon the power of the legislature by the numerous constitutional provisions against special and local laws. To illustrate, it is desired to raise the salary of a police officer in San José. It cannot be done by a special law saying the salary of James Darcy is hereby raised from $75 to $100 per month, but it can as easily be done by simply designating a class which shall include Darcy, and may not include any one else. In Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, and 29 Pac. 1092, it is said: "If there is any one feature of the constitution more marked, any characteristic more pervasive, than all others, it is this oft-reiterated, this general and specific, inhibition of local and special laws." And yet, if they can be thus easily evaded, how ineffectual and farcical they are. Legislatures and courts are not at liberty to disregard a policy so plainly manifested in the fundamental law. But, while the sovereign will is thus plainly expressed in the fundamental law, the rule must not receive an interpretation too absolute. It will not be presumed that it was intended to deprive the legislature of all power to adapt its laws to the varying conditions of its inhabitants. From necessity, it has been held that the legislature may classify, in order that it may adapt its legislation to the needs of the people. If this cannot be done, laws will not always bear equally upon the people. This classification, however, must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the constitution or are natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation. It must not be arbitrary, for the mere purpose of classification, that legislation really local or special may seem to be general, but for the purpose of meeting different conditions naturally requiring different legislation. Dougherty v. Austin, supra; City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 Pac. 604. The rule has been still more strongly expressed in numerous cases in other states. In Ayars' Appeal, 122 Pa. St. 266, 16 Atl. 356, it is said: "Some of the cases above cited have been quoted at considerable length for the purpose of showing that this court never intended to sanction classification as a pretext for special or local legislation. On the contrary, the underlying principle of all the cases is that classification with the view of legislating for either class separately is essentially unconstitutional unless a necessity therefor exists,—a necessity springing from manifest peculiarities clearly distinguishing those of one class from each of the other classes, and imperatively demanding legislation for each class separately that would be useless and detrimental to the others. Laws enacted in pursuance of such classification and for such purposes are, properly speaking, neither local nor special. They are general laws, because they apply alike to all that are similarly situated as to their peculiar necessities." In State v. Hammer, 42 N. J. Law, 439, it is said: "But the true principle requires something more than a mere designation by such characteristics as will serve to classify, for the characteristics which thus serve as a basis for classification must be of such a nature as to mark the object so designated as peculiarly requiring exclusive legislation. There must be a substantial distinction, having a reference to the subject-matter of the proposed legislation, between the objects or places embraced in such legislation and the objects or places excluded. The marks of distinction on which the classification is founded must be such, in the nature of things, as will in some reasonable degree, at least, account for or justify the restriction of the legislation." This language has been often cited by other courts as a correct statement of the rule. In Township of Lodi v. State, 51 N. J. Law, 402, 18 Atl. 749, it is said: "The rule is that in any classification for the purpose of a general law all must be included and made subject to it, and none omitted that stand upon the same footing regarding the subject of legislation. To omit one so circumstanced is as fatal a defect as to include but one of a number."

On the 3d day of March, 1883, the legislature did, by a general law, as the constitution requires, classify all the cities of the state. The class mentioned by the law in question is not one of those classes. It is a class created by the act itself. I am of the opinion that this cannot be done. Section 6, art. 11, was evidently intended to limit, and not to enlarge, the power of the legislature; and I think it was intended that the classification there authorized was to be by a general law in the same sense, and in the same way, in which it was necessary to provide for the incorporation and organization of cities and towns. Legislation in regard to such corporations would thereafter be made by reference to the classes thus made. The special authority to thus classify cities and towns would also seem to imply that they cannot be otherwise classified for purposes of legislation. If they can be, and new classes created whenever it is desired by any one to procure legislation which shall apply to only a few cities of the class, the limitations of the constitution so carefully made, and so often repeated, can be easily defeated. I think a law made in conformity with this special permission in the constitution must be a law classifying all cities in the state, or a law amendatory of such a law. It must leave all the municipal corporations classified. Furthermore, the classification authorized by the constitution must be itself in accordance with the principles above declared. Considerable difference in population may justify diversity in organization, but the difference must be such as might rationally be deemed to call for, or at least to justify, diversity in organization; otherwise, the restriction evidently intended by section 6, art. 11, of the constitution would be defeated. If a classification can be arbitrary, such as would not suggest reasonable ground to believe diversity of organization necessary, the whole provision is a deliberate folly. We are not at liberty to attribute such absurdity to the people. On the other hand, a construction should be given to the language which will effectuate the evident intent of the constitution to prohibit special laws upon this subject, and to prevent the legislature from responding to applications from interested parties for laws designed solely to increase their salaries.

Again, in Dougherty v. Austin it is intimated that the classification authorized is only for the purpose of incorporation and organization. This law can hardly be said to be for either purpose. It is suggested that San José, having been incorporated before the present constitution was adopted, is not and cannot be classified by a general law passed for that purpose in pursuance of section 6, art. 11. If this be conceded, it would seem to follow that municipalities incorporated before the present constitution took effect are not affected by any laws in regard to municipalities which do not apply to all municipalities in the state, or, if they can be classified for the purpose of legislation, such classification, not being authorized by express provision, must be strictly in accordance with the principles above stated. The law in question here, if the class specified would include San José alone, is a law limiting the discretion of the council of San José in regard to the compensation of policemen. There is nothing in the fact that the population is between 10,000 and 25,000 which suggests a possible reason for excepting such municipalities from the general rule. No rational ground for the distinction appears. The classification is therefore arbitrary and unauthorized. So far as the law affects appellant, it merely raises his salary from $75 per month to $100 per month. The fact that this is done by requiring the council to so increase the salary, instead of doing it directly, does not make any difference. It is certainly void as to appellant. Const.

art. 11, § 9; Id. art. 4, § 25, subd. 29. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

DE HAVEN and FITZGERALD, JJ. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance upon the ground that a valid classification can be made only by a general act which classifies all the counties, putting each into a distinctive category, or by an act amending such general act so as either to preserve the original classes, or to reconstruct them, in whole or in part, into new and distinctive classifications.

PEOPLE v. BIDDLEMAN. (No. 21,147.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

EMBEZZLEMENT FROM EMPLOYER — EVIDENCE — PROOF OF HANDWRITING—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. On a trial for embezzlement, it appeared the defendant collected bills, which he credited to the personal accounts of the customers, without entering them on the cashbook, or charging them to himself, or paying them over to his employer. Defendant claimed that he was authorized to expend money in the interest of candidates for office who were friends of his employer, and also in entertaining customers. Defendant was allowed a specific amount for personal expenses, and admitted that there was no understanding that he could expend money and not enter it on the books of his employer. Held, that the evidence sustained a verdict of guilty.

2. On a trial for embezzlement, a receipted bill, the amount of which was charged in the information to have been embezzled, and shown to have been paid by a customer to defendant, and not accounted for, is admissible.

3. On a trial for embezzlement, where the information which charged the offense to have been committed on or about December 31, 1891, and before May 1, 1892, was presented on August 22, 1892, evidence of an offense committed on March 7, 1892, is admissible; Pen. Code, § 955, providing that "the precise time at which an offense was committed need not be stated in the information, but may be alleged to have been committed at any time before finding or filing thereof."

4. On a trial for embezzlement, a witness for the people cannot, on cross-examination, state his conclusion, from the manner in which defendant conducted his employer's business, as to whether defendant was the manager thereof.

5. On a trial for embezzlement, the identification of receipts purporting to have been signed by defendant is sufficiently proved to permit them to be put in evidence when a witness testifies that he is familiar with defendant's handwriting, and that he thinks the handwriting on the receipt is that of defendant, but that he did not see defendant sign them, and would not swear that it was his handwriting.

6. On a trial for embezzlement, evidence that money belonging to his employer received by defendant, other than that specified in the information, was not entered on the books or accounted for, is admissible to show a plan and an intent to conceal the appropriation of the money mentioned in the information.

7. On a trial for embezzlement, evidence of what the profits of defendant's employer were while defendant was misappropriating the money is irrelevant.

8. Testimony as to what defendant said about opening a new ledger, and the condition of the books kept by him, and the possibility of making a trial balance, is competent to show the methods and conduct of defendant in disposing of the misappropriated moneys.

9. On a trial for embezzlement, defendant testified that his employer permitted him to expend money for many different purposes, in order to promote the business of his employer; that he felt justified in what he expended; and that he did not intend to steal or embezzle the money taken. Held, that it was competent to show on his cross-examination that his conduct in leaving the city was inconsistent with such statements.

10. Exceptions not presented by the bill of exceptions cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Enoch G. Bidleman was convicted of embezzlement, and appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Long and Eugene N. Deuprey, for appellant. Wm. S. Barnes and E. S. Pillsbury, for the People.

HAYNES, C. Appellant is charged with the embezzlement of $7,486.63, the moneys of D. V. B. Henarie, doing business under the firm name of E. Martin & Co., in the city and county of San Francisco, and was found guilty of the embezzlement of $717.65, part of the sum charged in the information, and was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of four years. His motion for a new trial having been denied, he appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. Appellant contends that the verdict is not justified by the evidence, and, under this head, specifies certain particulars, which will be briefly noticed.

The evidence shows very clearly and without conflict that many bills for goods sold to customers were collected by defendant, all of which collections, with one or two exceptions, were credited to the personal account of the customer on the ledger, but were not entered upon the cashbook, nor charged to the personal account of the defendant, nor in any manner accounted for or paid over to his employer. To meet and avoid the effect of these facts, it is claimed that the evidence shows that the defendant was authorized by his employer to expend money in the interest of candidates for office who were friends of the house of E. Martin & Co., and thereby promote the business interests of Henarie, the proprietor, and also to expend money in entertaining customers from the interior, and in other ways for the like purpose, and that it was agreed that moneys so spent should not be entered as items of disbursements or receipts upon the books, and that the moneys charged to have been embezzled were expended with the consent and under the direction of his employer. Prior to June, 1890, defendant was paid a salary of $3,000 per annum, and, in addition, was allowed the sum of $50 per month for personal expenses in connection with the business; and after that date he was paid a salary of $4,000, which was to cover defendant's personal expenses in connection with the business, as well as his services. Defendant testified in his own behalf, and admitted that there was no understanding that he could expend money, and not enter it upon the books; and, so far as his testimony went to sustain any of the facts now claimed to be unsupported by the evidence, he was met by the positive testimony of Henarie to the contrary. We have carefully read and considered all the evidence, and entertain no doubt that the verdict was fully sustained, and so far, at least, as this branch of the motion for new trial is concerned, the motion was properly denied.

Defendant's objection to the testimony of Mr. Cox in relation to a bill receipted by defendant for $107.04 was properly overruled. The objection was not only premature, being to a preliminary question, but the evidence afterwards showed that said amount was paid to defendant, and not accounted for, and was included in the amount charged in the information to have been embezzled.

John Clonen, called on behalf of the people, testified that he paid E. Martin & Co.'s bill, $121.90, to defendant, March 7, 1892, and produced the bill receipted by defendant. Defendant's objection that the time of payment of this bill was too remote from the time alleged in the information, we think, was properly overruled. The information charged the offense to have been committed "on or about the 31st day of December, 1891, and before the 1st day of May, 1892." The information was presented and filed August 22, 1892. Section 955 of the Penal Code provides: "The precise time at which an offense was committed need not be stated in the indictment or information, but it may be alleged to have been committed at any time before the finding or filing thereof, except where the time is a material ingredient in the offense." The evidence was received by the court upon the representation that it would be shown the money was never accounted for or paid over to Henarie, and that it was part of the sum charged in the information; and, as no motion was afterwards made to strike it out, we assume that such proof was made. Similar objections were made to evidence of many other sums of money received by defendant from persons indebted to the house for merchandise, and to which the foregoing remarks apply.

Upon cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution, counsel for defendant asked him what conclusion he came to, from the manner in which defendant conducted the business, as to whether or not he was the manager, and had full control, or otherwise. The court very properly refused to permit the question to be answered, though the district attorney did not state the grounds of his objection. What the witness thought could not change the relation which in fact existed, nor would the statement of the objection have enabled the defendant to show that it might have been obviated. Spottiswood v. Weir, 80 Cal. 450, 451, 22 Pac. 289, and cases there cited.

As to the evidence of Buneman in relation to certain receipts purporting to have been signed by defendant, to the effect that he was familiar with his handwriting, that he thought it was his handwriting, but that he did not see him sign them, and would not swear that it was his handwriting, while not conclusive or positive, it was sufficient to permit the receipts to be put in evidence, and the court did not err in overruling defendant's objection. It is said by appellant, however, that these sums were not of the moneys charged to have been embezzled. Whether this is true or not, is not easy to determine. There were a large number of witnesses, and there is in the transcript no index to the testimony of any of them, nor does appellant give any reference in his brief to the page or folio where any item of evidence may be found. But if we concede that any particular sum which is shown by the evidence to have been received by the defendant, and not entered upon the books, or accounted for, was received at a period remote from the date named in the information, or not included in the sum therein specified, it may still be competent evidence tending to show a system adopted by the defendant to conceal the conversion of the money, and the intent with which the money mentioned in the information was appropriated by him to his own use, and thus tend to prove the defendant guilty of the offense charged. People v. Lane, 100 Cal. 379, 34 Pac. 856; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 138, 32 Pac. 864.

It is also specified that the court erred in not permitting the witness Bell to answer the question: "What had been the profits of this firm for the three years preceding July 25, 1892?" This question was not asked of Bell, but of the defendant, upon redirect examination, and it was objected that it was not a re-examination. The ruling was not erroneous. Even though the court might, in its discretion, have permitted a matter to be inquired about which was not within the scope of a proper examination, the evidence called for was wholly irrelevant. The testimony of the witness Bell touching the conversation with defendant about opening a new ledger, and as to the condition of the books kept by defendant, and whether a trial balance could be made from them, for the reasons stated by the witness, was competent, and properly received. It all tended to show the methods and conduct of the defendant touching the moneys charged to have been embezzled. The conversations touching discrepancies occurring in the year 1891 were competent, inasmuch as these tended to show a method so long continued as to preclude the supposition that the later ones were accidental, or the result of negligence.

Defendant, having testified in his own behalf, was asked the following question: "Did you leave this city and county on the 25th day of July, 1892?" His counsel objected that it was not cross-examination. No answer was given to the question. It appeared from the testimony of other witnesses that on the day named in the question, just before lunch time, Mr. Henarie asked defendant for an explanation of certain entries on the ledger that were not entered on the cashbook, and which defendant did not explain; but Henarie, still not believing that defendant was dishonest, invited him to go to lunch with him, as he usually did. When they entered the place where they usually lunched, defendant left him, took a coupé, went to the bank, and drew his money, then went to the Panama steamer, which was ready to sail, bought his ticket on board, under the name of E. H. Young, and left for Panama. The steamer put into San Diego for coal, and while there the defendant was arrested. Other questions in regard to his going away were also asked upon cross-examination, to which the same objection was made. The circumstance under which defendant went away, as well as the fact of his going, having been shown by the prosecution, and not denied by the defendant, the cross-examination upon this point was unnecessary; but it was not improper in a legal sense, nor prejudicial. His testimony tended to show that he was permitted by Mr. Henarie to expend moneys for many different purposes, with a view to promoting the business of the house; that Henarie knew he was spending money; that he did not expend any moneys that he did not feel he was justified in expending; and that he never took any money with the intent to steal or embezzle it. It was entirely competent for the prosecution to show, upon cross-examination, that his conduct was inconsistent with the statements made in his direct testimony. This question was very carefully considered and fully discussed in the recent case of People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 466, 475, 35 Pac. 80, which is conclusive.

In this connection we may notice the specification that the court erred in putting to defendant the question: "Well, if you didn't take the money, why did you go away?" The bill of exceptions does not show that the court put any question to the defendant. There is in the transcript an affidavit made by counsel for defendant showing that such question was put. This affidavit was filed in the case long before the bill of exceptions was settled, but for what purpose does not appear. It has no place in the record, and cannot be considered.

It is also specified that the court erred in refusing to permit the complaint and answer in the civil action of Henarie v. Bidleman to be read in evidence. This exception cannot be considered, as the record does not contain the papers offered, nor the substance of them, nor even show what the action was about.

Another specification is that the court erred in permitting a change or amendment of the verdict by the jury after it was first presented to the court. The bill of exceptions, however, does not show that any objection was made thereto, or any exception taken. The point cannot therefore be reviewed. We may say, however, that the proceedings in relation thereto appear to be fully justified by People v. Jenkins, 56 Cal. 7, and People v. Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 385, 29 Pac. 776.

We find in the record no error which would justify a reversal, and think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VAN CLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

OLMSTEAD v. DAUPHINY et al. (No. 15,594.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

PARTNERSHIP—CHANGE OF MEMBERS—ASSUMPTION OF DEBTS OF OLD FIRM—EFFECT—JOINDER OF ACTIONS—CONDUCT OF TRIAL.

1. In an action to recover over payments to defendant firm on an account with the firm which it succeeded, evidence that the new firm was composed of one of the members of the old firm and another who had purchased the retiring member's interest and had agreed to assume the old firm debts, and that plaintiff's account was carried forward without change, and without balancing, after the dissolution of the old firm, will sustain a finding that defendant assumed the debts of the old firm, including a charge against it for payments made on the account, but not credited on the books when they were transferred to defendant.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, providing that several causes of action may be united in the one complaint if they arise out of contracts express or implied, a cause of action for rent under a lease and one for the recovery of money paid by mistake may be joined.

3. Courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction of an action to recover money paid under mistake of fact.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 625, making it optional for the court, in an action to recover money only, to submit particular questions of fact to the jury, its refusal to do so can be reviewed only for abuse of discretion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by W. T. Olmstead against A. C. Dauphiny and P. McAleenan, copartners, to recover rent and money paid on account stated. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ford & Burnell, for appellants. E. W. Wilson, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action is brought to recover the sum of $1,362.46, as follows: $140 for rent upon certain premises leased, concerning which there is practically no controversy; and the further sum of $1,222.46, for money averred to have been paid by plaintiff to defendants under a mistake upon an account stated. Plaintiff had a verdict for $720, upon which judgment was entered. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

It appears from the pleadings and evidence that on or about January 1, 1892, the defendants rendered to plaintiff an account in writing, showing a balance due from the latter to the former, which account and balance was acquiesced in by the plaintiff, except as to some items due him on account of the rent of a building leased by him to defendants. These items were adjusted, and a balance of $528.81, appearing due from plaintiff, was by him paid to defendants. Plaintiff subsequently discovered that defendants had failed to credit him with certain checks paid by him to them, and brought this action to recover therefor. The evidence showed beyond reasonable doubt that a draft dated January 22, 1890, on, etc., for $40, and one of June 15, 1890, for $540, were received from plaintiff, and no credit given therefor. These amounts, with $140 due on account of rent, make up the amount of the verdict. The only question of any importance in the case relates to the liability of the firm of A. C. Dauphiny & Co., composed of defendants, for the amount of these checks. In 1890, when such checks were paid in by plaintiff, the firm was that of Dauphiny Bros. On January 1, 1891, G. A. Dauphiny, one of the members of the firm of Dauphiny Bros., sold his interest in said firm to the defendant P. McAleenan, who thereupon formed a copartnership with the other defendant herein under the firm name of A. C. Dauphiny & Co., and said firm have since said date carried on the business of merchandising at Eureka, Humboldt county, theretofore conducted by their predecessors. The vital question at the trial was, did the new firm assume the debts and liabilities of the old firm of Dauphiny Bros.? In addition to finding a general verdict, certain special issues were submitted to the jury, upon which they were instructed to find, and upon the above question of the assumption of such liabilities the finding was in the affirmative. This finding is assailed as being unsupported by the evidence. It must be conceded that the evidence is not very clear, and not entirely satisfactory. That defendant McAleenan purchased the interest of G. A. Dauphiny in the old firm of Dauphiny Bros., and agreed to assume the liabilities of that firm, is abundantly established. The contention is that the assets and liabilities of the old firm were marshaled, the amount of each determined, the former purchased, and the latter assumed; that, as the mistake in plaintiff's account did not appear on the books, it was not assumed by defendants. As a general rule, one who purchases credits, and as a part of the consideration assumes debts, takes them cum onere. If the credits turn out to be in excess of their supposed value, the purchaser is entitled to the excess, and if the debts are larger than is supposed, he must bear the burden. There is some evidence tending to show that that is just what the parties did here. The defendants and the firm of which they are the successors constituted a family, consisting of a father, his two sons, and the brother-in-law of one, at least, of the latter. The accounts as rendered and in evidence tend to show that upon a dissolution of the former firm and organization of the latter no change was made in the account of plaintiff, but it was carried forward without a rest or striking a balance, precisely as though no change had occurred in the personnel of the firm. The jury evidently thought that the theory that defendant McAleenan bought the assets and assumed the liabilities of his vendor, but did not agree to assume the real balance due plaintiff, was an afterthought, and there is some reason for such an assumption. There was a deduction made in favor of defendant McAleenan from the book accounts of over $1,000 for what is termed "contingencies," which is not explained, and which the jury may have supposed was intended to meet just such emergencies as that presented by this case. Upon the whole, it is concluded that, as the court below and jury were satisfied with the verdict, it should not be disturbed here.

The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled, and the motion for a nonsuit properly denied. The contention that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, one cognizable in a court of law and the other in a court of equity, cannot be maintained. "The plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint where they all arise out of: (1) Contracts, express or implied." Code Civ. Proc. § 427. Each of the causes of action set out in the complaint arose upon contract, the one upon an express and the other upon an implied contract. Again, an action to recover back money paid upon a mistake of fact is one in which courts of law and equity had concurrent jurisdiction. The primary right and the remedy, where it seeks only to recover the money thus paid, are as certainly cognizable in a court of law as in an action upon a quantum valebant for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, or a quantum meruit for services rendered, etc. Had the right to recover depended, not upon the violation of a primary right recognized by the law, but only in equity, or if for the violation of a legal right the remedy sought had been such as a court of equity only could give, it would be proper to denominate it an equitable action; but nothing of the kind is claimed here. The causes of action are both legal, and not equitable.

The statute of limitations was not properly invoked. The account between the parties was a "mutual, open, and current account," with reciprocal demands between the parties, up to within two years of the time when the action was brought, and the mistake upon which the action is predicated was shown to have been discovered within one year next before suit brought.

At the trial the court submitted to the jury certain special issues upon which it required said jury to find in addition to a general verdict, which was done. Counsel for defendants requested the court to submit certain other special issues, which it refused, and such refusal is assigned as error. This was an action for the recovery of money only, and, under section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it was optional with the court to submit or refuse to submit particular questions of fact to the jury. The exercise of the power, and the extent of its exercise, are left to the discretion of the court, and error cannot be maintained without at least a clear showing of the abuse of such discretion, which does not appear in the present instance.

Objections were made by counsel for appellants to the giving of certain instructions asked by plaintiff, to the refusal of the court to give instructions asked by defendants, and to the modification of others of defendants' instructions. The errors predicated upon these several rulings are noticed in appellants' brief, but are not argued at length. To demonstrate the propriety of the action of the court below in the premises would involve the necessity of setting out all of the instructions given, refused, and modified, the effect of which would be to extend this opinion to great length; and, as the questions present no principle of importance except to a disposition of the case in hand, we shall content ourselves by saying that the instructions given by the court at the request of the parties presented the law of the case fully, clearly, and fairly, and that those refused were either presented more clearly in those given or were inapplicable as applied to the facts in the case. The objections to evidence are unimportant. Upon a review of the whole case, no error is discovered calling for a reversal, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

MAHAN v. WOOD. (No. 15,608.)

ACTION ON NOTE—EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

In an action on a note, in which the defense is failure of consideration, evidence that defendant subscribed for stock in a certain association, for which the note in suit was not given, is irrelevant and immaterial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Henry H. Mahan against Guy M. Wood on a promissory note. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pringle, Hayne & Boyd and Wm. H. Field, for appellant. Edward R. Taylor, W. S. Goodfellow, and John R. Jarboe, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover the amount of principal and interest alleged to be due on a promissory note executed by the defendant to the plaintiff on March 19, 1869. The defense is failure of consideration. This is the third appeal in the case. On the first trial the plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appealed. It was held by this court that the defense was established by the facts shown, and the judgment was accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. 44 Cal. 462. On the second trial the defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial. His motion was granted, and the defendant appealed from the order. The appellant contended that the facts were substantially the same as on the former appeal, and for that reason the court below was bound, as a matter of law, to refuse a new trial. It was said by this court: "There is no doubt that, where the facts are the same as on a former appeal, the principles and rules announced by the court will be recognized on a subsequent appeal as the law of the case. And if the case were before us now on appeal from the last judgment of the court below, which was in favor of the defendant, we should doubtless affirm the judgment,—unless some error in the admission or exclusion of evidence necessitated a new trial,—because the facts found are substantially the same as the facts shown by the record when the case was here before; but, where the court has set aside its findings of fact and granted a new trial, can we say what the facts are without usurping the functions of the trial court?" It was held that the evidence was conflicting, and the order was affirmed. 79 Cal. 258, 21 Pac. 757. On the third trial the court found the facts and gave judgment in favor of the defendant, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant contends that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and for that reason the judgment should be reversed.

This contention cannot be sustained. The evidence was conflicting, but that given on behalf of the defendant, if true,—and it must have been believed,—was clearly sufficient to justify and support all of the findings. The facts shown were substantially the same as on the two former trials, and, without stating the evidence, we deem it enough to say that the judgment cannot be reversed on this ground.

Only one alleged error of law is relied upon. That arose from the striking out of an answer given by plaintiff's witness Nye. The record shows as follows. Nye said: "I know he used to come in and pay installments on the Point Lobos Avenue Association. I was acting as secretary of the Point Lobos in the absence of Mr. Blake. * * * Q. Do you know whether or not Mr. Wood subscribed for shares in that association? A. Simply by having his name entered in the book, and paying his installments. Mr. Taylor: We move to strike that out. Mr. Pringle: I want to show what the transaction was." The court sustained the objection, and the plaintiff excepted to the ruling. We fail to see how the plaintiff was or could have been prejudiced by this ruling. The note in suit was not given for shares of stock in the Point Lobos Avenue Association, and evidence that defendant had subscribed for stock in that association would have had no tendency to prove that he had subscribed for stock in another association. He might have subscribed for shares in the Point Lobos, and have bought shares from the plaintiff in some other association. The question was irrelevant and immaterial, and there was no error, therefore, in striking out the answer. The judgment and order are affirmed.

BROWN v. ROUSE et al. (No. 15,491.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

HUSBAND AS AGENT—RATIFICATION OF ACTS BY WIFE—ESTOPPEL.

1. The fact that a wife, under the mistaken belief that a note and mortgage executed by her husband, as her agent, for money borrowed by him, was binding on her, acquiesced in the payment of installments of interest on the note, does not constitute a ratification of his act.

2. A married woman who gives her husband a power of attorney to borrow money for her and execute a mortgage in her name, which is invalid, in that her acknowledgment did not state that she was examined separately, is not estopped to assert that the transaction is not binding on her.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Adam Brown against Charlotte D. Rouse and others. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Rouse appeals. Reversed.

John H. Durist, Jacobs & Wolf, and Wm. A. Bowden, for appellant. W. C. Kennedy, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This cause was here on a former appeal, 93 Cal. 237, 28 Pac. 1044. The original complaint alleged these facts: On November 18, 1887, the defendant Charlotte Rouse, a married woman, by her alleged attorney in fact, G. M. Rouse, who was her husband, made and executed to plaintiff her promissory note for $1,200, and a mortgage to secure the same on certain land which was her separate property, situated in Santa Clara county, Cal. She properly acknowledged the power of attorney under which the mortgage was executed, but the notary neglected to recite in his certificate that she was examined apart from her husband, etc. At that time there was a previous mortgage on the land for $400, executed by said Charlotte to one Davis; and, at the time of the execution of the mortgage sued on, the said Davis mortgage was satisfied out of the $1,200 for which said mortgage sued on was given. It was alleged that said Charlotte "procured plaintiff to pay and satisfy said (Davis) lien and mortgage," and that he did pay it at her request. The prayer of the complaint was that the certificate of the notary be corrected; that plaintiff be subrogated to the rights of Davis under his mortgage; and that the mortgaged premises be sold, all the parties defendant foreclosed, and a deficiency judgment docketed against the said Charlotte. The court found that the said power of attorney gave the husband no right to make said note and mortgage. It also found that the Davis mortgage had been paid by plaintiff, but that the payment was voluntary, and denied the subrogation. The court, however, gave a personal judgment for plaintiff against Charlotte for the amount of the note. Upon appeal, the judgment was reversed for the reason stated in the opinion. 93 Cal. 237, 28 Pac. 1044. When the case went back to the superior court the plaintiff amended his complaint by inserting therein the averments "that on the 18th day of November, 1887, plaintiff above named loaned to said Charlotte Rouse, in U. S. gold coin, the sum of $1,200," which she promised to repay, but had not repaid. The complaint otherwise remained as it had been. The court found, as before, that the power of attorney gave the husband of the said Charlotte no power to make said note and mortgage, and that plaintiff was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of said Davis. It found, however, that on November 18, 1887, said G. M. Rouse, assuming to act for the said Charlotte, borrowed from plaintiff $1,198, and gave him the said note for $1,200, and executed said mortgage, and that said Charlotte ratified and confirmed said loan by causing two installments of interest to be paid thereon. It was also found that, of the money borrowed by G. M. Rouse from plaintiff, $481.65 was paid in satisfaction of said prior mortgage to said Davis. Upon these findings a personal judgment is entered against said defendant, Charlotte, for the amount of said loan, with interest, amounting to $1,510.68. From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the said defendant, Charlotte D. Rouse, appeals. A motion was submitted here to dismiss the appeal on account of alleged insufficiency of the undertaking on appeal, which motion is denied.

Appellant's counsel argues strenuously that under our statutes a cause of action for borrowed money not covered by a mortgage cannot be united with a cause of action for the foreclosure of a mortgage; also, that the alleged borrowed money is a new cause of action, and cannot be presented as an amendment; and also that, under any view, the action for borrowed money, independent of the note and mortgage, was not brought until the said amendment was made to the complaint, and that then the two-years period of limitation had barred it. See Anderson v. Mayers, 50 Cal. 525. We do not, however, deem it necessary to pass definitely upon these points, because we agree with appellant's contention that the evidence does not support the finding that appellant ratified and confirmed the alleged loan made by her husband from plaintiff. This question depends more upon the correct conclusion to be drawn from facts proven, than upon a correct weighing of conflicting evidence. The court below deduced the conclusion that appellant ratified the original loan from the fact that she allowed her agent to pay two installments of interest upon the note and mortgage, and we think that the conclusion was erroneous. During these transactions, appellant lived in Oregon. She had an agent in Santa Clara county, Cal., where the mortgaged premises were situated, who collected rents, paid taxes and expenses, etc., for her. The note and mortgage bore interest payable every six months, and her agent paid the two first installments of interest, and included the same in the stated accounts which he sent to her in Oregon, and it appears that she acquiesced in the accounts. But it abundantly appears that she thought that the payments were made on the note and mortgage, as they in fact were, and that she supposed the note and mortgage were valid instruments which effectually bound her, and from which she could not escape. When asked if she acquiesced in the execution of the mortgage, appellant said: "I was obliged to. It was done, he had the money, and I could not help myself." She consented to the two payments of interest, not as interest upon a mere verbal loan made by her husband, but as interest on a genuine note and mortgage executed in her name, and which bound her firmly and irrevocably. Now, it is an inherent element of ratification that the party to be charged with it must have fully known what he was doing. In King v. Lagrange, 50 Cal. 332, the court say: "If ignorance or mistake of law should enlarge the estate transferred by the executor's deed, it should excuse her; for the very essence either of an election or ratification is that it is done advisedly, with full knowledge of the party's rights." The case at bar does not involve the principle that ratification will be strongly presumed against one who has accepted and had the beneficial use of the property or money involved in the transaction. With the exception of the amount paid on the prior Davis mortgage (which will be noticed hereafter), appellant did not receive or have the benefit of any of the money obtained from plaintiff by her husband. He kept it all himself, and shortly afterwards deserted her. Neither is there any element of estoppel here. Appellant did not fraudulently induce plaintiff to loan money to G. M. Rouse. Plaintiff, no doubt, feels aggrieved; but one who deals with an assumed agent of a married woman whom he has never seen should certainly make careful inquiry as to the validity and scope of the agency. As to the $481.65 which went to satisfy the Davis mortgage, it would certainly be proper and just for appellant to pay it, and it is stated in appellant's brief that she is willing to pay it. We do not see, however, that in the present state of the case we can modify the judgment without making new findings. Perhaps, under appropriate pleadings and findings, plaintiff could recover for the amount of the money that went to satisfy the said prior mortgage. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

EASTON, ELDRIDGE & CO. v. MILLINGTON. (No. 15,485.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)

REAL PROPERTY—CONTRACT TO CONVEY—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Specific performance of a written agreement entered into by a property owner with a real-estate broker, "to sell and give full title and deed" to a certain lot, with the buildings thereon, for a sum named, and the assumption of a mortgage on such lot by "the buyer," and containing also an agreement to transfer insurance "to the purchaser on completion of this sale," but omitting any reference to the time in which the sale was to be made, cannot be compelled after its revocation by the owner.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Easton, Eldridge & Co., a corporation, against S. Millington, to compel the specific performance by defendant of an alleged contract to convey certain real property to plaintiff. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying it a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thornton & Merzbach, for appellant. Rein-stein & Eisner, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, a corporation, to compel the specific performance of an alleged contract by defendant to sell and convey certain real property to the plaintiff. Judgment was rendered for defendant, from which, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

On November 19, 1892, plaintiff was, and for a long time had been, a corporation organized "for the purpose of buying and selling real estate, and of dealing in the same as an agent or broker upon commission, and also for the purpose of collecting the rentals of real estate, as an agent for real-estate owners, upon commission." Upon that day defendant executed and gave to plaintiff the written instrument upon which this action is based, and which plaintiff claims can be specifically enforced as a contract by defendant to convey to plaintiff the property described in the instrument. It is as follows: "San Francisco, Nov. 19, 1892. I hereby agree to sell and give a full title and deed of my interest in and to the lot and improvements, 50x100, on S. S. Pine street, between Buchanan and Webster streets, S. F., for the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, the buyer to assume the mortgage on the property to the El Dorado Loan Association, and to have all the rents from date; and I hereby agree to assign to the purchaser all my right and interest in and to 83 shares of stock of the loan association pledged with the mortgage above, and to the insurance now on the property, which I agree to transfer to the purchaser on completion of this sale. S. Millington." At the same time the defendant ordered, in writing, his tenants to pay the rents of the property accruing after said November 19th to plaintiff. Nothing further was done touching the sale of said property before December 10, 1892; and on said last-named day defendant revoked and rescinded said instrument, and also the said authority to collect said rentals, and notified plaintiff of said revocation and rescission. The said instrument is not a sufficient basis for an action to compel defendant to specifically perform a contract to convey to plaintiff the premises therein mentioned. It merely gave plaintiff, a real-estate agent, authority to sell said premises; and, as no time was stated within which the sale could be made, the authority was revocable, at the will of the defendant, at any time before the authority to sell had been exercised. Under any view, the instrument presents no such certainty and mutuality as would warrant the equitable remedy of specific performance, which is always addressed to the discretion of the court, and will not be sustained when the contract is not clear, mutual, and certain, both as to subject-matter and parties. The order of defendant to his tenants to pay rents to plaintiff does not change the character of said written instrument. The court finds that the parties mutually understood and agreed that plaintiff was to collect the rents as agent of defendant, and for the latter's use; but, apart from that finding, the view most favorable to plaintiff is that plaintiff was to collect the rents during the time it was attempting to sell the property, so that it might be in a position to turn them over to "the purchaser," should one be found, as provided in the instrument itself. As, in our opinion, the instrument sued on does not, upon its face, warrant a decree for specific performance, as prayed for, it is not necessary to notice the many other points argued by counsel. Whether or not plaintiff has any cause of action for a breach of contract is a question which does not here arise. The judgment and order are affirmed.

MACDONOUGH v. STARBIRD et al. (No. 15,541.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1894.)

TRADE FIXTURE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—LANDLORD AND TENANT — SALE BY LANDLORD—CONTINUANCE OF LEASE BY PURCHASER.

1. A one-story wooden building, 20 feet square, having for a foundation mudsills laid on the surface of the ground, on which are placed short posts which support the main sills, built and used by tenants on leased premises for a lumber-yard office, is a trade fixture, which the tenants have a right to remove any time during the term.

2. Where land occupied by tenants under a lease from month to month is sold by the landlord, and the purchaser afterwards accepts from the tenants the customary rent for several months, without giving any notice terminating the old lease in the manner prescribed by Civil Code, §§ 789, 827, such purchaser recognizes and continues such lease.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Joseph Macdonough against A. W. Starbird and others for an injunction. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward P. Cole, for appellant. J. H. Henderson, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action to obtain an injunction restraining the defendants from removing a building from a lot of land owned by him. The case was tried, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears that in 1881 one Bartlett was the owner of beach and water lot No. 586, in the city of San Francisco, and leased the same to the defendants from month to month for a lumber yard. The defendants erected on the lot the building in question, to be used by them as an office in conducting their business. The building was a one-story wooden structure 20 feet square, and for its foundation they placed mudsills on the surface of the ground, and on these mudsills were short posts on which the main sills rested. The defendants occupied the lot as tenants of Bartlett, and paid him monthly rent therefor, until about September 1, 1885, when he sold and conveyed the same to one Jennings. Jennings recognized and renewed the said lease, and the defendants thereafter held and occupied the lot as his tenants from month to month; and it was understood and agreed by him that the said building was the property of defendants, and might be removed by them from the lot at any time. In December, 1891, Jennings conveyed to the plaintiff, by an ordinary bargain and sale deed, the said lot, "together with, all and singular, the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issues, and profits thereof." When the plaintiff bought the property he had no knowledge or notice of the agreement between Jennings and defendants that they might remove the building from the lot at any time, other than such as would be given by their occupancy as tenants. No new lease, or agreement as to lease, was made between plaintiff and defendants, but they continued to hold the property from month to month, and to pay to the plaintiff the same rent as before, until December, 1892, when they attempted to remove the building, and this action was commenced. The contention of appellant is (1) that the building was affixed to the land and was a part of the realty, and that he was an innocent purchaser of the land and building, and hence was not bound by the oral agreement of Jennings that defendants could remove the building; (2) that defendants took a new lease from plaintiff, without any new arrangement as to removal, and that they had no right to remove after they ceased to be tenants of Jennings.

The questions arising under appellant's first contention are very elaborately discussed by counsel, but we do not deem it necessary to consider them. In our opinion, the building, if a fixture, was a trade fixture, which, under section 1019 of the Civil Code, defendants had a right to remove at any time during the continuance of their term. Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co., 99 Cal. 636, 34 Pac. 321.

The only questions, then, are: Did the term of defendants' lease end when plaintiff purchased the property? And did the occupancy of the premises after the purchase, without objection, and the payment to and acceptance by the plaintiff of the monthly rent, constitute a new lease, or only a continuance of the old one? It is clear that the mere transfer of the title did not in any way change, modify, or affect the lease. The grantee simply took the place of his grantor, and became the landlord of defendants. The lease continued as before, subject only to change in the mode prescribed by statute. Section 789 of the Civil Code provides: "A tenancy or other estate at will, however created, may be terminated by the landlord's giving notice in writing to the tenant, in the manner prescribed by section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to remove from the premises within a period of not less than one month, to be specified in the notice." And section 827 of the same Code provides: "In all leases of lands or tenements, or of any interest therein, from month to month, the landlord may, upon giving notice in writing at least fifteen days before the expiration of the month, change the terms of the lease, to take effect at the expiration of the month." Here no notice was given by plaintiff, and no attempt was made by him to terminate the lease or change its terms in any way. On the contrary, he accepted the customary rent and allowed the occupancy to continue for a full year. This, it seems to us, shows the recognition and continuance by plaintiff of the old lease, and not the taking of a new one by defendants. It follows, in our opinion, that when defendants commenced to remove the building it was during the continuance of their term of lease, and they had a right to make the removal. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re PHILBROOK.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1894.)

In bank.

Order on Horace W. Philbrook to show cause why he should not be debarred from further practice as an attorney at law.

PER CURIAM. It has come to the attention of the court that one Horace W. Philbrook, an attorney at law, authorized to practice in this court, did upon the 30th day of November, A. D. 1894, file a certain brief in a certain cause then pending in this court, numbered 15-857, and entitled "Ira P. Rankin, Special Administrator of the Estate of John Levinson, Deceased, Plaintiff and Appellant, vs. William J. Newman and Benjamin Newman, Defendants and Respondents," in which said brief there are found matters which in the mind of the court are of a scandalous and contemptuous character. The said scandalous and contemptuous matters are found upon the pages of said brief commencing at page 313 thereof, and extending consecutively down to and including a portion of page 379 thereof, and the whole tenor of said matter may be fairly illustrated by the following excerpt, taken from pages 377 and 378: "It is not enough for courts of justice to be, in fact, pure. In addition to the fact, there must exist the fullest confidence in their purity. It is not enough for judges to be, in fact, strong enough to resist temptation. They must not allow themselves to be tempted. Examine carefully and thoroughly the secret transaction of September 6, 1890. It was without an extenuating circumstance. You have before you here the proof of what its contrivers and users think of courts of justice and of judges. You behold their evil and most contemptuous confidence. They rely solely upon the corrupting force of their corrupt contrivance,—the secret transaction of September 6, 1890, and solely upon that reliance they have been ever since September 6, 1890, and still are, as confident of a final judgment for the Newmans as if they already had it locked up at home. And is it not probable, then, that many others think with them that the courts may be corrupted, the judgments of judges perverted, and that others, still more numerous, suspect it? But if this secret transaction of September 6, 1890, is not declared illegal and void, upon the rules and principles declared in Egerton v. Earl Brownlow, then all to whom knowledge of the case shall come will no longer merely suspect or even think that the courts may be corrupted; they will know it. They may point to the decision here as full proof of it, for it will be established that such practices are permissible, and, if permissible, they are sure to have effect." By reason of the foregoing premises, it is therefore ordered that he, the said Horace W. Philbrook, appear before the court on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1894, at 10 a. m., at the court room thereof, in the city and county of San Francisco, and at that time show cause why he, the said Philbrook, should not be removed from his office as an attorney at law, and debarred from further practicing before the courts of this state, for having violated his oath and duties as an attorney of this court in filing the said brief. It is further ordered that a certified copy of the foregoing order be forthwith served upon said Horace W. Philbrook by the bailiff of this court, and due return made thereof.

HEINTZ v. COOPER. (No. 15,522.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

In an action by a doctor against a patient on an account stated, the defense being that no account was stated, defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence was based on an affidavit of a person, who lived in defendant's house, that she heard plaintiff say that defendant would not pay his bill because he said it was excessive; that defendant was ill at the time, and shortly afterwards was removed from his home to another city; and that she never told defendant or his attorney of what the plaintiff had said till after the trial. Held, that an order granting a new trial would not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by J. P. E. Heintz against J. B. H. Cooper on an account stated. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff. A motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence was granted, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Kearney, for appellant. S. F. Geil and John J. Wyatt, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial. The motion was made upon several grounds, among which was that of newly-discovered evidence, and the order granting the motion specifies the latter as the ground upon which the new trial is granted. The appellant does not deny that the showing was sufficient to warrant the court in holding the evidence newly discovered, and that it was material but the sole ground upon which he urges a reversal of the order is that there was no sufficient showing of diligence. We have carefully examined the record with this objection in view, and we are unable, after such examination, to say that the showing upon the point urged is so devoid of merit as to amount to an abuse of discretion. The granting of a new trial upon this ground is so peculiarly within the discretion of the trial court that the record must be very bald indeed which will induce this court to interfere with its action. And that this should be so is perfectly obvious. "Diligence" is a relative term, incapable of exact definition. What would amount to due diligence under one state of facts would fall absolutely short of it under another and different state of facts. It depends, therefore, so essentially upon the particular circumstances of each case, with all their distinct and varying phases and bearings, as they have appeared to the lower court at the trial and throughout the conduct of the cause, in determining whether diligence has been used in any particular instance, that this court should hesitate to disturb a ruling upon this ground where it has any substance whatever upon which to rest. The presumption is that the discretion has been properly exercised, and that presumption must be overcome by a clear want of facts before the order will be disturbed. See Jones v. Singleton, 45 Cal. 92; Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 180; Kenezleber v. Wahl, 92 Cal. 202, 28 Pac. 225. There is no such want in the showing made here. The action was to recover for surgical and medical services rendered defendant while suffering from a broken leg. The complaint contained two counts, one upon an account stated and the second upon quantum meruit. Both the existence of an account stated and the value of the services were denied. At the trial there arose a sharp conflict in the evidence as to the value of the services, but the positive testimony upon the question whether the account had become a stated account was confined solely to that given by the plaintiff on the one part and the defendant on the other, and between whom there was a contradiction, the plaintiff testifying that defendant made no objection to the amount of his bill,—at least until some time after it was rendered,—and defendant testifying that he had. It did appear, however, that the defendant immediately discharged plaintiff upon receiving his bill, and shortly after sent him a check for $500; and defendant within a day or so thereafter had himself removed from the town of Monterey, where he then was, to San Francisco, and put in charge of another physician. The court found the account had become stated, and gave judgment for the full amount demanded. The newly-discovered evidence is all addressed to the point whether there was a stated account between the parties, and the principal feature of it is that given by the affidavit of one Concepcion Speegle, a woman who lived at the house in Monterey where defendant was confined with his broken limb. She says, in substance, that just before defendant was removed to San Francisco she heard Dr. Heintz, the plaintiff, say that defendant would not pay his bill because defendant said it was too large and excessive; that defendant was ill, and confined to his bed at the time, and that she never informed defendant or his attorney of what Dr. Heintz had said until after the trial of this case. The materiality of this evidence, as above suggested, is not denied; but appellant claims that with any sort of diligence defendant could have informed himself of it in time to produce it at the trial. But it does not appear that there was anything to put defendant upon inquiry for any such evidence. The witness, it seems, said nothing about the circumstance, and very likely thought little, if anything, of it. She lived at the time, it is true, in the same house with defendant, but he was confined to his room, and the next day or so was taken to San Francisco, where it appears he has since resided, while the witness, we infer from the record, has continued to have her home in Monterey. The lower court might well say, under all the circumstances, that there was not an absence of diligence on the part of defendant; and, having found against him upon the issue to which the newly-discovered evidence is addressed, have felt constrained, in view of the conflict as to the value of the services rendered, to grant the motion for a new trial. Order affirmed.

(No. 15,591.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1894.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—VACATING.

While a motion to open a default is addressed largely to the discretion of the court, all doubts should be resolved in favor of the application; and, where the circumstances lead the court to hesitate as to the merits of the application, an order denying such a motion will be reversed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. H. Levy, Judge.

defendant's death, Annie Black, his administratrix, moved to open the default, and from an order denying her motion she appeals. Reversed.

Geo. C. Sargent, for appellant. F. Wm. Reade, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The respondent commenced this action against William Black in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on May 6, 1893, and on the same day summons was issued and personally served upon him in said city. No appearance by or on behalf of Black was made, and on May 31st a judgment by default was entered against him. On June 5, 1893, he died, and thereafter the appellant, Annie Black, the surviving wife of deceased, was duly appointed administratrix of his estate. On July 14th, upon suggestion of the death of Black, appellant, as such administratrix, was, by an order of the court, substituted as defendant in his place; and thereafter, on the 22d day of the same month, she served notice upon the respondent that she would on a day named move the court to vacate and set aside the said judgment by default, upon the ground that it was taken against said deceased through his excusable neglect. At the hearing of the motion, appellant produced and read several affidavits, including an affidavit of merits, and presented a verified answer. The respondent also read several counter affidavits. The motion was submitted upon the judgment roll and the affidavits read by the respective parties, and denied by the court, and from that order this appeal is prosecuted.

It is settled law in this state that applications of this kind are addressed largely to the legal discretion of the trial court, and that the exercise of that discretion ought to tend in a reasonable degree, at least, to bring about a judgment on the merits of the case; and when the circumstances are such as to lead the court to hesitate upon the motion to open the default, it is better, as a general rule, that the doubt should be resolved in favor of the application. Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 17; Pearson v. Fishing Co., 99 Cal. 425, 34 Pac. 76. The affidavits read by appellant, if true, clearly establish the fact that the original defendant, William Black, from the time summons was served upon him till he died, was diseased in mind and body, and unable to attend rationally to any business. It is true that many of the facts stated in those affidavits are controverted by the counter-affidavits; but, after carefully reading all the affidavits, we are satisfied that the circumstances were such as to lead any court to hesitate, and, this being so, we think the doubt should have been resolved in favor of the application. As the order must be reversed, it is not necessary to consider the question as to whether the court erred in sustaining the objection of respondent to the affidavit of Dr. C. N. Ellinwood, the physician who attended upon said Black during his illness. The order is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the judgment, and allow appellant to file her answer to the complaint.

WHITE v. BEER et al. (No. 15,480.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 6, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Findings made on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

Action by one White against Mrs. Jennie Beer and others on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Oates and J. H. Seawell, for appellants. Thomas L. Carothers and Thornton & Merzbach, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. 1. So far as relates to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, we think the case falls within the well-settled rule that the findings of the trial court will not be set aside by us when there is a substantial conflict in the evidence.

2. The refusal of plaintiff to release the defendant Mrs. Jennie Beer from the payment of the note sued on, and to accept the other defendants, Clifton and Weil, as his sole debtors thereon, was not a fraud upon the other creditors of Mrs. Beer, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ANDERSON. (No. 21,120.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where defendant in a murder trial, to show that deceased was of a quarrelsome character, testifies that he saw him stab a person in a difficulty, he may, on cross-examination, be examined as to what he saw in connection with the stabbing, to show who was the aggressor.

2. Insulting remarks by defendant, made concerning a witness, which were repeated to the witness, and statements by the witness showing prejudice against defendant, are admissible as affecting her credibility.

3. Where the charge, taken as a whole, correctly states the law, error in isolated paragraphs thereof is not ground for reversal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Richard Anderson was convicted of manslaughter, and appeals. Reversed.

Ford & Burnell, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and found guilty of manslaughter, with a recommendation to the mercy of the court. He was sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison for the term of six and a half years, and has appealed from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. It was clearly proved at the trial that the defendant committed the homicide charged, and the only defense was that, under the circumstances shown, it was justifiable or excusable. It is claimed that the court committed several errors prejudicial to the defendant in its rulings upon the admission and exclusion of evidence, and in the giving, modifying, and refusing instructions to the jury.

1. When the defendant was on the stand as a witness, he testified at great length, on his direct examination, about the difficulties and quarrels he had had with the deceased, Donohue, and about Donohue's quarrelsome character, and, among other things, said he had seen him stab a young man named Cook twice in the back. On cross-examination he said he did not see the stabbing, but saw the marks on his back, and was there at the time it was done. He was asked: "Who was the cause of that trouble,—Cook or Donohue?" "Who did commit the assault at that time?" "What I want to know is who committed the assault there. You say he stabbed a man. I want to know who was the cause of the trouble." These questions were all objected to as not proper cross-examination, and the court ruled that the witness might answer as to what he saw. The witness said: "As far as actually who committed the assault, I don't know. Mr. Donohue told me since that he was the man that was to blame." He then went on to tell what he saw, and closed by saying: "I didn't know how the trouble commenced until last summer, and then I found out." On redirect examination, counsel for the defense offered to prove by the witness what he had heard or knew about the matter, but the court refused to admit the offered evidence, saying: "I don't care about going into that at all. I think it was proper to ask this witness as to what he saw there when he claimed he saw him stab a man. I think it was proper to ask him what the circumstances were that he saw, to show what effect it might have upon him in this case; that is all." It is earnestly urged that each of the rulings above referred to was erroneous, but we see no prejudicial error in either of them. A defendant in a criminal action, who offers himself as a witness, may be cross-examined as to all matters about which he was examined in chief. Pen. Code, § 1323. The defendant testified on his direct examination that he saw Donohue stab Cook, and it was proper, therefore, to cross-examine him as to what he saw in connection with the matter. Besides, the evident purpose of the direct examination was to prove that Donohue wrongfully committed the assault; and this was, in effect, shown by his subsequent statement to the witness that he was the one to blame. The claim that the witness should have been permitted to testify as to what he heard about the stabbing is clearly untenable. It was an effort to introduce hearsay evidence, which was inadmissible.

2. M. T. Steinbrum and Mrs. Steinbrum were witnesses for the prosecution, and gave damaging evidence against the defendant. On cross-examination the former was asked: "Didn't Mr. Donohue tell you, * * * in the presence of Mr. Fisher, that Anderson had made remarks about your family and others?" He answered: "I don't recollect whether he did or not." Counsel for defendant then said: "Well, I will make the offer to prove by the witness Fisher and the witness Morgan that these conversations did occur with Mr. Steinbrum as I have indicated in the questions I asked him." On objection of the district attorney, the offered evidence was excluded. On cross-examination, Mrs. Steinbrum was asked about what had occurred at a time and place named, and then: "Do you remember saying something about hanging Anderson if your evidence would be sufficient?" The witness denied saying anything of the kind, and counsel afterwards offered to prove that she had said "she would hang the defendant if her evidence would do so." This offered evidence was also excluded on objection of the district attorney. It is claimed that these rulings were erroneous, and, in our opinion, the claim must be sustained. The obvious purpose of the offers was to show bias and ill feeling on the part of the witnesses against the defendant, and this it was competent to do. People v. Wasson, 65 Cal. 538, 4 Pac. 555; People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 662, 6 Pac. 859; Schultz v. Railroad Co., 89 N. Y. 242, and cases there cited.

3. It is urged that the defendant was prejudiced before the jury by certain questions propounded by the district attorney to a witness, and by certain remarks made by him in his closing argument. The questions were as to who was the assailant in the affray between Donohue and Cook, and the attorney said: "Tell all about it. I want to show just how it occurred; that Donohue was not to blame." The questions were objected to, and the objection was promptly sustained. It is not perceived, therefore, how the defendant was or could have been prejudiced by them. The remarks complained of were in regard to an ineffectual attempt made by defendant to have Donohue put under bonds to keep the peace some time before he was killed. The attorney said: "Anderson went to see Ben Harris about getting out a warrant to have Donohue arrested. Harris was a justice of the peace. He knew the law, and knew that it was necessary to have the testimony of some other person who heard the threats before the complainant would be entitled to have a warrant of arrest issued to have Donohue bound over to keep the peace. Harris knew this, and he must have told Anderson what was necessary for him to do in order to have Donohue arrested. So, when Anderson started to Garberville, as he says, to have Donohue arrested and put under bonds to keep the peace, he knew that a warrant could not be issued for the arrest of Donohue without the deposition of another witness." This was only a statement as to some of the facts proved in the case, and the law applicable thereto, and, whether correct or not, we see no such misconduct on the part of the district attorney in making it as would justify a reversal.

4. The court instructed the jury at great length, the instructions given covering about 25 pages of the printed transcript. Among other instructions given at the request of the people was one in the language of section 1105 of the Penal Code, as follows: "Upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse it, devolves upon the defendant, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable." It is earnestly contended that this instruction was misleading, because it imports that the burden was cast upon the defendant to prove circumstances that justified or excused the homicide by a preponderance of the evidence, while under the decisions in People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. 127, 549, and other subsequent cases, the rule is settled in this state that he was only bound to produce such evidence as would create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged; and it is claimed, as said in the Bushton Case, that "the jury should have been instructed that the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, or that justified or excused the killing, devolved upon the defendant, but that if, upon the whole case, they entertained a reasonable doubt from the evidence as to his guilt, he should be acquitted." The court instructed the jury very fully as to a reasonable doubt, and how it might arise, and, among other things, told them, at the request of the people: "The defendant is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt which you may have on the evidence. * * * A doubt, to justify an acquittal, must be reasonable, and arise from a candid and impartial consideration of all the evidence in the case." And at the request of the defendant the court told the jury that "the law presumes him (defendant) innocent of the crime with which he is charged until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by competent evidence; and, if the evidence in this case leaves in your minds any reasonable doubt as to the defendant's guilt, the law makes it your duty to acquit him." Instructions must be read as a whole, and, if the entire charge fairly presents the law of the case, the judgment will not be reversed for minor and unimportant defects, or because the court refuses to repeat itself. Looking at the whole charge as given, we think it very fully and fairly presented the law of the case, and left the defendant no valid ground of complaint. The instructions modified were properly changed to make the statements of the law more clear and explicit, and those refused were either inaccurate statements or repetitions of what had already, in effect, been given.

The court instructed the jury as to defendant's testimony as follows: "The defendant has been examined as a witness on his own behalf. This it is his right to be, and the jury will consider his testimony as they would that of any other witness given before you. It is proper, however, for the jury to bear in mind the situation of the defendant, the manner in which he may be affected by your verdict, and the very grave interest he must feel in it, and it is proper for the jury to consider whether this position and interest may not affect his credibility or color his testimony. Still, you are to consider it fairly, and give it such weight as you believe it entitled to receive." Complaint is made that this instruction is in violation of that provision of the constitution which forbids judges to charge juries with respect to matters of fact. While the instruction is not so wide a departure from instructions which have been allowed to pass by this court as not furnishing sufficient ground for reversal, we deem it proper to again call attention to the criticism of similar instructions in the recent cases of People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 31, 24 Pac. 802; People v. Curry (Cal.) 37 Pac. 503; and People v. Lang, Id. 1031.

The other points discussed by counsel need not be considered. For the errors above noted in sustaining objections to the cross-examination of the witnesses Mr. and Mrs. Steinbrum, the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. So ordered.

McVEY v. BEAM. (No. 15,509.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1894.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—OBJECTION NOT RAISED BELOW.

Error in the admission of evidence will not be considered on appeal, where no exception is taken to the ruling admitting it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; James E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Asa N. McVey against Lewis Beam to recover the price of personal property sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. W. Miller, for appellant. L. F. Cooper, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant a certain lot of personal property for the agreed price of $600, viz. 2 horses, 2 buggies, 1 stage, 1 dead axe wagon, a lot of hay (estimated at 15 to 20 tons), 2 sets of double harness, robes, and a lot of oats; and that defendant promised to pay therefor said sum of $600 on or before December 2, 1892, but had failed to pay said sum, or any part thereof, except the sum of $20, whereupon plaintiff prays judgment for $580. The complaint was filed December 17, 1892. The answer denies the alleged delivery of all the property described in the complaint, but admits the delivery of the greater part thereof; denies that any price was fixed or agreed upon, or that defendant agreed to pay more than the reasonable value of the property delivered, and alleges that the reasonable value thereof did not exceed $314; also sets up counterclaims exceeding the alleged value of the property delivered by $27.50, and prays judgment against the plaintiff for this excess. The jury by which the case was tried returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $580, upon which judgment was rendered. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Counsel for appellant has not very clearly specified, either in his bill of exceptions or in his brief, the points he relies upon for a reversal; but I understand him to claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in one or two particulars, and that the court erred in admitting evidence of a novation of the debt in suit. The evidence is more or less conflicting on several issues, but on each of them it is sufficient to justify the verdict. Indeed, appellant's specifications under this head in the bill of exceptions claim little more than that there was a preponderance of evidence in favor of defendant, the two principal specifications being as follows: "There is not a preponderance of evidence in favor of the plaintiff upon any issue made by the pleadings. * * * There is a preponderance of evidence in support of, and affirming, the counterclaim of the defendant." All other specifications are of what the evidence shows, what it "fails to show," and what "the uncontradicted evidence shows." But I find all the alleged uncontradicted evidence to have been contradicted.

As to the alleged error of admitting evidence of a novation, there was no exception taken to the ruling of the court admitting it.

Besides, it related to averments in the answer, and did not tend to prove a novation, but the contrary. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MALONE v. BOSCH et ux. (No. 15,334.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—IRREGULARITY OF JUDGMENT—OMISSIONS OF FINDINGS—EFFECT ON APPEAL—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEEDS—COURT COMMISSIONERS.

1. The irregularity of entering judgment in a suit to foreclose a mortgage without first entering a default against one of the defendants cannot be complained of by the other.

2. Judgment will not be reversed because of the failure of the trial court to find upon every issue, unless the omitted findings would have affected the final judgment.

3. The power conferred upon court commissioners by Code Civ. Proc. § 259, "to take acknowledgments and proofs of deeds, mortgages," etc., was not affected by the subsequent enactment of the amendment to Civ. Code, § 1181, that "the proof or acknowledgment of any instrument may be made" before certain named officers, omitting court commissioners.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; James E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John Malone against John G. Bosch and his wife to foreclose a mortgage upon defendants' homestead. Plaintiff had judgment, and appeals from an order granting defendants a new trial. Reversed.

R. W. Miller, for appellant. S. F. Cooper, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal was taken by plaintiff from an order granting the defendants' motion for a new trial. The action was brought against John G. Bosch and his wife to foreclose a mortgage upon the homestead of the defendants. The homestead had been duly selected prior to the execution of the mortgage. Both defendants were served with the summons, but the wife did not appear in the action, and her default was not entered. The husband appeared and answered, setting up the homestead character of the premises, and denying the validity of the mortgage. A copy of the mortgage was set out in the complaint, showing that it was acknowledged by both husband and wife on the 17th day of August, 1885, before R. G. Knox, a court commissioner of the superior court of Del Norte county. It is contended that court commissioners at that date had no authority to take and certify acknowledgments. No separate document designated "findings" was signed by the judge, but in the decree which was signed by the judge it is stated that the court finds all the averments of the complaint to be true. Nothing is said about the averment of the homestead in the answer. The new trial was granted upon two grounds: (1) The default of the wife ought to have been entered before the decree was made; and (2) findings were not waived, and therefore the judgment was irregular.

1. The trial court was right in holding that it was irregular to enter judgment without first entering the default of the defendant who failed to appear and answer, but the judgment was not therefore void, and the irregularity did not concern John G. Bosch, who was the only party moving for a new trial.

2. Since the bill of exceptions shows affirmatively that findings were not waived, it was undoubtedly necessary that the court should find upon every issue a decision of which was necessary before rendition of judgment. But a judgment will not be reversed here for such an omission, if this court can see that the additional fact pleaded in the answer would have constituted no defense if it had been found as averred. The mortgage, with the acknowledgment, was set out at length in the complaint. Its correctness was admitted. The only new fact averred was that the premises constituted the homestead of the mortgagors at the time of the execution of the mortgage. Had that been found, would it have affected the judgment? The doubt in regard to the validity of the mortgage arises from these facts: April 1, 1880, the legislature amended the 259th section of the Code of Civil Procedure, in regard to the powers of court commissioners, by providing, among other changes, that every court commissioner shall have power "to take acknowledgments and proof of deeds, mortgages and other instruments requiring proof or acknowledgment for any purpose under the laws of this state." Three days afterwards the legislature amended section 1181 of the Civil Code so as to read as follows: "The proof or acknowledgment of an instrument may be made in this state within the city, city and county, county or district for which the officer was elected or appointed, before either: 1. A clerk of a court of record; or, 2. A county recorder; or, 3. A notary public; or, 4. A justice of the peace." The changes made in the section were these: The words "city and county" were added, and the words "a court commissioner" were omitted. In the original section the court commissioner was the third officer mentioned as one who could take and certify acknowledgments. The title to the article in which section 1181 is found is, "Proof and acknowledgment of instrument." The heading to the section is, "By whom acknowledgments may be taken in this state." At the time the acknowledgment was taken, this was the last law upon the subject, and it is contended that the language is first, in effect, that no others than the officers specified shall take acknowledgments; and, second, that it is inconsistent with the provision in regard to court commissioners, and therefore repealed it. As to the first, the statute does not say or imply that no others can take and certify acknowledgments. It is true we would naturally expect to find under such heading a list of all officers who could take and certify acknowledgments. But this implication is not so strong as to effect the repeal of a special statute empowering another officer to do so. Repeal by implication is not favored, and the conflict must be irreconcilable, or the intent to repeal very manifest, or both statutes will stand. I see no conflict in the statutes. The fact that court commissioners may also take acknowledgments does not interfere with the provisions of the Civil Code. The rule laid down in section 4481, Pol. Code, only obtains where there is a conflict. It implies that where there is no conflict a provision will be valid, although, in the sense of that rule, it is not in regard to a question arising out of the subject-matter of that title.

Since, therefore, it is manifest that, in case the additional facts averred in the answer had been found as averred, it would not affect the judgment, I think the new trial ought not to have been granted on that ground. I think, therefore, that the order should be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is reversed.

LAWRENCE NAT. BANK v. KOWALSKY.
(No. 15,486.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1894.)
EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT OF DEMAND — FORM — ESSENTIALS.

1. An equitable assignment of a demand may be effected by means of an instrument having the form of an order or bill of exchange, drawn by the creditor upon the debtor, in favor of the assignee, for the full amount of the indebtedness, without an intention to so assign appearing on its face.

2. A refusal to sustain a general demurrer to the complaint will be reversed only when it omits entirely the statement of some fact essential to sustain the judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Lawrence National Bank against Edwin H. Kowalsky to recover on an instrument in the form of an order drawn on defendant in favor of plaintiff's cashier by W. H. Pendleton. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and this defendant assigns as error, judgment being rendered against him. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Rankin and H. T. Kowalsky, for appellant. Fox, Kellogg & King, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment against him. The appeal is brought here upon the judgment roll, which does not contain any bill of exceptions. The court below overruled a general demurrer to the complaint, and the appellant claims that this ruling was erroneous, and that the judgment should be reversed upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The plaintiff sues as assignee of one Pendleton, and the complaint alleges, among other matters: That "on the 17th day of April, 1891, the said defendant was indebted to W. H. Pendleton, of Lawrence, Kansas, in the full sum of fifteen hundred and ninety ($1,590) dollars, as and for the purchase price of four hundred cases of eggs theretofore sold by the said Pendleton to the said defendant, and delivered free on board at Lawrence, Kansas. That on that day, to wit, the 17th day of April, 1891, the said W. H. Pendleton made and executed his certain draft on the said defendant, under and by the name of 'Kowalsky & Co.,' in the words and figures following, to wit: '$1,590. April 17, 1891. Pay to the order of H. C. Vaughan cash fifteen hundred and ninety dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of W. H. Pendleton. To Kowalsky & Co., No. —, San Francisco, Cal.' That the said H. C. Vaughan was then, and ever since has been, and still is, cashier of this plaintiff. That for valuable consideration said Pendleton then and there, on the 17th day of April, 1891, sold and delivered the said draft to this plaintiff, and thereby assigned and transferred to this plaintiff his claim against the said defendant, doing business under the name of Kowalsky & Co., and the said plaintiff then and there became, ever since has been, and still is the owner and holder of the said draft, and of the said claim, and of all moneys due thereon."

The objection urged against the complaint is that it does not sufficiently set forth an assignment to plaintiff of defendant's alleged indebtedness to Pendleton. The complaint is certainly very carelessly drawn, but is, we think, sufficient to sustain a judgment, and therefore the general demurrer was properly overruled. An equitable assignment of a demand may be effected by means of an instrument having the form of an order or bill of exchange, drawn by the creditor upon the debtor for the full amount of the indebtedness, when such is the intention of the parties, and it is not essential that the intention to make such assignment should appear upon the face of the order or bill of exchange. Bank v. Bogy, 44 Mo. 13; 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (4th Ed.) § 20; Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92. And it was not the intention of this court to overrule the latter case by anything said in the course of the opinion in Cashman v. Harrison, 90 Cal. 297, 27 Pac. 283. While the complaint here does not, in direct terms, allege that the draft therein set out was drawn for the purpose of making an assignment to plaintiff of the drawer's demand against defendant on account of the eggs sold and delivered to him as alleged, still the complaint is not wholly silent as to the fact of an assignment, and, while it must be conceded that its allegation in relation thereto is informal and argumentative, the defect is one that could only be reached by a special demurrer. It is only when a complaint entirely fails to state some fact necessary to uphold the judgment that this court will reverse the judgment because of the failure of the lower court to sustain a general demurrer to the complaint. But, in addition to this, the answer in this case presents the issue as to the assignment of defendant's indebtedness from Pendleton to plaintiff, and we must presume, in support of the judgment, that the fact was litigated upon the trial, and that the case was there treated by the parties as involving that issue. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BROWN. (No. 21,169.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1894.)

GRAND LARCENY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

One taking a bicycle from the house of another, with the intention of returning it the same day, and innocent of any felonious intent of permanently depriving that other of his property, is not guilty of grand larceny.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

John Brown was convicted of burglary, in that he entered a certain house with the purpose of committing grand larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Ballard, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant was convicted of the crime of burglary, alleged by the information to have been committed in entering a certain house with intent to commit grand larceny. The entry is conceded, and also it is conceded that appellant took therefrom a certain bicycle, the property of the party named in the information, and of such a value as to constitute grand larceny. The appellant is a boy of 17 years of age, and, for a few days immediately prior to the taking of the bicycle, was staying at the place from which the machine was taken, working for his board. He took the stand as a witness, and testified: "I took the wheel to get even with the boy, and, of course, I didn't intend to keep it. I just wanted to get even with him. The boy was throwing oranges at me in the evening, and he would not stop when I told him to, and it made me mad, and I left Yount's house Saturday morning. I thought I would go back and take the boy's wheel. He had a wheel, the one I had the fuss with. Instead of getting hold of his, I got Frank's, but I intended to take it back Sunday night; but, before I got back, they caught me. I took it down by the grove, and put it on the ground, and covered it with brush, and crawled in, and Frank came and hauled off the brush, and said: 'What are you doing here?' Then I told him * * * I covered myself up in the brush so that they could not find me until evening, until I could take it back. I did not want them to find me. I expected to remain there during the day, and not go back until evening." Upon the foregoing state of facts, the court gave the jury the following instruction: "I think it is not necessary to say very much to you in this case. I may say, generally, that I think counsel for the defense here stated to you in his argument very fairly the principles of law governing this case, except in one particular. In defining to you the crime of grand larceny, he says it is essential that the taking of it must be felonious. That is true; the taking with the intent to deprive the owner of it; but he adds the conclusion that you must find that the taker intended to deprive him of it permanently. I do not think that is the law. I think in this case, for example, if the defendant took this bicycle, we will say for the purpose of riding twenty-five miles, for the purpose of enabling him to get away, and then left it for another to get it, and intended to do nothing else except to help himself away for a certain distance, it would be larceny, just as much as though he intended to take it all the while. A man may take a horse, for instance, not with the intent to convert it wholly and permanently to his own use, but to ride it to a certain distance, for a certain purpose he may have, and then leave it. He converts it to that extent to his own use and purpose feloniously." This instruction is erroneous, and demands a reversal of the judgment. If the boy's story be true, he is not guilty of larceny in taking the machine; yet, under the instruction of the court, the words from his own mouth convicted him. The court told the jury that larceny may be committed, even though it was only the intent of the party taking the property to deprive the owner of it temporarily. We think the authorities form an unbroken line to the effect that the felonious intent must be to deprive the owner of the property permanently. The illustration contained in the instruction as to the man taking the horse is too broad in its terms as stating a correct principle of law. Under the circumstances depicted by the illustration, the man might, and again he might not, be guilty of larceny. It would be a pure question of fact for the jury, and dependent for its true solution upon all the circumstances surrounding the transaction. But the test of law to be applied to these circumstances for the purpose of determining the ultimate fact as to the man's guilt or innocence is, did he intend to permanently deprive the owner of his property? If he did not intend so to do, there is no felonious intent, and his acts constitute but a trespass. While the felonious intent of the party taking need not necessarily be an intention to convert the property to his own use, still it must in all cases be an intent to wholly and permanently deprive the owner thereof. As directly and fully sustaining this principle, we cite: State v. Davis, 38 N. J. Law, 176; State v. Homes, 57 Am. Dec. 275, note; State v. South, 75 Am. Dec. 250; State v. Ryan, 12 Nev. 401; State v. Slingerland, 19 Nev. 135, 7 Pac. 280; Desty, Cr. Law, § 155j; People v. Juarez, 28 Cal. 380. For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

GRAY v. FARMERS' EXCH. BANK. (No. 19,467.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST—MONEY OF ESTATE—APPLICATION ON ADMINISTRATOR'S DEBT.

To render a person receiving, at the request of an administrator, money belonging to the estate, in satisfaction of a personal debt of the administrator, a trustee for the estate, it is necessary that the administrator should be in default to the estate.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; Geo. E. Otis, Judge.

Action by Ada Suhr, administrator, against the Farmers' Exchange Bank. Pending the action, Suhr died, and Charles R. Gray was appointed administrator in her place. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. R. Gray and E. R. Annable, for appellant. Elmer E. Rowell, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. F. C. Suhr died intestate in the county of San Bernardino in May, 1887, and on June 18, 1887, Ada Suhr, his widow, was appointed administratrix of his estate. On July 5, 1887, Ada Suhr, in her private capacity, borrowed $10,000 from the defendant bank, to secure the payment of which she and John Ruffen gave to the bank their joint and several promissory note for that sum, payable July 20, 1887, with interest at 1 per cent. per month. As between Mrs. Suhr and Ruffen, he was merely a surety, and received no part of the money borrowed. Before any payment was made on this note, to wit, October 1, 1887, Ada Suhr indorsed and delivered to the defendant the following instrument:

"No. 954. San Francisco, Sept. 28, 1887. Three days after sight, pay to the order of Ada Suhr, administratrix of the estate of Ferdinand C. Suhr, deceased, ten thousand dollars, and charge to the account of loss under policy number 62,670. F. C. Suhr.

"To New England Mutual Life Insurance Co., Boston, Mass.

"$10,000.

Henry K. Field,
"General Agent."

This instrument was indorsed by Mrs. Suhr as administratrix, etc. Before, and at the time of this transaction, and until December, 1890, Ada Suhr had a running private account, and also a distinct account as administratrix, with the defendant bank. On July 6, 1891, she commenced this action, alleging that, as administratrix, she indorsed the draft on the insurance company, and deposited it with the bank, merely to be collected for the use of the estate of F. C. Suhr; that the bank had collected the full sum for which it was drawn, but had paid to the estate of F. C. Suhr only the sum of $3,343 thereof,—and praying judgment for the balance, of $6,657. The answer of the defendant is to the effect that the bank purchased the draft from the administratrix, and paid her therefor, at the time of the purchase, the full face value thereof, and denies that said draft was ever taken or received by defendant for collection for the use of said estate. Pending the action the administratrix died, and the appellant, Charles R. Gray, having been appointed administrator, was substituted as plaintiff on March 8, 1892. The court found that the answer of defendant, as above stated, was true, and adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by the action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The appellant contends, in effect, that the answer contains no defense to the action, and consequently that all findings by the court in conflict with the complaint are outside of any material issue, and that plaintiff is entitled to judgment on the pleadings. This point is founded upon an alleged inconsistency of that part of the answer above stated with certain denials therein. But I perceive no such inconsistency. There is a denial, for want of information or belief, that Field executed the draft for the use and benefit of the estate of Suhr, deceased; but this, though apparently inconsistent with the face of the draft, is not inconsistent with the affirmative allegation in the answer that defendant purchased and paid for the draft, such as it was. Besides, the affirmative part of the answer is stated as a further and distinct answer, introduced by the following formula: "Further answering, defendant alleges." There was no demurrer to the answer, and no motion to strike out any part of it. I think the pleadings and findings support the judgment.

2. Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings. It appears that the business of transferring to the bank the draft on the insurance company was transacted by and between Ada Suhr and Mr. Morse, who was then cashier of the bank, and who died before the trial of this action, but when he died does not appear. It does appear, however, that he ceased to be cashier of the bank on the last day of November, 1887, one month after the transaction, and was succeeded by Mr. Zombro, who was general bookkeeper at the time of the transaction. Mr. Zombro and the president of the bank, Mr. Drew, were called as witnesses for the plaintiff and produced all the books of the bank called for by plaintiff. John Ruffen and the appellant also testified on behalf of plaintiff, but no evidence appears to have been introduced by defendant. The testimony of the witnesses and the documentary evidence strongly tend to prove that defendant purchased the draft, and paid for it $3,343 in cash, and, with the consent or at request of the administratrix, credited $6,657 on her private note made by herself and Ruffen, as above stated. Assuming that the crediting of $6,657 on the note with the consent of the administratrix was valid and lawful, as between her and the bank, the evidence clearly shows that the defendant was not indebted to the estate of F. C. Suhr, nor to Ada Suhr, individually, in any sum, at the time this action was commenced. The substance of appellant's contention, however, is that, inasmuch as the face of the draft notified defendant that it was held by Ada Suhr as administratrix in trust for the estate of F. C. Suhr, the application of it, or any part thereof, even at her request, to the payment of her private debt, made the defendant an involuntary trustee of the draft, to the extent of its application to the payment of her debt; citing section 2243 of the Civil Code, which provides: "Every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith and for a valuable consideration." But the complaint does not state, nor the evidence tend to prove, a cause of action under this rule. In order to charge the defendant as an involuntary trustee of the draft, or of the money applied on the Ruffen note, it should appear that the administratrix (the original trustee) was in default, to the detriment of the cestui que trust (heirs or creditors). If the administratrix had fully accounted, or was able, ready, and willing to account, to the estate, at all proper times, for all property and money for which she was accountable, as it must be presumed she was, then there was no breach of trust on her part, to the injury of the estate or the heirs of F. C. Suhr, and consequently no beneficiary of the original trust has any cause of action against her, either as trustee or otherwise. And since an involuntary trust can be enforced against persons who come into possession of trust property only to the same extent, in the same manner, and with like force and effect as against the original trustee, there is no cause of action against the defendant, unless the administratrix has failed to account for that part of the proceeds of the draft which was applied to the payment of her private debt. Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 17; Theiler v. Such, 57 Cal. 460; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1048. For aught that appears, she may have advanced and paid on account of the estate, from her private funds (possibly from the $10,000 borrowed on the Ruffen note), a sum equal to that applied to the payment of said note. Besides, it is to be presumed, prima facie, that she obeyed the law and performed her official duty, and consequently that all the property and money of the estate for which she was accountable at the time of her death passed into the possession of her successor, the appellant (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963), and there is neither allegation nor evidence to the contrary. The sole object of the action, disclosed by the complaint, is the recovery of money alleged to have been collected by defendant from the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company for the use of the estate of F. C. Suhr, under a special contract with the administratrix. Having failed to prove the alleged contract, appellant seeks to recover upon a constructive involuntary trust, ex maleficio, as to which there is not the slightest intimation in the complaint. Nor is the evidence sufficient to raise such a trust, since no party appears to have been injured by the transactions of which it is said to have been constructed, while it does appear that its effect would be to compel the defendant to pay the sum demanded twice,—an effect never sanctioned by a court of equity, except in favor of a legal right or superior equity of another party. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FELIZ et al. v. FELIZ et al. (No. 15,250.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1894.)

TENANTS IN COMMON—ADVERSE POSSESSION—EVIDENCE OF OUSTER—EJECTMENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. When a tenant in common is in possession and exercises acts of ownership of an unequivocal character, and of such a nature, as, by their own import, to give notice to the other cotenants that an adverse possession and a disseisin are intended to be asserted against them, then the possession of such tenant in common is adverse.

2. Where, in ejectment between cotenants, the jury are instructed as to what will constitute adverse possession by one cotenant, it is not error to charge generally as to the effect of adverse possession.

3. Adverse possession by a cotenant, as against the other cotenants, is not affected by the mere fact that one of the latter resided with him on the land, as a member of his family.

4. In ejectment, an instruction that if the jury find for plaintiff their verdict will be that they find for plaintiff, for the recovery of the possession of the premises described in the complaint, is not objectionable, as requiring the jury to give a verdict for the whole premises, where the answer raises no question as to the amount of land plaintiff might recover, and defendant asks for no instruction with reference to the amount of such land.

5. Evidence that one of several coheirs entered into occupancy of the premises owned by their ancestor, inclosed them with a fence, cultivated them, and rented them to others, appropriating the entire rents to himself, and claimed the land as his own, paying the taxes thereon, and taking conveyances purporting to be of the entire tract, and executing a mortgage thereon to secure his own debt, supports a finding that he claimed the land as his own, to the exclusion of his cotenants.

Ejectment by Clara Feliz and others against Frank Feliz and others. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs. On motion of defendants, a new trial was granted, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Joseph H. Skirm, for appellants. Charles B. Younger and Spalsbury & Burke, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendants for possession of certain lands in the city of Santa Cruz, and a motion for a new trial, having been made by the defendants, was granted by the court "upon the sole ground" that the court erred in giving certain instructions to the jury. From this order the plaintiffs have appealed.

The lands in controversy are included in the tract granted by congress to the town of Santa Cruz, July 23, 1866, and were conveyed by the town to Juan Jose Feliz, March 4, 1867. Juan Jose Feliz died intestate in June, 1871, leaving several heirs at law; but administration upon his estate was not had until April, 1885, when the defendant Frank Feliz was appointed administrator. Miguel Feliz, one of the sons of Juan Jose Feliz, lived for many years on a portion of the premises in controversy, claiming them as his own, and after his father's death went into occupancy and possession of the entire tract of land in controversy, and held possession of the same until July, 1885, when he was ejected therefrom by the defendants. The plaintiffs are children of Miguel, and their title to the premises is derived by means of conveyances from him. September 19, 1874, the widow of Juan Jose Feliz, who, after the death of her husband, continued to reside on the premises with her son Miguel, made a conveyance of the entire tract to him, and thereafter continued to reside with him, as a member of his family, until he was dispossessed thereof by the defendants. Miguel also received conveyances of the premises from others of the heirs of his father, but not from all of them.

The court gave to the jury the following instructions: "(1) The jury are instructed that when a cotenant enters and exercises acts of ownership upon lands in which he has a cotenant, the intent with which such acts are performed must in all cases determine whether or not they amount to an ouster, and when a tenant in common is in possession, and exercises acts of ownership of an unequivocal character, overt and notorious, and of such a nature as, by their own import, to impart information and give notice to the other cotenants that an adverse possession and a disseisin are intended to be asserted against them, then the possession of such tenant in common is adverse; and if such a possession is actual, adverse, open, notorious, and exclusive, and continuing for the period of five years, it extinguishes the right of the party having the true title, and vests a perfect title in the adverse holder, provided that such possession existed for five continuous years before the 1st day of April, 1878. But if such possession did not exist for five continuous years before the 1st day of April, 1878, then the person so in possession of the land must have paid all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which had been levied and assessed upon such lands during all of said period of five years subsequent to the 1st day of April, 1878, in order to vest a perfect title in such adverse holder. (2) The jury are instructed that an adverse, open, notorious, exclusive, and continued possession for the period of five years extinguishes the right of the party having the true title, and vests a perfect title in the adverse holder, if such possession had so existed for five years before the 1st day of April, 1878; and if such possession existed for five years, and was not completed before said 1st day of April, 1878, then the person so in possession of the land must have paid all the taxes, state, county, or municipal, which had been levied and assessed upon such land during the whole of said last-named period of five years subsequent to the 1st day of April, 1878."

There was no error in giving these instructions. Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. 724; Oglesby v. Hollister, 76 Cal. 136, 18 Pac. 146; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 27 Pac. 658. The plaintiffs based their right of recovery upon an adverse possession of the lands in controversy by Miguel, while it was claimed on the part of the defendants that, as he was a cotenant with the other heirs of his father, his possession inured to their benefit; and, for the purpose of meeting this contention, evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs tending to show that the possession of Miguel was accompanied by acts hostile to and inconsistent with any claim of his cotenants, and with such open disavowal of their claim as to give them notice that his possession was adverse, and thereby constituted an ouster sufficient to set the statute of limitations running. It was shown that upon the death of his father he entered into the occupancy of the premises, caused them to be inclosed with a fence, cultivated them himself during many years, and in other years rented them to others, and appropriated the entire rents to himself, claimed the land as his own, paid the taxes thereon, took conveyances purporting to be of the entire tract, and executed a mortgage thereon to secure his own debt. These were acts of ownership on his part inconsistent with a recognition of the claim of any other to the land, and were of sufficient notoriety to have presumptively been brought to the notice and knowledge of his cotenants; and the jury were authorized to determine from these acts that they were notified that he claimed the land as his own to the exclusion of his cotenants, and thereby ousted them therefrom. Such possession, when continued for five years, accompanied with the payment by him of the taxes thereon, extinguished the right of his cotenants therein.

The second of the foregoing instructions is substantially a repetition of the latter part of the first, and while it gives in general terms the rule of law necessary to establish a title by adverse possession, and, if taken by itself, would not be complete when such question is between cotenants, yet it is to be read in connection with the prior instruction, in which the rule of adverse holding between cotenants was properly given to the jury. The instructions given to a jury by the court are to be considered as a whole, and if, when so considered, the law is correctly stated, as applicable to the case before the court, the jury will be deemed to have properly applied the law as thus stated. It is not to be assumed that the jury have disregarded one part of the instruction any more than another, but they will be assumed to have given full consideration to each and every proposition of the law that the court has laid before them. Stephenson v. Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, and 36 Pac. 407. There is nothing inconsistent in the two instructions, nor does either of them incorrectly state the law. The second instruction states the effect of adverse possession upon the claim of the holder of the record title, while the former states what constitutes adverse possession as against a cotenant. Similar observations may be made with reference to the second instruction and its relation to the fact that prior to 1866 the title to the land was in the United States. The jury were instructed that prior to July 23, 1866, there could have been no adverse possession of the land, and they must be deemed to have given this rule its proper consideration in connection with the other instruction upon the question of adverse possession.

The fact that his nephew, Antone Feliz, continued to reside with Miguel upon the premises did not prevent Miguel's possession from being adverse. It does not appear that Antone questions the sufficiency of the ouster, or the adverse holding by Miguel, nor do the appellants claim that it could be questioned by him or on his behalf upon any other ground than that he continued to reside with Miguel, as a member of his family, after Miguel had entered into possession of the land. Merely being a member of Miguel's family would not necessarily imply that Antone was in such possession of the land as to prevent Miguel from acquiring title by adverse possession, or that his relation to the land, or to its possession by Miguel, was such as to prevent the acts of Miguel from constituting adverse possession against him; and it may be added that by being on the premises the acts of Miguel, by which his hostile claim was asserted, would more readily be brought to his notice, and give him an opportunity of asserting his own claim in opposition thereto. Miguel's mother ceased to be his cotenant by her conveyance to him in 1874.

In giving to the jury the different forms of verdict which they might find, the court said to them: "The jury are instructed that, if their verdict be in favor of the defendants, the form of their verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the defendants'; if for the plaintiffs, their verdict will be, 'We, the jury, find for the plaintiffs for the recovery of the possession of the premises first described in the complaint, and for the sum of ——— dollars damages for the withholding thereof by said defendants from said plaintiffs.'" It is now claimed that this was instructing the jury with respect to a matter of fact, and required the jury to give their verdict for the whole of the premises, and against both of the defendants, whereas it had been shown that Juan Jose Feliz had, prior to his death, conveyed a certain part of the premises to one Kirby. There was, however, no evidence that Kirby had ever been in possession of the land at any time after the death of Feliz. The court was not instructing the jury with reference to any contested matter of fact, but was merely directing them in regard to the "form" of their verdict. The defendants had not claimed in their answer any limitation upon the amount of land that the plaintiffs might recover, nor did they ask for any instructions with reference to such limitation. There was evidence before the jury tending to show the plaintiffs' right of recovery for the whole of the first parcel of land described in the complaint; and, if the defendants had considered that there was also evidence which tended to limit the plaintiffs' right of recovery to a portion of this tract, they should have asked from the court an instruction to the jury to that effect. But they were not at liberty to go to the jury upon the proposition that the plaintiffs had failed to establish any right of recovery, and, after receiving an adverse verdict, insist that the jury should have considered whether the evidence did not require a limitation upon the extent of this recovery in a respect not brought to their attention. There was evidence from which the jury were authorized to find against both of the defendants. Both of them had united in the ejection of Miguel from the land, and Majors testified that since that time both of them had been in possession of the land. Whether the defendant Maria had been in her grandmother's employ as a nurse, in her lifetime, was immaterial. Her grandmother had died long before the commencement of the action, and it was not claimed that her relation to her codefendant was at any time that of his servant or employé.

There was no error in excluding from evidence certain "statements" from the assessor's office. The statements were not signed by Miguel, nor was it shown that they were made under his direction, or with his knowledge. Neither does it appear that they were accompanied by an affidavit or oath purporting to have been made by him. The inventory and appraisal made in the estate of Juan Jose Feliz, in the year 1885, as well as the petition for a homestead by his widow in that year, could have no effect in determining whether the possession of the land taken by Miguel in 1871 was adverse. The order is reversed.

WELLS v. LAW et al. (No. 15,535.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)

AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS.

1. The action of the court in allowing plaintiff to amend by inserting matters not set out in the notice of amendment served on defendants is not reversible error, where defendants were not injured thereby.

2. In an action for breach of a written contract of employment, plaintiff may amend the complaint to show that her discharge before the time agreed on therein had caused a loss of certain profits, which, by a collateral oral agreement with defendant, she was entitled to receive from each customer, such loss being in the nature of consequential damages.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by Alice Wells against Hartland Law and Herbert E. Law for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John Flourney, for appellants. Gibson & Wood, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of a written contract, which is set out at length in the complaint.

Plaintiff alleges: That the defendants were engaged in business at San Francisco under the name of the Viavi Company, the business consisting in the manufacture and sale of a nostrum or remedy known as "Viavi" and other preparations, and furnishing treatment by administering such preparations and by giving baths. November 17, 1891, defendants employed plaintiff and one Louise Keach in their said business, for the term of one year, on terms stated in the agreement. Plaintiff entered upon the performance of her contract, and, with the said Keach, was appointed by defendants as their agent in Alameda county. That, besides the consideration expressed in the agreement, the employes were to have the privilege of collecting for their own use from patients the sum of three dollars for each bath given in the treatment. That, with the consent of defendants, Mrs. Keach assigned to plaintiff her interest in the contract and business. That on the 29th of July, 1892, defendants took from plaintiff her business, and refused thereafter to furnish to her the remedies, or to permit her to conduct the business. That she thereby lost profits which she would have made under the contract, and the incidental profits from giving the baths. She recovered a verdict, and the defendants appeal.

1. After the defendants had answered, plaintiff, upon notice, asked leave to amend her complaint. The court granted leave to amend in the respects named in the notice, and also in respects in which no mention was made in the notice. It does not appear that defendants were injured by this order. Even on the trial, the amendments might have been on just terms. As no injustice was done to the defendants, we do not think they have any cause to complain.

2. The amendment complained of consisted in adding to the original complaint the allegation of the compensation for baths. Nothing is said in regard to this in the written contract. It is contended that this is adding to the written contract. Whether, by parol, an additional consideration can be established, under the circumstances, it is not necessary now to decide. It is not necessary to regard it in that light. It sets up an incidental advantage or profit which she was able to realize by reason of the contract, and which she lost by its breach on the part of defendants. It is in the nature of consequential damages. There was a very substantial conflict in the evidence upon all the issues in the case. Indeed, except as to the matter of damages, the preponderance seems very plainly in favor of the verdict. As to damages, no certain determination was possible. Plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that her profits were regularly and rapidly increasing. What she would have realized is to some extent a matter of conjecture, but the case is one in which she was entitled to an estimate of probable profits.

There was no issue in the case in regard to the removal of the office. The circumstances attending the removal were probative facts, bearing upon the issue as to whether defendants had discharged plaintiff from their employ. Upon that issue the preponderance of the evidence was decidedly with the plaintiff.

Appellant attributes to the trial judge certain peculiar ideas in regard to the power and duty of a superior judge in granting new trials. It is said that the judge was of the opinion that he should not set aside the verdict of the jury, even when it was clear to his mind that the verdict was against the weight of evidence; that he therefore refused a new trial because he thought he had no jurisdiction. This court has frequently decided against the alleged views of the learned judge, and we find no evidence in the transcript of such fact, and it is disputed by respondent. We must presume he did his duty. The judgment and order are affirmed.

(No. 15,565.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1894.)

BENEFIT INSURANCE — SUBSTITUTION OF BENEFICIARY—EQUITIES IN FAVOR OF FIRST BENEFICIARY—ESTOPPEL.

1. Where the by-laws of a benefit insurance society allowed the insured to change the beneficiary in the certificate, on surrendering it and complying with certain rules, and the insured complied with all the other rules, but did not surrender the certificate, because the first beneficiary had possession thereof, and refused to give it up, equity will, as between the rival beneficiaries, consider the rules complied with, and the substitution made.

2. Where, by the rules of the insurer, the insured has a right to make a substitution of beneficiaries on surrendering the original certificate, equity will not allow a beneficiary who has possession of the certificate, and refused to surrender it, with intent to prevent such substitution, to profit by her own wrong in preventing a compliance with the rules.

3. If sound equities exist in favor of the original beneficiary of an insurance certificate, the insured is estopped to substitute a second beneficiary, whose status is purely that of a volunteer.

4. In the absence of contract, the payment of insurance assessments by the beneficiary is gratuitous, and creates no equities in his favor which are available against one afterwards substituted as beneficiary.

5. Where there was sufficient evidence of a demand for a return of the certificate, aside from the statements of the insured, the admission of such statements in evidence is not prejudicial.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by John Halsey Jory against the Supreme Council, American Legion of Honor, Harriet Mary Sophia Jory, and others to determine the ownership of a benefit certificate. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Jory appeals. Affirmed.

John H. Dickinson and Henry E. Monroe, for appellant. H. W. Hutton, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The right of ownership to the proceeds of a $2,000 benefit certificate, issued by a mutual benefit society known as the "American Legion of Honor," forms the subject of this litigation. The society is not an active party to the litigation, having paid the money into court, and being entirely satisfied with the court's adjudication as to whom it belongs. The respondent and appellant are brother and sister, and the beneficiary certificate was taken out by the mother, Emily Kate Jory, and made payable upon her death to the daughter appellant, or any other member of the mother's family whom she might thereafter in her lifetime designate. The by-laws of the society provide that members may, at any time when in good standing, surrender their benefit certificates, and have new ones issued, payable to such beneficiary dependent upon them as they may direct, subject, however, to the provisions of section 2: "Such change to be made upon petition to the supreme secretary, signed by the member desiring to make the change, attested by the secretary of the subordinate council, and having the seal of the subordinate council attached, substantially in accordance with the form prescribed in this section. * * * The fee to be paid for a new certificate issued shall be one dollar, and must accompany the petition. No change of beneficiary shall be made in any other manner than herein prescribed, * * * provided that, in case of the loss or destruction of the old certificate, satisfactory evidence of such loss or destruction shall be produced, by affidavit or otherwise, before a new certificate be issued. * * * No act of a subordinate council in the admission of any member to membership in this order, and no act of any member done for the purpose of changing his or her beneficiary, shall be recognized by or deemed binding upon the supreme council, or as entitling the person admitted, or the new beneficiary named, to any benefits from this order, unless such acts shall be in strict accordance with the provisions contained in the laws and constitution prescribed by the supreme council, nor until such acts have been ratified and approved by the supreme council." Several years after this certificate was issued, the mother became desirous to change the beneficiary named therein, to wit, the appellant daughter, and to substitute therefor the respondent son; and in furtherance of such desire, and for the purpose of complying with the provisions of the laws of the society, she attempted to secure control of the original certificate, which was then in the keeping of her daughter appellant, in order that she might surrender the same to the society; but she was unsuccessful in this endeavor. Upon this question the court found the fact to be that "she [the daughter] refused to redeliver the same to the said Emily Kate Jory, although frequently requested so to do by her, as alleged in said amended complaint, but kept and concealed the same for the purpose of endeavoring to prevent her said mother from designating the plaintiff herein as the beneficiary thereunder, and securing the said $2,000 herself, and so kept and concealed it until after her mother's death, as alleged in the amended complaint on file herein." And this finding is supported by the evidence. Being unable to secure the original certificate, the mother regularly took all the other steps required by the laws of the order for the purpose of changing the beneficiary, and accompanied her application for a change with an affidavit stating the reason why the original certificate was not surrendered, and further stating therein that she made her son, the respondent herein, her sole beneficiary under said certificate. The society still refused to issue the new certificate, upon the ground that the original was neither lost nor destroyed, and yet had not been surrendered. Matters remained in statu quo until the death of the mother, when this litigation arose between the children, and was decided by the trial court in favor of the son.

Laying aside any question of interest in the original beneficiary certificate resting in the daughter by virtue of matters arising in parol between the mother and the daughter, we are clear that, as between the original beneficiary, the daughter, and the proposed new beneficiary, the son, the proceeds of this policy belong to the son. As between them, there was a substitution of beneficiaries in the eyes of a court of equity. If the Legion of Honor was here as an aggressive party, insisting, as against the claims of the son, upon a strict compliance with its by-laws before it could be compelled to take money from its treasury, and possibly a different question would be presented; but, as between these parties litigant, the court will administer justice from the standpoint of equity, and bring to the solution of this question those broad principles upon the basis of which equity always deals. The general rule unquestionably is that a change of a beneficiary cannot be made by the insured unless a substantial compliance with the laws and regulations of the society is had; yet courts of equity have recognized various exceptions to this general principle, and the facts of this case bring it squarely within one of the well-recognized exceptions. This exception is builded upon the principle that equity does not demand impossible things, and will consider that done which ought to have been done; and is embraced within the proposition that, when the insured complies with all the requirements of the rules for the purpose of making the substitution of beneficiaries with which he has the power to comply, he has done all that a court of equity demands. See Supreme Conclave v. Cappella, 41 Fed. 1, approved in McLaughlin v. McLaughlin (Cal.) 37 Pac. 865; Grand Lodge v. Child, 70 Mich. 164, 38 N. W. 1; Isgrigg v. Schooley, 125 Ind. 95, 25 N. E. 151; Marsh v. American Legion of Honor, 149 Mass. 512, 21 N. E. 1070. The present case comes squarely within this exception, and in principle is identical with some of the cases we have cited. For the purpose of changing the beneficiary, the insured complied in detail with every rule of the society, save the single one of surrendering the certificate, and this she was unable to do after using due diligence to that end. Impossibilities are not required, and if the certificate had been lost or destroyed, and thus the surrender made impossible, equity would have treated the surrender as duly made; and in legal effect the certificate was lost in this case. But there is another well-settled principle of equity equally fatal to appellant's claims. No person can take advantage of his own wrong. No man is allowed to come into a court of equity and reap beneficial results from his own iniquity. If Mrs. Jory had the right to make the change of beneficiaries, and did all that it was possible for her to do towards making such change, but was prevented by the acts of appellant from a consummation of her intentions, then appellant will not be allowed to derive any benefit from her fraudulent conduct. If a fraud of her own practicing prevented a legal substitution of beneficiaries, then, as against her, an equitable substitution will be held to have taken place. If the insured, Mrs. Jory, had a legal right to make a change of beneficiaries at the time she attempted so to do, then the maxims of equity which we have applied to the facts of the case dispose of this litigation fully and entirely. But, as a further ground of defense to the action, it is insisted by appellant that her mother had no such right. Appellant says she had a vested interest in the certificate, and rights under it which could not be taken away from her by a legal substitution of beneficiaries, even if such substitution had been made by the insured. Under this claim of the appellant the question as to an actual substitution would seem to be immaterial; for, if the insured had proceeded under the rules and laws of the order, and obtained a substitution of beneficiaries perfect in all its parts, still, as between the parties here litigating, it would not be conclusive as establishing title to its proceeds in the holder thereof. For we are in a court of equity, and administering justice to these parties according to their equities.

The principle here under consideration is the most recent growth of mutual benefit association law, a branch of the law which in itself is young in years; and we know of nothing in the law which deprives a person contemplating membership in a mutual benefit association from so contracting with the proposed beneficiary as that, when such certificate is issued, equities in favor of the beneficiary are born, of such merit that the insured member has no power to defeat them. The few authorities shedding light upon this question declare the rights of the beneficiary are such as to create a vested interest in the proceeds of the certificate. Smith v. Society, 123 N. Y. 85, 25 N. E. 197; Nix v. Donovan (City Ct. N. Y.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 435; Maynard v. Vanderwerker (Sup.) 24 N. Y. Supp. 932. Possibly this is not a correct declaration of the principle of law applicable to the conditions; for a second beneficiary might be substituted, wholly innocent of the contractual relations existing between the insured and the first beneficiary, and his substitution give rise to the creation of equities in his behalf all-controlling upon a judicial disposition of the rights of the parties concerned. If the original beneficiary's interest was vested, no subsequent conditions could possibly arise which would defeat his right; and, for this reason, we think it can hardly be termed a vested interest. The whole matter seems to be rather a question of equities, and the stronger and better equity must prevail. The illustration we have used does not arise in the present case, for we here have no clash of equities. The second beneficiary possesses no equities. He is a volunteer pure and simple. His status during the life of the insured is well described in Smith v. Society, supra, where the court said: "The designation was in the nature of an inchoate or unexecuted gift, revocable at any moment by the donor, and wholly within his control." We think a court of equity should declare the insured estopped from substituting a second beneficiary of the character here involved, whenever sound equities are extant in favor of the first beneficiary; and, such estoppel being in force against the insured, it is equally in force and may be successfully urged against the volunteer beneficiary. The respondent is a volunteer beneficiary, and it only remains for us to ascertain from the record what the appellant's equities are, as disclosed by the evidence. She claims by her answer that she and her mother entered into a mutual agreement whereby each should join a mutual benefit society and make the other a beneficiary under the certificates issued, and that said agreement was carried out. Appellant further alleges that she paid all initiation fees, dues, and assessments upon the benefit certificate taken out by her mother. If these moneys were paid out by appellant under and by virtue of a contract between the parties, and in pursuance of this agreement and scheme for mutual insurance, then she has equities which entitle her to recognition in a court of justice, for it would be gross imposition and fraud upon her to allow the insured to change her beneficiary under these circumstances. Though wrong and injustice form an unpleasant sight to a court of equity, yet that court will never close its eyes because the sight is an unpleasant one, but rather, with vision all the keener, will reach out its strong arm to protect the wronged and innocent party.

In this case, after hearing all the evidence, the court made its findings of fact, holding that appellant failed to prove either that there was a contract of mutual insurance entered into by the mother and the daughter, or that she, the daughter, paid the assessments, dues, etc., upon her mother's certificate, other than the small sum of $14. In the absence of a contract of some character inuring to the benefit of the beneficiary, the mere fact of payment of assessments by such a one is not sufficient to create equities in his favor, for the courts of the land say such payments are to be treated as gifts; and in the present case the basis of whatever rights to which the appellant may be entitled is the contract of mutual insurance. But the evidence of appellant upon both branches of her claim is weak, vague, and unsatisfactory. The mother, sister, and a younger brother were living together. They all earned more or less money by their labors, which for years was placed in a common fund, and all outlays for living expenses, payment of assessments upon these certificates, and incidental expenses were taken therefrom. It is not apparent that the appellant had any money of her own. She had no independent source of revenue, and after the mother's death the source from which the money to meet the assessments was drawn is not clearly located in her. As to the contract for a mutual insurance, the evidence is even more unsatisfactory than it is as to the source of the funds from which the assessments were paid; and, without entering into a detailed review of the evidence, we will say that the finding of the court in this regard is satisfactory to us. These matters are set up in the answer as an affirmative equitable defense to plaintiff's cause of action, and the burden rested upon her to prove them by a preponderance of evidence; and, upon a consideration of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of fact, we are not prepared to say that the evidence even preponderates in her favor. The evidence bearing upon this branch of the case was confined almost entirely to the testimony of the parties interested, and their prior statements and admissions. The witnesses were before the court, and we think it pre-eminently a case where great deference should be shown to the judgment of the trial court upon the weight of evidence. For these reasons, we will not disturb the findings of fact, and appellant's claim of existing equities has failed for want of proof.

It is stated that the court committed an error in admitting in evidence statements made by Mrs. Jory, prior to her death, to the effect that she had asked appellant several times for the certificate, and that appellant would not give it up. Conceding the evidence objectionable, as being hearsay, still no harm to appellant arose by its admission. There is an abundance of other evidence in the record showing a demand upon her for the certificate, and substantially nothing to the contrary. While she may have formally denied in her answer the allegation of demand made in the complaint, and while she may also have stated at the trial that no demand was made upon her, the whole record is opposed to the statement, and the whole theory of her own case, both in pleading and evidence, is opposed to it; for her case rests upon the claim that her mother was not entitled to the certificate, but that it was her own separate property, of which she was entitled to the absolute and exclusive control. She does not state in her evidence that she would have given it up to her mother if it had been demanded, but, upon the contrary, it is conclusively shown, both by her pleading and evidence, that she would not have done so if a demand had been made. Under these circumstances, the statements of her mother as to a demand were not prejudicial, even conceding them to be erroneous. It is ordered that the judgment and order be affirmed.

WATSON v. EDWARDS et al. (No. 15,590.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1894.)

MORTGAGOR — DEED TO MORTGAGEE—VALIDITY—TENANTS IN COMMON—EFFECT OF CONVEYANCE.

1. In order to sustain a deed by a mortgagor to the mortgagee of the mortgaged premises in satisfaction of the debt, a new consideration, passing from the mortgagee to the mortgagor, need not be shown.

2. Where tenants in common execute a trust deed of their land, and the trustee, in accordance with his powers, mortgages and then sells an undivided interest in the land, a purchase by one of the tenants in common from the trustee's grantee of such interest will not inure to the benefit of his former cotenants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Anne Watson against George D. Edwards and others to establish a trust in land. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pierson & Mitchell and Stanley, Stoney & Hayes, for appellant. E. R. Taylor, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to have it adjudged that plaintiff is the equitable owner of the undivided one-fourth of each and all of certain lots of land in San Francisco; that defendant Edwards holds the legal title to the said fourth of some of said lots in trust for plaintiff, and that defendant Joseph F. Clark so holds the legal title to the fourth of the rest of said lots; and that, after an accounting, and the payment of indebtedness found to be due from plaintiff, the said Edwards and Clark convey to plaintiff the said undivided fourth of said lots so held by them respectively. Other persons are made defendants as claiming some interest in the premises, or as being necessary parties. The court below gave judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment. There was also an attempted appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, but, as the record shows, this latter appeal was not perfected.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the case are these: On November 20, 1870, the plaintiff, the defendant Mary E. Bucknall, and John C. Davis, who were brother and sisters, were the owners as tenants in common of certain lands, which included the said lots involved in this action; and Eugene L. Sullivan was an owner in common with them in a part of said lands, and was also the owner of certain other lands in San Francisco. On that day—November 20, 1870—the said plaintiff, Bucknall, and Davis conveyed to said Sullivan all their interests in said lands; and on the same day two other instruments in writing were executed by and between said four persons, by which it was declared that the lands above referred to, including the lands which said Sullivan held in severalty, should all be held by said four persons as tenants in common, each having an undivided one-fourth; that the title should remain in Sullivan, and he should have absolute management of the property; that he should have a power irrevocable to mortgage or to sell and convey any of said property “upon such terms and conditions * * * as he shall think fit.” The property was incumbered at the time with a large indebtedness; and it was declared that Sullivan held the property in trust “to administer, bargain, sell, convey, mortgage, or otherwise incumber and dispose of the same, or any estate or interest therein,” to discharge out of the rents and profits all indebtedness “now or hereafter to be a lien on the same,” and at some future day to make division and partition among said parties. The other three were near relatives of Sullivan, and treated by him as his children, and he had been in possession of and had managed said property since the death of their father in 1850, and after the date of said instruments he continued in the possession and management thereof until his death, which occurred March 26, 1885. On January 23, 1879, and while the relations of said four persons with respect to said property were as above stated, and said trust still existed, the said Sullivan, in furtherance of the purposes of said trust, executed to defendant Joseph F. Clark a deed of conveyance of that part of said property which is involved in this action. The deed was upon its face absolute, and conveyed title in fee to Clark; but it was intended at the time as security for money borrowed by Sullivan, evidenced by a promissory note made by the latter to Clark, and Clark gave to Sullivan a paper writing called in the record a “defeasance,” of even date, in which he promised to reconvey the property to Sullivan upon the repayment of said money. The deed was recorded, but the defeasance was not. Afterwards, Sullivan not having paid the interest, nor having kept the taxes on the land paid, Clark demanded payment, whereupon Sullivan informed Clark that he could not pay him in money, but would give him the land for the indebtedness. This Clark was reluctant to do, as he believed the land to be worth less than the amount of the indebtedness; but, being informed by Sullivan that he could get nothing else, he finally agreed to take the land for the debt. Thereupon Clark returned the promissory note to Sullivan, Sullivan surrendered to Clark the said paper writing or defeasance, and Sullivan was discharged by Clark of all said indebtedness. Thereafter said Clark, until his conveyance of the land as hereinafter stated, possessed said land as his own, and spent money upon the same, and Sullivan was not indebted to him in any sum of money, and made no claim to any part of said land. Clark was in the position of an innocent purchaser without notice. The money borrowed by Sullivan was not for his private purposes. Afterwards the defendant Mary E. Bucknall purchased from said Clark all the property that had been conveyed to him as aforesaid by Sullivan, except certain lots, which he retained. Mrs. Bucknall borrowed the money to pay for the land from defendant Edwards; and by agreement Clark conveyed the land to defendant Childs, who was to hold it as security to Edwards for the money borrowed by Bucknall. By further agreement Childs conveyed to Edwards, who was still to hold it as such security, but by consent the conveyance to Edwards was not recorded. Mrs. Bucknall paid the full value of the property at the time of her purchase and bought it for herself alone. The real contest in the case is between the plaintiff and Mrs. Bucknall as to the one-fourth of the land purchased by the latter from Clark, and between the plaintiff and Clark as to the one-fourth of the lots retained by Clark. There are only two questions in the case requiring special notice.

1. Appellant contends that he should have had judgment, because the original transaction between Sullivan and Clark was, in law, a mortgage, and that its character as a mortgage was not changed, and could not have been changed, by the subsequent acts of a surrender of the defeasance, the yielding up of the note, the discharge of the debt, etc.;

and that, in order to make such a transfer valid, there must be some new consideration from the mortgagee to the mortgagor. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be successfully maintained. A mortgagor may sell and convey all his right and interest in the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee where the transaction is fair, honest, and without fraud, and where no unconscionable advantage has been taken of his position by the mortgagee. It would be surprising if two men in their senses, and with their eyes open, could not make such a contract. The doctrine, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," does not refer to future contracts. In Washburn on Real Property, it is said that the character of a mortgage cannot be changed "by an agreement of the parties made at the time of the execution of the deed," and that "equity will not admit of a mortgagee embarrassing or defeating his right to redeem the estate by any agreement which he may be induced to enter into in order to effect a loan"; but that "this does not preclude any subsequent bona fide agreement in respect to the estate between the parties," and that "the mortgagee may always purchase the mortgagor's right of redemption, and thus acquire an absolute title." Volume 2 (5th Ed.) top paging 65, 66, §§ 23, 24. Section 2889 of the Civil Code does not change the rule. The case at bar is in principle exactly like the case of Green v. Butler, 26 Cal. 595. In that case Justice Sawyer, speaking for the court, after noticing a number of authorities to the point, says: "Independent of authority, no argument is necessary to show that upon principle a mortgagor has the same capacity to contract with reference to his interest in the mortgaged premises that he has with reference to any other property." The only difference between that case and the one at bar is that in the former case there was some consideration between the parties in addition to the mortgage debt; but the kind or character of the consideration can make no difference if it be, as in the case at bar, fair and adequate. There was no advantage taken of the mortgagor by the mortgagee. The latter was the reluctant party, and the transaction was pressed on him by the mortgagor. Whether or not by the respective surrenders of the note and debt and the defeasance the technical legal title passed to Clark is a question not important in this case. Both parties were estopped,—Clark from claiming the debt, and Sullivan from claiming any interest in the land. It has been held by some courts of sister states that "where a mortgagor voluntarily canceled the instrument of defeasance which he held, it gave the deed which it was intended to defeat the effect of an original absolute conveyance as between the parties." 2 Washb. Real Prop. § 24, and cases cited. Under the decisions in this state it may be assumed that in such a case the absolute title would not pass,—unless, at least, there had been a redelivery of the deed, or facts from which such redelivery should be inferred. But in the case at bar Clark had at least the apparent record title, and appellant is invoking the power of a court of chancery to compel the conveyance to him of such title. Equity, in determining whether it shall grant appellant's prayer, will not concern itself with the question whether or not the strict legal title passed. It is sufficient that it should have passed.

2. It is contended that the purchase of Mrs. Bucknall from Clark should inure to the benefit of appellant, because she and the appellant were original tenants in common and beneficiaries under the trust. But by the transactions above stated the trust, as to the land purchased by Mrs. Bucknall, had come to an end, and the land had ceased to be common property. She had as much right to buy it as any tenant in common has to buy land which had formerly been common, but which had, by the act of all the tenants in common, either in person or by an authorized agent, passed to a stranger. The findings are sufficiently full, and we do not think that they are in conflict with the facts admitted in the pleadings. We do not see that any further discussion of the case is required. The judgment is affirmed.

SHAIN v. DU JARDIN. (No. 15,582.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)

SALE—ACTION FOR PRICE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—ANSWER—DENIAL OF ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT—INFORMATION AND BELIEF—FICTITIOUS FIRM NAME—EFFECT.

1. In an action by the assignee of R. & Co. for the price of goods sold by such firm to defendant, a witness stated that he was manager for R. & Co.; that he knew and had interviews and correspondence with defendant; that such firm sold him goods; that he was a customer of the firm before the witness became manager, and, without consulting the books, could not tell the extent of his purchases; that the balance due June, 1892, was $547; that he and defendant agreed on a balance of $497.30, which defendant agreed to pay in monthly payments; and that he afterwards paid $57. Plaintiff proved an assignment to him by F. under a power of attorney from R. & Co. to F., executed by Y., who was shown to be the sole partner of such firm. Held, that the evidence supported a judgment for $440.30 for plaintiff.

2. An answer denying the allegations of the complaint "as this defendant is informed and believes" does not constitute a sufficient denial thereof.

3. One person, or an association of persons, may do business under a firm name entirely distinct from the name or names of the person or persons composing the firm.

Action by Joseph E. Shain against L. Du

of each and all of certain lots of land in San Francisco; that defendant Edwards holds the legal title to the said fourth of some of said lots in trust for plaintiff, and that defendant Joseph F. Clark so holds the legal title to the fourth of the rest of said lots; and that, after an accounting, and the payment of indebtedness found to be due from plaintiff, the said Edwards and Clark convey to plaintiff the said undivided fourth of said lots so held by them respectively. Other persons are made defendants as claiming some interest in the premises, or as being necessary parties. The court below gave judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment. There was also an attempted appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial, but, as the record shows, this latter appeal was not perfected.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the case are these: On November 20, 1870, the plaintiff, the defendant Mary E. Bucknall, and John C. Davis, who were brother and sisters, were the owners as tenants in common of certain lands, which included the said lots involved in this action; and Eugene L. Sullivan was an owner in common with them in a part of said lands, and was also the owner of certain other lands in San Francisco. On that day—November 20, 1870—the said plaintiff, Bucknall, and Davis conveyed to said Sullivan all their interests in said lands; and on the same day two other instruments in writing were executed by and between said four persons, by which it was declared that the lands above referred to, including the lands which said Sullivan held in severalty, should all be held by said four persons as tenants in common, each having an undivided one-fourth; that the title should remain in Sullivan, and he should have absolute management of the property; that he should have a power irrevocable to mortgage or to sell and convey any of said property “upon such terms and conditions * * * as he shall think fit.” The property was incumbered at the time with a large indebtedness; and it was declared that Sullivan held the property in trust “to administer, bargain, sell, convey, mortgage, or otherwise incumber and dispose of the same, or any estate or interest therein,” to discharge out of the rents and profits all indebtedness “now or hereafter to be a lien on the same,” and at some future day to make division and partition among said parties. The other three were near relatives of Sullivan, and treated by him as his children, and he had been in possession of and had managed said property since the death of their father in 1850, and after the date of said instruments he continued in the possession and management thereof until his death, which occurred March 26, 1885. On January 23, 1879, and while the relations of said four persons with respect to said property were as above stated, and said trust still existed, the said Sullivan, in furtherance of the purposes of said trust, executed to defendant Joseph F. Clark a deed of conveyance of that part of said property which is involved in this action. The deed was upon its face absolute, and conveyed title in fee to Clark; but it was intended at the time as security for money borrowed by Sullivan, evidenced by a promissory note made by the latter to Clark, and Clark gave to Sullivan a paper writing called in the record a “defeasance,” of even date, in which he promised to reconvey the property to Sullivan upon the repayment of said money. The deed was recorded, but the defeasance was not. Afterwards, Sullivan not having paid the interest, nor having kept the taxes on the land paid, Clark demanded payment, whereupon Sullivan informed Clark that he could not pay him in money, but would give him the land for the indebtedness. This Clark was reluctant to do, as he believed the land to be worth less than the amount of the indebtedness; but, being informed by Sullivan that he could get nothing else, he finally agreed to take the land for the debt. Thereupon Clark returned the promissory note to Sullivan, Sullivan surrendered to Clark the said paper writing or defeasance, and Sullivan was discharged by Clark of all said indebtedness. Thereafter said Clark, until his conveyance of the land as hereinafter stated, possessed said land as his own, and spent money upon the same, and Sullivan was not indebted to him in any sum of money, and made no claim to any part of said land. Clark was in the position of an innocent purchaser without notice. The money borrowed by Sullivan was not for his private purposes. Afterwards the defendant Mary E. Bucknall purchased from said Clark all the property that had been conveyed to him as aforesaid by Sullivan, except certain lots, which he retained. Mrs. Bucknall borrowed the money to pay for the land from defendant Edwards; and by agreement Clark conveyed the land to defendant Childs, who was to hold it as security to Edwards for the money borrowed by Bucknall. By further agreement Childs conveyed to Edwards, who was still to hold it as such security, but by consent the conveyance to Edwards was not recorded. Mrs. Bucknall paid the full value of the property at the time of her purchase and bought it for herself alone. The real contest in the case is between the plaintiff and Mrs. Bucknall as to the one-fourth of the land purchased by the latter from Clark, and between the plaintiff and Clark as to the one-fourth of the lots retained by Clark. There are only two questions in the case requiring special notice.

1. Appellant contends that he should have had judgment, because the original transaction between Sullivan and Clark was, in law, a mortgage, and that its character as a mortgage was not changed, and could not have been changed, by the subsequent acts of a surrender of the defeasance, the yielding up of the note, the discharge of the debt, etc.;

and that, in order to make such a transfer valid, there must be some new consideration from the mortgagee to the mortgagor. This contention cannot, in our opinion, be successfully maintained. A mortgagor may sell and convey all his right and interest in the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee where the transaction is fair, honest, and without fraud, and where no unconscionable advantage has been taken of his position by the mortgagee. It would be surprising if two men in their senses, and with their eyes open, could not make such a contract. The doctrine, "once a mortgage, always a mortgage," does not refer to future contracts. In Washburn on Real Property it is said that the character of a mortgage cannot be changed "by an agreement of the parties made at the time of the execution of the deed," and that "equity will not admit of a mortgagee embarrassing or defeating his right to redeem the estate by any agreement which he may be induced to enter into in order to effect a loan"; but that "this does not preclude any subsequent bona fide agreement in respect to the estate between the parties," and that "the mortgagee may always purchase the mortgagor's right of redemption, and thus acquire an absolute title." Volume 2 (5th Ed.) top paging 65, 66, §§ 23, 24. Section 2889 of the Civil Code does not change the rule. The case at bar is in principle exactly like the case of Green v. Butler, 26 Cal. 595. In that case Justice Sawyer, speaking for the court, after noticing a number of authorities to the point, says: "Independent of authority, no argument is necessary to show that upon principle a mortgagor has the same capacity to contract with reference to his interest in the mortgaged premises that he has with reference to any other property." The only difference between that case and the one at bar is that in the former case there was some consideration between the parties in addition to the mortgage debt; but the kind or character of the consideration can make no difference if it be, as in the case at bar, fair and adequate. There was no advantage taken of the mortgagor by the mortgagee. The latter was the reluctant party, and the transaction was pressed on him by the mortgagor. Whether or not by the respective surrenders of the note and debt and the defeasance the technical legal title passed to Clark is a question not important in this case. Both parties were estopped,—Clark from claiming the debt, and Sullivan from claiming any interest in the land. It has been held by some courts of sister states that "where a mortgagor voluntarily canceled the instrument of defeasance which he held, it gave the deed which it was intended to defeat the effect of an original absolute conveyance as between the parties." 2 Washb. Real Prop. § 24, and cases cited. Under the decisions in this state it may be assumed that in such a case the absolute title would not pass,—unless, at least, there had been a redelivery of the deed, or facts from which such redelivery should be inferred. But in the case at bar Clark had at least the apparent record title, and appellant is invoking the power of a court of chancery to compel the conveyance to him of such title. Equity, in determining whether it shall grant appellant's prayer, will not concern itself with the question whether or not the strict legal title passed. It is sufficient that it should have passed.

2. It is contended that the purchase of Mrs. Bucknall from Clark should inure to the benefit of appellant, because she and the appellant were original tenants in common and beneficiaries under the trust. But by the transactions above stated the trust, as to the land purchased by Mrs. Bucknall, had come to an end, and the land had ceased to be common property. She had as much right to buy it as any tenant in common has to buy land which had formerly been common, but which had, by the act of all the tenants in common, either in person or by an authorized agent, passed to a stranger. The findings are sufficiently full, and we do not think that they are in conflict with the facts admitted in the pleadings. We do not see that any further discussion of the case is required. The judgment is affirmed.

Jardin to recover for goods sold and delivered to defendant by Rice & Co., plaintiff's assignors. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. Wm. Reade, for appellant. Jos. E. Shain, in pro. per.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover $440.30 for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by Rice & Co., assignors of plaintiff, to the defendant. The cause was tried by the court, without a jury, and written findings filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The sole point made by appellant is that his motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. The motion was based upon the ground that the proofs failed to establish the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise by Rice & Co. to defendant, or that there was evidence of the sale, delivery, or value of any goods. A single witness was called for plaintiff, who testified, in substance, that he was manager in San Francisco for Rice & Co., liquor dealers of Covington, Ky.; that he knew defendant, had interviews and correspondence with him. He said Rice & Co. sold defendant goods. He had been a customer of that firm before witness became manager, and, without consulting the books, could not tell the extent of defendant's purchases. The witness then stated that the balance due June, 1892, was $547; that defendant called at the office; they agreed upon the balance due as $497.30, and defendant agreed to make monthly payments until all was paid. He made one payment of $57, and nothing further. Plaintiff then proved an assignment of the claim of Rice & Co. to plaintiff, under a power of attorney from that firm to J. C. Fyfe, executed by John C. Yost, who was shown to be the sole partner of the firm of Rice & Co. Defendant offered no testimony. This uncontradicted testimony was sufficient to uphold the finding. It may well be doubted if, under the pleadings, any testimony was necessary as to the sale and delivery of the goods. The complaint was in the usual form, for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by Rice & Co. to defendant at his request, at an agreed price, amounting to $440.30, which defendant promised to pay, etc. The complaint is verified. The only attempt at an answer is as follows: "Now comes the defendant above named, and, for his answer to the complaint filed herein, alleges and sets forth that, as this defendant is informed and believes, he denies that the firm of Rice & Co. delivered goods, wares, or merchandise to this defendant amounting to the sum of four hundred and forty 30-100 dollars, or in any amount." To say that as one is informed and believes he denies a thing is not to deny it positively or upon information and belief, or a denial for want of information or belief.

The contention that Rice & Co. was a fictitious name, and for that reason they could not maintain an action, needs no extended comment. A single individual or an association of individuals may do business under a firm name entirely distinct from the name or names of the person or persons composing such firm. In the absence of fraud, and as between himself and those with whom he deals, a person may do business and execute contracts under any name he chooses to assume. Bell v. Publishing Co., 42 N. Y. Super. Ct. 567; Ex parte Snook, 2 Hilt. 566; People v. Leong Quong, 60 Cal. 107. If the defendant purchased goods from the assignor of the plaintiff, who was doing business under the name of Rice & Co., he cannot, in the absence of fraud, evade payment by showing that Rice & Co. was not the true name of the party from whom he purchased.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

EISENHUTH et al. v. ACKERSON, Street Superintendent. (No. 15,581.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1894.)

STATUTE—CONSOLIDATION ACT—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION—STREET—RAILROAD FRANCHISES—MODE OF GRANTING.

1. Worley's Consolidation Act, p. 16, § 68, which requires the mayor's approval of all resolutions and ordinances granting a privilege, was not repealed by Civil Code, div. 1, pt. 4, tit. 4 (entitled "Street-Railroad Corporations"), § 497, which provides that authority to lay railroad tracks in the streets of a city or town may be obtained from the trustees, council, or other body to whom is intrusted the government of the city or town, upon such terms as the city or town authority may provide, nor by any other provision of such title. McDonald v. Dodge, 31 Pac. 909, 97 Cal. 112, Jacobs v. Board, 34 Pac. 630, 100 Cal. 121, distinguished. 2. Civil Code, div. 1, pt. 4, tit. 3, c. 2 (which enumerates the powers of "railroad corporations" generally), § 470, providing that no railroad corporation can use any territory within any incorporated city or town unless the right to use it is granted by a two-thirds vote of the town or city authority from which the right must emanate, does not prescribe a mode of granting street-railroad franchises inconsistent with Consolidation Act, § 68, which requires the mayor's approval of resolutions or ordinances granting a privilege.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by John W. Eisenhuth and others against W. W. Ackerson, superintendent of streets of the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., to enjoin defendant from obstructing or preventing the construction or operation of an electric railway on certain streets of such city. From an order discharging a former order on defendant to show cause, and from an order dissolving a temporary restraining order, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John H. Durst, H. S. Foote, and Louis F. Dunand, for appellants. Harry T. Creswell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On December 19, 1892, the board of supervisors, by a vote of 10 ayes to 1 nay, passed an ordinance purporting to grant to plaintiffs and their successors and assigns the privilege to construct and operate a street railroad in the city of San Francisco, extending over portions of some 18 different streets of said city, for the term of 50 years. In due time after this ordinance so passed the board of supervisors, it was presented to the president of said board (the mayor) for his approval, who within 10 days thereafter returned it to the board without having signed it, and with his written objections thereto, which objections were duly entered upon the journal of the board, and published as required by section 68 of the consolidation act. Thereafter, at a stated meeting of the board, one of the members thereof offered a resolution to pass said ordinance notwithstanding the said objections of the mayor, which resolution was negatived and lost by a unanimous vote of the 12 members of the board, whereby the said written objections of the mayor were sustained; and no further action has been taken upon said ordinance or objections. All the proceedings of the board and of the mayor in regard to the said ordinance were in strict compliance with the consolidation act, and were completed on the 6th day of February, 1893. On April 27, 1893, the plaintiffs commenced the construction of a double-track electric railway upon and along the route and streets designated in said ordinance, and had constructed about 200 feet of track on Broderick street when the defendant, in his official capacity as superintendent of streets of said city and county, stopped further progress in the construction of said railway, and ever since has prevented plaintiffs and their employés from continuing the construction thereof, and ordered plaintiffs to remove the track already laid, and threatened that unless they did so within three days he would tear up and remove the same; and further threatens to prevent the construction by plaintiffs of the railway, or any part thereof, on the route designated in said ordinance. The object of this action is to enjoin the defendant perpetually from obstructing or interfering with the construction or operation of said railway in accordance with said ordinance, and so to restrain him pending the action.

Upon the filing of the complaint, the court ordered defendant to show cause why he should not be so enjoined, and at the same time issued a restraining order to operate in the meantime and until further order. The matter upon the order to show cause was submitted to the court upon the complaint and an agreed statement of facts, including the facts above stated, whereupon the court discharged the order to show cause, and dissolved the temporary restraining order. From these orders the plaintiffs appeal. As already remarked, the proceedings by which the board of supervisors attempted to grant the privilege or franchise in question were had under and in strict accordance with section 68 of the consolidation act. So much of the sixty-eighth section as pertains to the grant in question is as follows: "Every ordinance or resolution of the board of supervisors providing for any specific improvement, the granting of any privilege, or involving the lease or other appropriation of public property, or the expenditure of public moneys (except for sums less than five hundred dollars), or laying tax or assessment, and every ordinance or resolution imposing a new duty or penalty shall, after its introduction in the board, be published, with the ayes and nays, in some city daily newspaper at least five successive days before final action by the board upon the same, and every such ordinance, after the same has passed the board, shall, before it takes effect, be presented to the president of the board for his approval. If he approves, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it within ten days to the board, with his objections in writing. The board shall then enter the objections on the journals, and publish them in some city newspaper. If at any stated meeting thereafter two-thirds of all the members elected to the board vote for such ordinance or resolution, it shall then, despite the objections of the president, become valid. Should any such ordinance or resolution not be returned by the president within ten days after he receives it, it shall become valid, the same as if it had received his signature." Worley's Consolidation Act, p. 16. Unless that part of this section relating to the granting of privileges was repealed before the ordinance in question was vetoed by the mayor, there can be no plausible pretense that the ordinance ever took effect, or that the superior court erred in dissolving the restraining order, or in discharging the rule to show cause. Therefore, the principal and controlling question for decision, to which all others discussed by counsel are either subject or merely subsidiary, is whether or not that part of the above extract from the sixty-eighth section of the consolidation act requiring the mayor's approval of all resolutions and ordinances granting a privilege had been repealed before February 6, 1893, when the board of supervisors unanimously sustained the mayor's veto of the ordinance in question; since it must be admitted, and is admitted by appellants, that an ordinance granting a right to construct and operate a street railroad on the streets of San Francisco is an "ordinance granting a privilege" in the sense of section 68 of the consolidation act. The case of McDonald v. Dodge, 97 Cal. 112, 31 Pac. 909, cited by appellants, can have no proper application to this case. That case decides, by implication at least, that the street law of 1883 (Vrooman Act), as amended March 14, 1889, is inconsistent with, and therefore repealed, that part of section 68 of the consolidation act which requires the mayor's approval of "every ordinance or resolution of the board of supervisors providing for any specific improvement." But that decision does not touch nor in any way affect the provision of the consolidation act requiring the mayor's approval of all ordinances and resolutions granting any privilege. Nor does the decision or the opinion of any of the justices in the case of Jacobs v. Board, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630, apply to this case, except the concession therein made that the veto power of the mayor is to be recognized in all cases where it is clearly granted. The question in that case was whether or not the mayor was authorized to veto an ordinance of the board of supervisors fixing rates to be paid for water in the city and county of San Francisco; and, upon a construction of the consolidation act in connection with section 1 of article 14 of the state constitution, it was decided that the approval of the mayor was not necessary to the validity of such an ordinance, inasmuch as the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco was the legislative and governing body of the municipality, except for a few specified purposes, of which the fixing of water rates was not one. Speaking of the consolidation act, Mr. Justice McFarland, who wrote the leading opinion, said: "Under that act, the board of supervisors is the legislative department of the municipal government, although it is provided therein that the ordinances upon certain enumerated subjects shall not be effective unless approved by the mayor (whose office is created by said act), or unless, after his veto, nine members of the board shall vote therefor. Under the act, however, there are many things which the board may do without the concurrence of the mayor. * * *

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the question whether, if we were to look to the consolidation act alone, the order No. 2,622 (fixing water rates) would require the approval of the mayor, although it is difficult to see that it would be embraced within any of the enumerated cases in which he is given the veto power by that act." Mr. Justice Harrison, in his concurring opinion, after placing his concurrence on constitutional grounds, said: "Even under the provisions of section 68 of the consolidation act, the approval of the mayor does not become essential to the validity of an ordinance fixing water rates. His approval is required to only certain classes of ordinances which are enumerated in that section. * * * It is sufficient to say, without further discussion, that an ordinance fixing water rates is not included in either of these classes." The chief justice, Beatty, said: "I concur in the judgment, upon the ground that the true construction of the constitution is that ordinances fixing water rates are to be passed as legislative acts of the particular municipality are generally passed, and not as they are passed in exceptional cases provided by act of the legislature." These extracts from the opinions of the justices show that the Jacobs Case has no bearing upon the case at bar, except in so far as it may be said to concede the power of the mayor to veto ordinances of the classes specified in section 68 of the consolidation act.

The principal point made by counsel for appellants, however, is founded upon section 497 of the Civil Code, under which they say the grant of the franchise in question was made, and which they claim to be so inconsistent with the power of the mayor to veto such grant as to repeal, by implication, that part of section 68 of the consolidation act which authorizes him to veto all ordinances and resolutions of the board providing "for the granting of any privilege." Section 497 of the Civil Code is the first section of title 4, pt. 4, div. 1, headed "Street-Railroad Corporations," and reads as follows: "Authority to lay railroad tracks through the streets and public highways of any incorporated city or town may be obtained for a term or years, not exceeding fifty, from the trustees, council or other body to whom is intrusted the government of the city or town, under such restrictions and limitations, and upon such terms and payment of license tax as the city or town authority may provide. In no case must permission be granted to propel cars upon such tracks otherwise than by horses, mules, or by wire ropes running under the streets and moved by stationary steam-engines, unless for special reasons, as hereinafter provided." But we perceive nothing in this section or in title 4 at all inconsistent with any part of section 68 of the consolidation act, since neither section 497 nor any other part of title 4 purports to provide or regulate the mode or manner in which the "authority" to lay street-railroad tracks in the streets of incorporated cities or towns shall or may be granted by the "trustees, council, or other body to whom is intrusted the government of the city or town." The sole object of title 4 was to authorize the governing bodies of incorporated cities and towns to grant the privilege of laying street railroads under such restrictions and limitations as are specified in that title. There was no necessity for providing the mode or manner of the grant, so long as the legislature was content with the modes already provided by the charters of the different cities and towns in the state, although the governing bodies of such cities and towns were differently constituted, and governed by charters prescribing different modes of municipal legislation. Any authorized mode of granting the privilege of constructing and operating street railroads fully answered all purposes of the Code provisions cited, without requiring all municipalities to grant that privilege in a uniform mode. If, as contended by counsel, section 497 of the Civil Code cannot operate uniformly on all municipal corporations without uniformity in the manner of passing ordinances granting the particular privilege for which it provides, then, indeed, is that section itself unconstitutional, since it fails to provide for such uniformity of manner, and leaves it to be governed by the charters of the different municipalities, whose modes of legislation are far from uniform in this respect. But we think that section is not wanting in uniformity of operation on the governing bodies of all incorporated cities and towns in the state, which governing bodies, however constituted, it authorizes to grant the privilege of constructing street railroads, without prescribing the manner in which the grant shall be made; and it does not purport to have any other operation or effect. For the purposes, and to the full extent, of thus authorizing such governing bodies to grant street-railroad franchises, section 497 of the Civil Code is a general law, and, by implication, repeals all prior laws inconsistent therewith; but, as above remarked, section 68 of the consolidation act is in no respect inconsistent therewith.

It is finally contended by appellants that, even if title 4 of the Civil Code does not prescribe the manner of granting street-railroad franchises, section 470, under title 3 of that Code, does prescribe a mode inconsistent with that prescribed by section 68 of the consolidation act. Title 3 is headed "Railroad Corporations," and is divided into three chapters, entitled as follows: "I. Officers and Corporate Stock." "II. Enumeration of Powers." "III. Business, how Conducted." Section 470 of title 3 is as follows: "Section 470. No railroad corporation must use any street, alley or highway, or any of the land or water, within any incorporated city or town, unless the right to so use the same is granted by a two-thirds vote of the town or city authority from which the right must emanate." This section is in chapter 2, devoted to the enumeration of the powers of railroad corporations generally; whereas title 4, in which is found section 497, is devoted exclusively to street railroads; nor does title 3 purport to enumerate, define, restrict, or enlarge the powers of municipal corporations, or to prescribe or regulate the manner in which municipal corporations shall legislate or otherwise govern. Surely, section 470 detracts nothing from the veto power of the mayor of the city and county of San Francisco, which power does not depend upon the number of votes by which an ordinance or resolution passes the board of supervisors; for he may veto and thereby compel a reconsideration of an ordinance passed by unanimous vote of all the members of the board. And it may not be impertinent, under this head, further to observe that the grant of the franchise in question in this case was not to a corporation of any kind, but to natural persons; and that it does not appear that any railroad corporation has any interest in the grant. We perceive no error in the action of the lower court, and therefore affirm the orders appealed from.

N. P. PERINE CONTRACTING & PAVING CO. v. QUACKENBUSH. (No. 15,549.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 4, 1894.)

PAVING CONTRACT—OPENING OF BIDS—IRREGULARITY—REQUIREMENTS AS TO MATERIAL—LIEN THEREUNDER—JUDGMENT OF FORECLOSURE—CONTRACT TO PAY "IN GOLD COIN."

1. A complaint, in an action to foreclose an assessment lien, which alleges that bids to do the work for which the lien is claimed were to have been received until a certain day; that the bids were in fact opened, examined, and declared on the day before, and, in pursuance thereof, that plaintiff was awarded the contract,—is demurrable.

2. A requirement in a paving contract that the material to be used shall be bituminous rock does not render such contract void, as preventing property owners from doing the work themselves, as provided in St. 1889, p. 162, though all the modes of preparing such paving material are covered by patents.

3. The judgment rendered in the foreclosure of a lien for paving under a contract providing for payment "in gold coin," entered into under authority conferred by statute, need not be paid in gold coin unless the statute specified that the contract should be so written, being clearly within Act March 12, 1880 (3 Deer. Ann. Code, p. 300; St. 1880, p. 8), which provides that legal-tender notes of the United States shall be legal tender for any debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. Murphy, Judge.

Action by the N. P. Perine Contracting & Paving Company, a corporation, against Thomas Quackenbush, to foreclose a street-assessment lien upon certain of defendant's property. There was judgment for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying him a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. M. Wood, for appellant. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiff, a corporation, brought this action to foreclose a street-assessment lien upon defendant's lot. Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled without argument. An answer was afterwards filed, a trial had, and findings and judgment were for the plaintiff; and this appeal is from the judgment, and also from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The only point now made upon the demurrer is that the complaint shows that bids were to be received until 4 p. m. of January 16th, and that the bids were opened, examined, and declared by the board on the 15th, and in pursuance thereof they awarded the contract to the plaintiff.

Respondent contends that the date of opening the bids, stated in the complaint, is a clerical error, and that this is apparent from the allegation in paragraph 7 "that on the 16th day of January, 1892, and prior to 4 o'clock p. m., various sealed proposals to do said work were delivered to the clerk of said board of supervisors; that the plaintiff herein signed and handed in to said clerk one of the said sealed proposals," etc. There is an inconsistency in these dates, and, if it could be said that these inconsistencies created an uncertainty, merely, we could have little difficulty in reaching a conclusion. But the date at which plaintiff's proposal was filed was immaterial, provided only that it was before 4 p. m. of the 16th. There is no doubt or uncertainty that bidders had until that time to hand in their proposals, nor can there be any doubt that the board could not legally act upon the proposals until the time limited for receiving them had passed. The allegation of the time at which they were opened, canvassed, and declared was material. Nor is it denied that if the proposals were in fact canvassed and declared on the 15th, and the contract based upon such action, the proceeding was void. The demurrer was therefore well taken, and should have been sustained.

It is contended, however, that the defendant put in evidence upon the trial the proposal of the plaintiff, and that said proposal bore date of January 16th. But no evidence was offered or received inconsistent with the averment that the proposals were opened on the 15th, unless it is assumed that the date of the plaintiff's proposal was the true date; and the plaintiff cannot insist, in the face of its own averment, that such was the true date, and that the other is erroneous. If the plaintiff had put in evidence, without objection from the defendant, which showed that the proposals were in fact opened and canvassed on the 16th instead of the 15th, the error would have been cured, but no evidence of that character was introduced by either party. The judgment must therefore be reversed, but in view of an amendment by the plaintiff, and another trial, some questions that will doubtless be again presented should be noticed.

The specifications required the paving to be done with bituminous rock prepared for use "by either steaming, hot air, or other process, but in no case must the material be reduced or melted by any process which would burn it." Appellant contends that all the known processes for melting the rock are covered by patent, except that in which coal tar is used, and that the superintendent of streets would not permit the use of the last-named method. Whether there is any other process by which the rock can be prepared than those covered by patents, we need not inquire. It is conceded by appellant that the plaintiff proved that, upon the payment of a royalty to the patentees, any one could obtain a license to use the patented methods, and appellant proved that there were at least two methods patented by different persons. His argument is that, the available methods of using bituminous rock for paving purposes being covered by patents, the requirement that this material shall be used prevents the owners of three-fourths of the frontage of the lands to be assessed from contracting to do the work themselves, under section 5 of the act of 1889. St. 1889, p. 162. Appellant relies upon Pavement Co. v. Painter, 35 Cal. 699. That case does not sustain appellant, though some expressions used in the opinion give color to his claim. By an act approved April 2, 1866 (St. 1865-66, p. 720), it was provided that, whenever a majority of the owners in frontage should petition the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for the construction of the Nicholson pavement, they should order it to be done. In that case the owners did not so petition, but nevertheless the board ordered the Nicholson pavement to be used, and it was held that their proceedings were void. Sanderson, J., said, in the course of the opinion, in substance, that where there can be but one bidder, and where the owners are prohibited by heavy penalties from doing the work, to advertise for sealed proposals, and open, examine, and declare them, "would be to play as broad a farce as was ever enacted behind the footlights." But elsewhere in the same opinion the same learned justice said: "It is true that the third section [St. 1862, p. 391], which confers the power to pave, does not restrict the board to any kind of pavement, and if the question turned exclusively upon that section the board would have the power to contract at its election for any kind in use." As no act, such as the Nicholson pavement act, restricts the powers of the board to order the bituminous rock pavement, we may adopt the language of Sanderson, J., last above quoted, as applicable to this case, and as correctly declaring the law. Besides, in this case the specifications did not confine bidders to one patented process, nor exclude processes not patented, nor were the owners excluded from using the patented processes, but had the liberty to use them upon payment of a royalty of one dollar per ton of the rock treated. Appellant's contention would effectually exclude all methods of paving which were patented, even though such method, because of its superiority, or even because of its cheapness, would be specially advantageous to the owners of lots liable for the expense of paving, as well as the municipality charged with its maintenance.

Appellant further contends that the provision in the contract requiring the work to be paid for in gold coin of the United States invalidated the contract, that the statute does not authorize the board of supervisors to invite bids or award contracts on a gold-coin basis, and that in fact the bids were not invited nor the contract awarded upon such basis. Whatever may be the force and effect of a private contract to pay in gold coin, or of a judgment rendered upon such contract, specifying that it shall be paid in gold coin, we think it clear that in the case at bar, where the defendant is not a party to the contract, and is connected therewith and bound thereby only by force of the statute, the judgment should not specify the kind of money in which it should be satisfied, unless the statute so specifies. The proceeding to improve the street and to charge defendant's property therefor is adversary in its character, and the provisions of section 667 of the Code of Civil Procedure do not apply. It is clearly a liability which may be discharged by payment in any kind of money which is by law a legal tender for the payment of debts, and is within the act of our legislature approved March 12, 1880 (3 Deer. Ann. Code, p. 300; St. 1880, p. 8).¹ This, however, does not affect the validity of the contract in all other respects, and a general judgment for the sum due under the contract would be valid. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, with leave to the plaintiff to amend its complaint as it may be advised.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

MULLIN v. CALIFORNIA HORSESHOE CO. (No. 15,599.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1894.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYEE — DANGEROUS MACHINERY — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. Plaintiff, a boy 16 years old, after working in defendant's factory 6 months, was ordered by the foreman to mount a ladder 20 feet high, and hold a belt weighing 40 pounds over a revolving shaft, which he did against his will, and without having received instructions as to the danger of the place; and he was injured by falling against the shaft, through the turning of a loose plank on which he was standing. Held, that the question whether plaintiff was negligent was for the jury.

2. In order to prevent plaintiff from recovering damages for injury so caused, it must appear that he not only knew, or had the means of knowing, of the unsafeness of the place or machinery, but also that he knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to which he was exposed.

3. It is the duty of an employer to furnish his employes a suitable and safe place to work in, and suitable and safe machinery to work with; and he cannot escape liability for failing so to do by delegating such duty to another, even if such person, in other respects, is a fellow servant.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Charles Mullin, a minor, against the California Horseshoe Company, a corporation, to recover damages for personal injuries. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Shadburne & Herrin, for appellant. W. S. Goodfellow, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the plaintiff. The answer denied that the defendant was in any way responsible for the injuries complained of, and alleged that they were caused by the plaintiff's own negligence. It was proved at the trial that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to work in its horseshoe shop in November, 1891, and that he continued to work there until he was injured on June 13, 1892, at which time he was 16 years of age. When he was employed he was taken by the foreman, Ingram, to one of the machines for making horseshoes, and was told that the machinist would show him what to do, and to obey whatever the machinist told him. There were four machines in the shop, and three boys were employed on each machine, — the furnace boy, the bender boy, and the press boy. The machinist, Brunig, had general supervision of the boys, and directed and ordered them about. He put the plaintiff to work as a press boy, and directed him generally about his work until he was injured. The machines were worked by belts which ran up over a large revolving shaft that extended through the building, and was operated by steam power. This shaft was about 20 feet above the floor, and to reach it one had to go up a ladder, the lower end of which rested on the floor, and upper end against one of the stringers of the building. Lying across the stringers were a few loose planks, which were not nailed down, and were easily moved. One end of one of the planks rested on one of the uprights of the ladder, and was raised a little above the stringer. The belt which ran the machine on which plaintiff was working was old, and had broken many times. It broke twice in the forenoon of the day, when plaintiff was injured, and then the machinist went up and fixed it. It broke again in the afternoon, and the machinist directed the plaintiff to go up and hold the belt while he fixed it. The plaintiff had never before been sent up to hold the belt, and was given no instructions about the danger of the place to which he was sent. He did not want to go, but was ordered quite positively to go, and thereupon took the belt, weighing 40 or 45 pounds, on his shoulders, and started up the ladder. When he got to the top of the ladder he stepped off upon one of the planks, and walked along to the shaft where he was to hold the belt. The shaft was running at full speed, and he put the ends of the belt over it, and dropped them down, and then started back on the plank to go down, when the machinist hallooed to him, "Go back and hold that belt." He then went back, and held the belt up from the shaft in a loop. He held it there for about 10 minutes, when the machinist called out to him, "Wait; I am going to get some lacing." He became tired standing there and holding up the belt, and moved his foot on the plank, when it turned over, and he fell forward upon the shaft. His right arm was caught between the belt and shaft, and torn completely off at the elbow, and it became necessary to amputate it near the shoulder. He was also otherwise badly bruised and injured. The plank that turned over, and caused plaintiff to fall, was the one that rested at one end on one of the uprights of the ladder, and over which he walked in going first from the ladder to the shaft. He noticed how the plank was supported when he went up and got off the ladder, and also that it shook a little when he went along over it. The case was being tried before a jury, and at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant moved for a nonsuit, and the court granted the motion. A judgment of nonsuit was accordingly entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

We think the court erred in granting the nonsuit. The law is settled beyond controversy that it is the duty of an employer to furnish a suitable and safe place for his employé to work, and suitable and safe appliances and machinery for him to work with; and this duty cannot be delegated to another, so as to exonerate the employer from liability to an employé who is injured in consequence of the omission to properly perform the act or duty, whether that other is a superior officer, agent, or servant, or a subordinate or inferior agent or servant. In either case, in respect to such act or duty, the person who undertakes or omits to perform it is the representative of the employer, and not a mere fellow servant with the one who is injured; and, when it is claimed that the injured employé was himself guilty of such negligence as to bar him from recovering damages for his injuries, it must appear that he not only knew, or had the means of knowledge, of the unsafeness of the place, appliances, or machinery, but also that he knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to which he was himself personally exposed. Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70

Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710; Gisson v. Schwabacher, 99 Cal. 419, 34 Pac. 104; Elledge v. Railway Co., 100 Cal. 282, 34 Pac. 720; Nixon v. Lead Co., 102 Cal. 458, 36 Pac. 803. Whether the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence as would prevent his recovery was, under the facts in this case, a question for the jury. Sanborn v. Trading Co., supra; Ingerman v. Moore, 90 Cal. 410, 27 Pac. 306. Here it is evident that the place to which the plaintiff was sent to hold the belt was unsafe; and, to show that the defendant knew of such unsafeness, the plaintiff offered to prove that others had been injured in the same place, and in the same way, before, but the court excluded the evidence. The plaintiff was a boy, had never been sent up to that platform before, and before going was not cautioned or told that any danger attended the work assigned him, and, so far as appears, he had not at that time heard of any previous accidents there. We do not think, therefore, that it can be said to be established by the evidence that the plaintiff knew, or ought to have known, of the danger to which he was exposed. This being so, the issues should have been submitted to the jury. It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. So ordered.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v.
BLAKE et al. (No. 15,641.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1894.)

LIENS OF MATERIAL MEN — RETENTION OF PART OF CONTRACT PRICE—NOTICE TO OWN-ER—WHEN GIVEN.

1. A board of education is not subject to garnishment.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing, in regard to mechanics' liens, that the owner shall retain a certain percentage of the contract price for 35 days after the completion of the work, and that the material men, etc., may at any time serve notice on the owner of their claim for material furnished or labor performed, whereupon the owner shall retain sufficient of the money due or to become due the contractor to satisfy such claims, the notices may be served after the expiration of the 35 days, provided there are funds due the contractor still in the hands of the owner.

3. A county deposited money due a contractor in court, and two creditors of the contractor, one only of whom had a lien on the fund, together with the contractor, were ordered to interplead for the same. The contractor failed to set up any claim to the fund. Held, that the balance of the fund left after satisfying the creditor's lien should be paid to the other creditor to satisfy a judgment held by him against the contractor, instead of to the contractor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco against John Blake and others to compel defendants to interplead and litigate their claim to a certain fund deposited in court. From a judgment for defendant J. D. De Gear, defendants the Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Company and others appeal. Modified.

William H. Jordan, for appellants. Bert F. Miller, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Defendant Blake erected an addition to a school building under a contract with the plaintiff, and completed the same September 14, 1892, at which date there remained unpaid $829.45 of the contract price, which, by the terms of the contract, was not payable until 35 days after the completion of the work, as required by the statute, a sum insufficient to pay all the subcontractors and material men in full. Nine days after completion appellants commenced an action at law against Blake, the contractor, and served process of garnishment upon the board of education. Afterwards De Gear and other claimants (who afterwards assigned to him) served upon the board notices of their several claims, as provided by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure,¹ some of these notices being served before the expiration of the 35 days, and others after such expiration. After these notices were all served, respondent De Gear also commenced an action against the contractor, and garnished the board of education, and both appellants and respondent obtained their several judgments against the contractor. The board of education thereupon commenced this action, paid said sum remaining in its hands into court, and obtained an order requiring the several defendants to interplead, and litigate their respective claims thereto. The defendants (except the contractor, who made no claim) interpleaded, and the cause was submitted upon facts agreed, and findings were filed and judgment entered awarding De Gear $601.26, the amount of his claim, including the assigned claims, and $6.50 costs, but making no disposition of the remainder of the fund. From this judgment appellants have appealed upon the judgment-roll.

In addition to the foregoing, the court specially found that appellants did not at any time serve upon the board of education any notice in writing of their claim, other than said notice of garnishment. So far as appellants are concerned, they proceeded against Blake as general creditors without any reference to the fact that their claims were for materials furnished for the building erected for the plaintiff; and the question is, therefore, whether a general creditor, under the circumstances of this case, can, by an ordinary action at law against the contractor, and garnishment served upon the board of education, acquire any right to the funds in its hands to the exclusion of respondent, or any right to share in the fund to the prejudice of respondent. In the recent case of Skelly v. School Dist. (Cal.) 37 Pac. 643, it was held that a school district is not subject to garnishment. That case, therefore, disposes of any claim appellants could make upon the fund so far as it is based upon the garnishment. The effect of the service of notices of their claims by respondent and his assignors is also settled by Bates v. Santa Barbara Co., 90 Cal. 543, 27 Pac. 438. It was there held that a written notice of his claim, served by the mechanic or material man upon the county under section 1184, Code Civ. Proc., made it the duty of the county to retain sufficient funds to answer such claim; that the county thereupon became liable as upon garnishment or assignment; that it is a form of equitable subrogation regulated by statute; that the right of the parties giving the notice does not depend upon their right to a lien; and that "the right to control and direct the funds remaining in the hands of the owner is as distinct and independent as the right to file and enforce a lien." The statute required that this fund should be held by the board for 35 days after the completion of the work for the benefit of those who performed labor or furnished materials to the contractor, and who should serve the notice provided by section 1184, Code Civ. Proc. A payment within that time, either to the contractor or under a garnishee process to a creditor of the contractor, could not diminish this fund. The board was, during such period, a statutory trustee of the fund for the benefit of the mechanic or material man who should comply with the requirements of law, and for that reason also not subject to garnishment; and not being, then, subject to garnishment, no right to the fund was acquired by appellants as against those who by pursuing the statute acquired or perfected their right thereto. Appellants claim, however, that as against those claims of which notice was served after the expiration of the 35 days they should be preferred; that the right of subcontractors and material men to serve notice of their claims expired when the last payment became due. It is true the board might have safely paid to the contractor at the expiration of the 35 days any money in its hands not required to pay claims of which notice had theretofore been served; but we think such notices may properly be served so long as the fund remains in the hands of the owner of the building, and that, if it were otherwise, appellants, having failed to acquire a right to the fund under the provisions of the Code relating to mechanics' liens, cannot complain.

As to appellants' contention that they should have been awarded the remainder of the fund (said to amount to $221.69), we think it should be sustained; not, however, upon the ground that the right to it was acquired by the garnishment, but because the board voluntarily paid the money into court, and required appellants to interplead concerning it. They already had their judgments against Blake, who was a party to the suit, and who made no objection to such application of the fund, and he was the only party who could object. The money must be paid either to Blake or the appellants, and we think Blake's failure to contest the right of appellants justifies a judgment in favor of the latter for the remainder of the fund. The judgment appealed from should therefore be modified so as to award the remainder of the fund in the hands of the court to appellants, but without costs, and, as modified, that the judgment be affirmed; appellants to pay the costs of this appeal.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is modified so as to direct the payment of any balance that may remain of the funds in the hands of the court to appellants according to their several rights, but without costs; and, as modified, that the judgment be affirmed, at the cost of appellants.

105 Cal. 36

PEOPLE v. EPPINGER. (No. 21,099.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—FORGERY—SIGNING FICTITIOUS NAME—INFORMATION—EVIDENCE.

1. Where an information alleges the specific acts constituting an offense under Pen. Code, § 476, imposing a penalty on every person who makes, with intent to defraud, a fictitious bill, note, or check purporting to be the act of a person who has no existence, the mere fact that the words "forge" and "forgery" are used in the information will not make the charge one under section 470, defining "forgery."

2. An information, under Pen. Code, § 476, imposing a penalty on one who makes, with intent to defraud, a fictitious bill, note, or check purporting to be the bill, note, or check of some nonexistent bank, corporation, partnership, or individual, knowing the writing to be fictitious, which charges that the instrument purported to be signed by H. & Co., whereas there was no such "individual" in existence, is defective, because it does not appear that the name signed is that of an individual, and there is no allegation that it purported to be that of an individual.

3. On a trial for making a fictitious instrument in writing, under Pen. Code, § 476, a city directory may be admitted to show that there was no person in the city of the name signed to the instrument.

4. On such a trial, evidence of a police officer that he unsuccessfully made inquiries for a person bearing the name signed is competent.

5. Evidence of the teller of a bank on which a check was drawn that no person of the name signed thereto had an account with the bank is prima facie evidence that the check was fictitious.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

W. L. Eppinger was convicted of making a fictitious check, and appeals. Reversed.

Clement, Cannon, Kline & Stradley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. An information was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the defendant, charging him with "forgery, committed as follows: The said W. L. Eppinger, on the 13th day of November, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-three, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, with intent to defraud, did make and forge a certain fictitious instrument in writing for the payment of money, purporting to be signed by M. Howell & Co., and which said instrument in writing was and is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'San Francisco, Nov. 13, 1893. No. 48 Clearing House, No. 2. The Bank of British Columbia, San Francisco, Cal.: Pay to W. L. Eppinger or bearer $36.00. Thirty-six ¹⁰⁰/₁₀₀ dollars. M. Howell & Co.' And on the back thereof was indorsed the name 'W. L. Eppinger,'—whereas, in truth and in fact there was no such individual as M. Howell & Co. in existence, as he, the said W. L. Eppinger, then and there well knew, and that the said instrument in writing was fictitious. * * * And upon the trial thereof he was convicted and sentenced to the state prison for the term of 14 years.

Section 476 of the Penal Code of this state makes special provision for the offense of making or passing a fictitious instrument in writing, and a distinction is thus made between the forgery of a check upon an existing person and the making and passing of a fictitious instrument purporting to be the check of a person who has no existence. In People v. Elliott, 90 Cal. 586, 27 Pac. 433, it was held that section 470 of the Penal Code does not include the matters contained in section 476, and that the act of making or passing a fictitious check can only be prosecuted when brought within the requirements and conditions of the latter section. As the specific acts constituting the offense with which the defendant is charged are set forth in the information with sufficient clearness to show that the prosecution is under this section, the additional designation of the offense as "forgery" is immaterial. Forgery is a statutory offense, and the charge against the accused must be found within the terms of the statute. While, by the criminal law of England, the making of a fictitious check would be punishable as a forgery, the provisions of section 476 of the Penal Code show that it was the intention of the legislature of this state to render the making or passing of a fictitious instrument a distinct offense, with a designated punishment, and the prosecution in the present case is accordingly had under that section.

An indictment or information must contain matter which shows on its face that a crime has been committed by the accused. If the matters charged in the indictment or information are as consistent with the innocence of the accused as with his guilt, the presumption of his innocence will overcome the accusation of guilt, and the accused is not to be subjected to a trial of the charge. The essence of the offense created by the provisions of section 476 is the making, with an intent to defraud another, of an obligation of some "bank, corporation, co-partnership or individual," when in fact there is no such obligor in existence; but the mere charge of making and passing a check with the averment that there is no "corporation" in existence of the name by which the check purports to have been signed does not state an offense, within the provisions of this section, unless it is also averred that the name signed to the check purported to be the name of a corporation. If the name signed to the check is as apparently that of a corporation as of a partnership, it is necessary to allege which of the two it purports to be, and that the one so alleged has no existence; and an information equally fails to state an offense if it avers that there is no "individual" of the name signed to the check, unless the name by which the check purports to be signed is apparently that of an individual, or it is alleged that such name purports to be that of an individual. The allegation that the check was fictitious adds nothing to the statement of the crime unless the statutory particulars in which it is fictitious are also alleged. The statute designates four classes of obligors whose signature may be attached to a fictitious instrument, and, unless the signature purports to be that of one of these classes, it is not within the provisions of the statute. Moreover, the defendant has the right to be informed which of these classes of obligors is claimed to have been assumed by him. The information in the present case does not aver that the name of "M. Howell & Co.," signed to the instrument, purports to be that of an individual; and, as such signature is not presumptively or in legal contemplation that of an individual, the subsequent averment that there is no such "individual" as M. Howell & Co. does not charge an offense, within the terms of section 476. M. Howell & Co. may be the name of either a partnership or a corporation, or it may be the name under which an individual does the business of a bank; and, for the purpose of charging an offense against the accused, the information would have been equally defective if it had alleged that there was no partnership in existence by that name, and had not also alleged that there was no corporation in existence by that name. If it be assumed that the aver-ment in the information that there is no such individual in existence as M. Howell & Co. sufficiently alleges the fictitious character of the instrument, there was no evidence in support of this averment, the only evidence of the fictitious character being that there was no such "firm" in existence. There was no evidence offered tending to show that there was no corporation or partnership by that name, or that M. Howell & Co. was in any other respect a fictitious name, or that there was no individual doing business by that name. But, conceding that in common parlance the term "firm" is equivalent to "partnership," if that was the fictitious character of the instrument which the defendant was to be tried for making and passing, it should have been so charged in the information. The charge in the information would have been as well sustained by proof that there was no corporation by that name as by proof that there was no firm by that name. In either case the actual charge which is made in the information would not be sustained by the proofs.

The city directory, showing therefrom that this name did not appear therein, was competent for the purpose of proving that there was no such firm as M. Howell & Co. (State v. Hahn, 38 La. Ann. 169); and it was also competent to prove by the police officer that he had made inquiries for such a firm without success (People v. Sharp, 53 Mich. 523, 19 N. W. 168). The character of the directory and the extent of the inquiries might affect the weight, but not the competency, of the evidence. The testimony of the teller in the bank on which the check was drawn, that no firm by the name of M. Howell & Co. kept or had any account in his books, was prima facie evidence of the fictitious character of the check. Rex v. Backler, 5 Car. & P. 118; Rex v. Brannan, 6 Car. & P. 326; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 109.

The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded to the superior court.

GREEN v. BERGE et al. (No. 15,545.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)

ADJOINING OWNERS—RIGHT OF LATERAL SUPPORT —LIABILITY FOR WITHDRAWAL—OWNERS AND CONTRACTORS.

1. Plaintiff had judgment against one of two defendants, and appealed from a judgment for costs in favor of the other. Held, that respondent's codefendant was not an adverse party, on whom notice of the appeal must be served, since his interest was not in conflict with a reversal of the judgment from which the appeal was taken.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 832, making it unlawful for the owner of land to remove the lateral support of adjoining land without taking reasonable precautions to sustain it, such owner cannot escape liability for a failure to take such precautions after excavating on his own land by showing that the work was done by a contractor.

3. Where the owner of land hires a contractor to excavate therein, and no precaution for the lateral support of adjoining land is taken, as required by Civ. Code, § 832, both owner and contractor are liable to the adjoining owner for a subsequent falling of his land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Annie Green against Peter A. Berge and Albert E. Buckman. Plaintiff had judgment against defendant Berge, and defendant Buckman had judgment against plaintiff for costs, and plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Alexander D. Keyes, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from a portion of the judgment upon the judgment roll. The action was brought to recover damages for excavating upon a lot adjoining plaintiff's lot, so negligently that the ground constituting a portion of plaintiff's lot fell into the excavation of its own weight. Berge was the owner of the lot upon which the excavating was done, and Buckman performed the work under a contract. The case was tried without a jury, and, among other facts, the court found that on the 14th of May, 1891, Berge entered into a contract with Buckman, in writing, whereby, for a stipulated price, Buckman agreed to grade his lot; that in the contract nothing was said in regard to the duty of supporting the bank towards plaintiff's lot; that Buckman performed the work to the satisfaction of Berge, and in all respects in a careful, skillful, and workmanlike manner; that the work was completed on the 14th day of August, 1891, and on that day was accepted by Berge, who then gave Buckman a writing in which he stated that the work was done to his satisfaction; that Berge did not, after the completion of the work, provide for any lateral support to plaintiff's land, which, by the excavation, had been deprived of its natural support; that in the month of December a great part of the earth of plaintiff's lot, solely by its own weight, and by reason of its said lack of lateral support, gave way, and fell into the excavation, to the injury of plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. Thereupon the court gave judgment in favor plaintiff against Berge for $1,000, but also ordered judgment in favor of Buckman against plaintiff for his costs. Plaintiff appeals from that part of the judgment which is in favor of Buckman, and now contends that, upon the findings, she is entitled to a joint judgment against both defendants for the amount of damage found by the court.

1. Respondent makes a preliminary objection to the jurisdiction of this court to entertain the appeal, on the ground that the notice of appeal was not served on the codefendant of appellant. "An appeal is taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment or order appealed from is entered a notice stating the appeal from the same, or some specific part thereof, and serving a similar notice on the adverse party or his attorney." Is appellant's codefendant an adverse party? The appeal cannot result in a modification of the judgment against him. If the appeal be successful, the only possible result would be either that a new trial would be awarded as to the appellant, or a joint judgment would be entered against both defendants in lieu of the present judgment against Berge. This would in no way affect the liability of Berge upon the judgment, though it might give him the advantage of a codefendant. This is not an adverse interest. This question was decided in Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637, where it was said, quoting from Thompson v. Ellsworth, 1 Barb. Ch. 627: "The adverse party * * * means the party whose interest in relation to the subject of appeals is in conflict with the reversal of the order or decree appealed from, or the modification sought for by the appeal." This case has been often referred to with approbation since, and, indeed, it would be difficult to reach any other conclusion.

2. It is contended by the respondent—and this appears to be the view taken by the lower court—that the duty of sustaining the land of the adjoining owner rested upon the lot owner who caused the natural support of the land to be removed; that Buckman had a right to presume that Berge would perform his duty. He undertook to do a part of the work only, and there was nothing unlawful in what he did. If there was anything unlawful, it was on the part of the lot owner who did the excavating, but did not take measures to support the adjoining land. The land did not cave in until the work had been completed and accepted. The lot owner could then have added the support, and Buckman had a right to presume he would do so. It was found that the work was done in a careful manner, and that there was nothing in the mode of doing the work which increased the liability of the land to slide into the excavation. This view seems plausible, but, stated in another way, it does not have that appearance. Buckman removed the natural support of the soil. This support was an incident to plaintiff's ownership. It was not lawful to do this except by the owner of adjoining land, nor then except by taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land. Civ. Code, § 832. No such precautions were taken, and the work was therefore unlawful, and caused the injury. The authorities sustain this view. In Dalton v. Angus, L. R. 6 App. Cas. 740, the lord chancellor said: "The action was brought by reason of the falling of the plaintiff's house through the excavation of the adjoining land of the commissioners in the course of certain work executed for them by the appellant, Dalton, under a contract, and for Dalton by subcontractors. The commissioners disputed their liability for the acts of Dalton, and Dalton disputed his liability for the acts of his subcontractors. The same point arose under very similar circumstances in Bower v. Peate, 1 Q. B. Div. 321, and was decided adversely to the contention of appellants. It follows from that decision (as to the correctness of which I agree with both the courts below) that, if the plaintiffs are entitled to recover at all, they are entitled to recover against both the commissioners and Dalton." In Aston v. Nolan, 63 Cal. 269, the work of excavating was done under a contract similar to the contract in this case; that is, it was a contract for excavating, which contained no provisions in regard to supporting the land of the adjoining lot. It was held that the contractor was liable, and that, since the contract implied that the work should be done in a lawful manner,—that is, in taking reasonable care to support the earth of the adjoining lot,—the owner of the lot was not liable. Some would be disposed to question that decision so far as it holds that the lot owner could thus relieve himself from the duty he owed to his coterminous owner. That point, however, is not involved here. The case is authority for the proposition that the contractor is responsible. Independently of the statute, the adjoining lot owner who caused the excavation to be made would be responsible for any damage which might result, irrespective of the question of negligence in making the excavation. Gilmore v. Driscoll, 122 Mass. 199; Foley v. Wyeth, 2 Allen, 131; Carlin v. Chappel, 101 Pa. St. 348; Richardson v. Railroad Co., 25 Vt. 465. Here the only neglect necessary to give a cause of action is the neglect to furnish the support required by the statute (Aston v. Nolan, supra; Conboy v. Dickinson, 92 Cal. 600, 28 Pac. 809); and, of course, to make the excavation otherwise must be negligence. A landowner has an interest in adjoining land for the lateral support of his soil. This is a limitation upon the rights of landowners. Whoever deprives him of this support for his land, otherwise than as the statute has prescribed, performs an unlawful act. The general rule is that all who unite in such acts are wrongdoers, and are responsible in damages. Respondent knew, or should have known, that to make the excavation without supplying the support was unlawful. Having participated in it, he cannot avoid responsibility by pleading that he did the work under a contract. Except the case of Aston v. Nolan, supra, all the authorities I have been able to find hold that the landowner who causes such an excavation to be made cannot relieve himself of responsibility by any contract he could make. Cooley, in his work on Torts, speaking of the exceptions to the rule that the master is not liable for the negligence of an independent contractor, or the servants of such contractor, says: "He must not contract for that the necessary or probable effect of which would be to injure others, and he cannot by any contract relieve himself of duties, resting upon him as owner of real estate, not to do or suffer to be done upon it that which will constitute a nuisance, and therefore an invasion of the rights of others." In a note to this he cites the case of such an excavation as an instance. But, admitting that Aston v. Nolan goes too far, I do not see how that will relieve Buckman. It makes it a case where both are wrongdoers, and both responsible. I think the judgment should be modified so as to make it a joint judgment against both defendants.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is modified so as to make it a joint judgment against both defendants.

LICHTENBERG v. McGLYNN et al. (No. 15,783.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1894.)
DECEDENT'S ESTATE—SUIT ON CLAIM—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

1. The holder of a claim against a decedent's estate can recover only the amount for which the claim was presented, and rejected by the executors or by the judge of the superior court.

2. Evidence of admissions by deceased that in a settlement with one who owned property jointly with him he had allowed such person a certain sum to be paid plaintiff for services rendered by him in trying to effect a sale of the property, is insufficient to establish the value of services rendered by plaintiff for decedent himself.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by William Lichtenberg against McGlynn and others, as executors of the estate of James M. Donahue, deceased, to recover for services rendered decedent. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff the executors appeal. Reversed.

Stanly, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley and Chas. F. Hanlon, for appellants. Lindley & Erckhoff, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendants are the executors of the last will and testament of James M. Donahue, deceased, and, after letters testamentary had been issued to them, the plaintiff presented to them a claim against the estate of their testator, which they rejected, and thereupon he began this action for the purpose of having the validity of his claim established. The claim was properly verified March 13, 1891, as follows: "Estate of James M. Donahue, deceased, to Wm. Lichtenberg, Dr. Nov. 20, 1890. To services rendered by said William Lichten-berg for said deceased, at his special instance, within two years next preceding his death, in and about effecting loans and sales for account of said deceased, $15,000." In his complaint he alleges "that within two years before his death said James M. Donahue became justly indebted to plaintiff in the sum of fifteen thousand dollars for certain work, labor, and services rendered and performed by plaintiff for defendant, and at his special instance and request, during said period of time"; and the court made a finding of fact in the terms of this allegation, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the court, and upon its denial have appealed to this court.

The holder of a claim against the estate of a deceased person can bring an action therefor against the executors only after it has been first presented to such executors. Code Civ. Proc. § 1500. If his claim is rejected, either by them or by the judge of the superior court, he must bring a suit for the purpose of establishing its validity against the estate. In such action he can recover only upon the claim which has been so presented and rejected, and is not entitled in that action to recover against the executors for any other cause of action. As the plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the claim which he presented to the defendants was "for the services so as aforesaid rendered and performed by him," and the court so finds, we must assume that its findings were based upon evidence solely in support of the services named in the claim which was presented. We are of the opinion, however, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain these findings of the court. In order to sustain his claim it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that he had rendered services for the deceased within two years prior to his death; that these services had been rendered at the special instance of the deceased; that they were of the value of $15,000, or that they were rendered under an agreement, either express or implied, that he should be paid $15,000 for them. It may be that the failure to make greater proof results, as suggested by plaintiff's counsel, from the statutory inability of the plaintiff to testify in his own behalf; but this does not relieve him from the necessity of producing sufficient evidence to establish his cause of action. His incompetency to testify may be his misfortune, but the defendants' obligation is not thereby varied, and they are entitled to demand such proof before they can be called upon to pay to the plaintiff the money which is in their hands as trustees for the beneficiaries of their testator. The record fails to show that the plaintiff at any time within two years prior to the death of Donahue rendered any services to him, or for his benefit. The evidence tending to show any request for services from the plaintiff to Donahue is very meager, and fails to establish any agreement between them for services to be rendered. It appears that in May, 1888, Donahue was desirous of either selling or bonding the San Francisco & North Pacific Railroad, in which he was heavily interested, and that he proposed to the plaintiff to go to Europe with him for that purpose. The plaintiff expressed his disinclination to accept this proposition when it was made to him, but desired to take the matter under consideration. Donahue was about to go to Los Angeles, and on the day that he left for that place sought a further interview with plaintiff, but failed to obtain it; and it does not appear that the plaintiff ever accepted Donahue's proposition, or that Donahue from that time had any interview or correspondence with him. Prior to going to Los Angeles, Donahue stated to Justin P. Moore the nature of the arrangement that he desired to effect with the plaintiff, viz. that the plaintiff should accompany him to New York, and that they should go from New York together to Paris, and endeavor to raise the money, either by placing bonds or by selling his entire interest in the road; and after he reached Los Angeles he telegraphed Moore that he would go directly from that place to New York, and for the plaintiff to meet him in the latter city. There is no evidence, however, that Moore saw the plaintiff at any time after Donahue left, or that he at any time communicated to him Donahue's wishes, or any proposition on his behalf, or had any interview with him in reference thereto. The plaintiff did not leave California for New York until July, and did not meet Donahue in New York, or elsewhere. Donahue went east direct from Los Angeles in May, and while in New York effected a sale of his interest in the road, and returned to San Francisco in October of the same year. While he was in New York he made inquiries for the plaintiff, and found that he had gone to Europe at the suggestion of Von Shroeder, where he remained until August, 1889. Von Shroeder was the husband of Donahue's sister, who was also interested in the road, and accompanied the plaintiff to New York, defraying his expenses thither. The plaintiff did not accomplish anything for Donahue either in New York or in Paris, and there is no evidence that he attempted in either place to render him any services. There is some evidence that in the year 1887 Donahue requested the plaintiff to negotiate a loan of $50,000 for him, but it is not shown whether the plaintiff did anything thereunder, and any claim for services rendered under this request was barred by the statute of limitations prior to the death of Donahue.

It is not claimed that there was any agreement by Donahue for the amount of compensation to the plaintiff, and the value of the services rendered by him was sought to be shown by certain admissions of Donahue. These admissions consisted of statements by him that in a settlement with Von Shroeder he had allowed Von Shroeder $15,000, to be paid by him to the plaintiff for the services which he had rendered in his efforts to secure the money in Europe; and that Donahue had also said that if Von Shroeder did not pay the commission he would himself pay it. This evidence is, however, insufficient to establish the value of any services rendered for Donahue. Von Shroeder and Donahue were both interested in the sale of the road, and the plaintiff had gone to New York with Von Shroeder, and at his request had gone from there to Europe. Donahue had himself effected the sale in New York for the benefit of both Von Shroeder and himself, and his statement that in a settlement with Von Shroeder he had allowed that sum of money to be paid to the plaintiff fails to establish that that was the value of any services rendered by the plaintiff to Donahue. If the plaintiff had not rendered any services to Donahue, Donahue's admission of their value would not be binding upon him or upon his executors. If he had rendered services for Von Shroeder and Donahue at the instance of Von Shroeder, the foregoing statements of Donahue would not establish the value of any services rendered for Donahue individually; and, if the obligation to pay the plaintiff was that of Von Shroeder, Donahue's verbal agreement to pay it would be invalid. The judgment and order are reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1894.)

WILL—WHAT CONSTITUTES—TWO INSTRUMENTS CONSTRUED AS ONE—FINDINGS.

1. The fact that two instruments executed on the same day by deceased, for the purpose of disposing of her property, without anything to show which was executed first, differ in respect to the persons to receive the property on the possible death without issue of the persons who were given a life estate therein, does not show such a conflict as to prevent the probate of either, but in such case both instruments should be probated together as a will.

2. An instrument reciting that the writer writes "this letter" to her children, that they may know what distribution to make of her property on her death, and stating that "I wish it plainly understood that I desire" all my property to be divided in a certain manner, is a valid will.

Wilson & Wilson and Garber, Boalt & Bishop (Hall & Earl, of counsel), for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Anna L. Murphy, deceased, died at London, England, on March 30, 1891. She was a widow at the time of her death, and her heirs at law were her three sons, Eugene K. L. Murphy, Samuel J. Murphy, and Daniel T. Murphy; her married daughter, Anna L. Wolseley; and her three unmarried daughters, Mary Helen Murphy, Frances Josephine Murphy, and Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy,—all of legal age. She left property in Alameda county, Cal. On June 20, 1891, Victor H. Metcalf filed a petition in the superior court of said county, in which he set forth that said deceased left two certain written instruments, each dated May 13, 1890, which he alleged to be her will, and prayed that they be admitted to probate as such will. He also averred that the heirs competent to administer had requested in writing that he be appointed administrator of the estate of the deceased, and prayed that he be so appointed. Such proceedings were thereafter had that on July 20, 1891, said two instruments were regularly admitted to probate by said court as constituting the last will of said deceased, and said Metcalf was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and duly qualified as such. Afterwards, on July 19, 1892, within the year prescribed by the Code, the said Anna T. Wolseley, Samuel J. Murphy, and Daniel T. Murphy filed in said court a petition to revoke the said probate of said will. The grounds on which the petition was based were that said two instruments "do not, nor does either of them, constitute the last will and testament of said Anna L. Murphy"; that they were never signed, executed, declared, etc., by the deceased as her will, or attested as required by law; that they were not intended by her as her will, or regarded by her as a completed will; and that they were only a memorandum to be submitted to her attorney for advice, from which a will was to be made in the future. Afterwards contestants filed an amended petition in which they alleged the additional grounds that said instruments were procured by fraud and undue influence, and set up at length and in detail the facts that said deceased was of unsound mind, and was fraudulently procured to make said instruments by the controlling and undue influence of certain of said unmarried daughters, who made false representations to her about the conduct of the contestants, etc. Issues of fact were raised by answers to these petitions, and the whole case was tried by the court without a jury. After the evidence had all been taken, the contestants again made an amendment to their petition, by averring that it could not be shown which of said instruments was, in point of time, last executed, and "that said two documents are wholly inconsistent and irreconcilable, each with the other, and cannot and do not together constitute a last will." This last amendment was made more than two years after the probate of said instruments as the last will of the deceased. The court made findings in which it found all the material issues of fact against contestants, and in favor of the proponents of the will. That is, the court found that on May 13, 1890, the deceased duly executed each of said instruments as a holographic will; "that both of said documents were not, nor was either of them, simply or only a memorandum to be submitted to an attorney," etc., "but that each of said instruments was at the time it was executed as aforesaid intended to be and was the will of said deceased"; that at the time of their execution, "and continuously thereafter, until the time of her death, the said Anna L. Murphy was of sound and disposing mind and memory, free from duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence of every character, and she was fully competent to make a last will and testament; and the said documents were not made and executed under any fraud, imposition, or undue influence of her daughters Mary Helen Murphy and Frances Murphy, or either of them, or of any person whatever, but were made and executed as the free and voluntary and uninfluenced act and deed of said Anna L. Murphy." The court, however, decided the case in favor of contestants and revoked the probate, on the ground stated in the aforesaid last amendment of contestants, viz. that the said two instruments are inconsistent and irreconcilable. The court found, under the heading of "Facts," "that said two documents are wholly inconsistent and irreconcilable, each with the other, and it cannot be shown from the evidence which, in fact, of said two documents, was executed last, and that no act of said deceased subsequent to the execution of said documents, or either of them, has explained them"; and that "it is impossible to ascertain the relative chronological position of said two conflicting documents." And under "Conclusions of Law" the court found that, "said two documents being wholly inconsistent and irreconcilable each with the other, neither one nor both has been proved to be the will of the deceased; that by reason of the foregoing said Anna L. Murphy died intestate; that the probate of said instruments heretofore granted herein must be annulled and revoked." Judgment was accordingly rendered, revoking the probate, and proponents appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll.

As the court finds that the two instruments were executed on the same day, and that there is no evidence to show which was, on said day, executed last, it is evident that the questions presented to this court are to be determined upon consideration of the said instruments themselves. Counsel for both sides have argued the case with great industry and ability; and in their briefs they have presented many authorities, both English and American, and have quoted copiously therefrom. We do not deem it necessary, however, to notice here many of the cases cited. They will no doubt appear in the official report of the case. We will give here merely the results of a consideration of the authorities, and of the principles which we think applicable.

One of said instruments is as follows: "London, England, May 13, 1890. Being in perfect health and in full possession of all my faculties, yet knowing the uncertainty of life, I write this letter to my children, that they may know what to make distribution of all my property when I die. Therefore I wish it plainly understood that I desire all of which I am possessed at my death, whether real estate or personal property, of whatever description, to be equally divided between my three daughters, Mary Helen Murphy, Frances Josephine Murphy, Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy. Should either of these three daughters die, I wish her portion to be divided between the two surviving daughters. In case these daughters they all die without children—I wish the children of my eldest son, Eugene Kelly Murphy, the entire property they may leave to inherit share and share alike—Eugene Besson Murphy, Mabel Murphy, Charles Murphy. Anna L. Murphy, 12 Charles street, Berkeley square. May 13, 1890, London, England." The following is the other instrument: "May 13, 1890, London, England. Being in perfect health and in full possession of all my faculties, yet knowing the uncertainty of life, I write this letter to my children, that they may know what distribution I wish made of all the property of which I may be possessed when I die. Therefore I wish it plainly understood that I desire all the property that I possess at my death, either real estate or personal property, jewels, pictures, plate, glass, furniture, carriages, my gas shares, all and whatever description, everything that I possess, to be divided equally between my three daughters, Mary Ellen Murphy, Frances Josephine Murphy, Mary Margaret Isabella Murphy. Should either of these three daughters die, I wish her portion to be divided between the two surviving daughters. In case either or all of these daughters die without children, I wish the children of my eldest son, Eugene Kelly Murphy, to inherit from my portion that I leave the three daughters whatever they may leave when they die. I wish these children of my eldest son, Eugene, to have share and share alike of whatever my three daughters may leave of what I have given them, both personal and real estate. Anna L. Murphy, 12 Charles street, Berkeley square. May 13, 1890, London."

Upon first glance, these two instruments seem to be substantially the same. Upon closer inspection, however, there is to be seen the shadow of a possibility that at some uncertain future period of time, if some events should happen, which may never happen at all, there might be some difficulty in determining where, under these instruments, certain contingent remainders would vest. It is contended that under one of the instruments, upon the death without issue of the daughters named in the instruments, what they "may leave" of the property would go to the three named children of Eugene Kelly Murphy,—Eugene Besson, Mabel, and Charles,—while under the other it would go to all of the children of Eugene Kelly, including any others who might be thereafter born, and living when the remainders should take effect in possession. (Although the question is perhaps not affected by it, still it appears that Eugene Kelly Murphy has since died, and therefore can have no other children; so, as a matter of fact, the question can actually never arise.) The contention of respondents is that because, if the said daughters should die childless, and if there should be children of Eugene Kelly other than the three named, and if there should be a contention between said children as to said remainders, a court could not determine in whom said remainders vested, therefore the whole will is to be held void, and the three daughters are to lose the properties and estates which by the will are devised to them. There is also another inconsistency contended for by respondents, in this: that under one of the instruments there is a conditional limitation in favor of Eugene's children upon the death childless of either of the three daughters, while under the other instrument the limitation is dependent upon the death of all the daughters without children. These are the two main grounds of alleged inconsistencies in the two instruments, although there is something said about differences in cross limitations to the survivors of the three daughters, etc.

We are satisfied that the contention of respondents as to the total invalidity of the two instruments as a will cannot be successfully maintained, and that upon the findings the petition for the revocation of the probate should have been denied. It is not necessary for us to determine here—what a court may never be called upon to determine—whether or not there are any such inconsistencies in the two instruments as those contended for by respondents. They refer only to future contingencies which may never happen, and in no way affect the question whether or not the said two instruments constitute a will, entitled as such to be probated, and the latter question is the only one here involved. When a proponent presents to a probate court one or more instruments claimed by him to constitute the will of a deceased person, and asks to have the same probated as such will, the only question legitimately before the court is whether or not such instrument or instruments constitute the will of such deceased person. In determining that question the court has ordinarily nothing to do with the construction of the proposed will. This court, in Re Cobb, 49 Cal. 600, used this language: "The instrument offered being evidently of a testamentary character, upon application to admit it to probate the inquiry is only as to the mental condition of the testatrix,—whether she was acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence, whether the will was duly executed, and the like. The other questions attempted to be raised by the objections filed in the case concern the construction to be placed upon the will, and cannot be considered until it shall have been admitted to probate." It may be conceded, for the purposes of the case at bar, that under peculiar circumstances a court, in determining whether a certain instrument is entitled to probate, may look somewhat into the body of the instrument; but this exercise of the power of construing is admissible only as necessarily incidental to the determination of the question, Will or no will? For instance, a will is generally defined to be the disposition of property to take effect after the death of the testator; and it has been held in one or two cases that an instrument in the form of a will, and duly executed, which does not dispose of any property, is not a will,—as where the instrument merely expressed a desire that certain heirs should be disinherited. Coffman v. Coffman, 85 Va. 459, 8 S. E. 672. There are decisions contrary to this, and it has been held that an instrument in which an executor is appointed without any disposition of property should be probated as a will. But assuming the rule to be as held in Coffman v. Coffman, supra, we find, upon looking into the instruments before us, that the rule has no application here. There is no lack here of a disposition of property. By the instruments in question, and by each of them, all the property of the testatrix is given to the three daughters in fee, with a possibility of the fee being defeated after their deaths, and upon the happening of remote contingencies. Respondents admit that these instruments give to the three daughters estates for life in all property of the deceased, and this admission is determinative of the case in favor of appellants. Can an estate for life be defeated by an uncertainty as to what may come after the death of the tenant? Counsel say that the testatrix did not intend to give them an estate for life. But she clearly intended to give them an estate greater than an estate for life,—an estate which included an estate for life. If by the language which she used she failed to devise a greater estate, but did devise an estate for life, the latter estate was surely created, and is in all respects a perfect estate. We are not to be considered as holding that only a life estate was created. We are putting the case in a light most favorable to respondents, and, looking at it in that light, we see clearly that the two instruments, taken together, constitute the will of the deceased, and that its probate should not be disturbed. The instruments are of even date, and were executed on the same day, and should be taken together to be the testatrix's will, unless, in the language of the Code, they are "wholly inconsistent." Instead of being wholly inconsistent, they are, in most of their material parts, substantially identical. Those parts of them claimed to be inconsistent relate to questions which may never arise,—to contingencies which may never happen. If such questions should ever arise, courts might find but little difficulty in disposing of them. At all events, they are not here now demanding solution. Devises of large properties and estates should not be defeated by acute speculations about what might possibly occur after the deaths of the devisees.

The following sections of the Civil Code are applicable to the case at bar: Section 1320: "Several testamentary instruments, executed by the same testator, are to be taken and construed together as one instrument." Section 1326: "Of two modes of interpreting a will, that is to be preferred which will prevent a total intestacy." Section 1296: "A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contain an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will; but in other cases the prior will remains effectual so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will."

The foregoing views make it unnecessary to consider appellants' point that the amendment to respondents' petition, upon which the case was decided, was made two years after the probate of the will, and therefore should not have been considered.

Respondents suggest that, as the record contains only the judgment roll, certain findings must be taken as warranted by evidence not before us. But the findings show clearly the theory on which the decision was made, the facts upon which the theory rested, and that there was no evidence to explain those facts. These facts were that the two instruments were executed on the same day, and that there was nothing to show which of the two was executed last. Upon these facts the court held that the instruments were wholly inconsistent with each other, and that, as it cannot be determined which was executed last, therefore neither the two together, nor either one of them, was the will of the deceased. All the other findings upon the subject are mere inferences from the facts above stated. It was therefore wholly unnecessary for appellants to bring up any evidence; their appeal rests upon the facts found.

Respondents have a motion pending to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the notice of appeal was not served upon the administrator of Eugene K. L. Murphy, deceased. The motion must be denied. It is doubtful if he was a person necessary to be served, as it appears that said Eugene was not hostile to appellants, but was in sympathy with them. If, however, it was necessary to serve his representative, we think that the evidence shows such service. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the judgment is reversed, with directions to the superior court to enter judgment against the contestants, and denying the petition for the revocation of the probate of the will.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN FRANCISCO
et al. (No. 15,939.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 13, 1894.)

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REFUSAL TO SIGN—WHEN PROPER.

After verdict against it, defendant gave notice of motion for new trial, and filed a bill of exceptions. It also filed an affidavit that, after deliberating on their verdict, the jury asked for instructions as to whether they could find for plaintiff without interest, and recited what occurred, including the instructions given and the verdict rendered. The motion for a new trial was denied. Held, that the trial judge properly refused to settle another bill of exceptions containing such affidavit, and a statement that it, the judgment roll, the bill of exceptions, and the notice of motion for new trial were presented and used at the hearing of such motion, and that the motion was denied in the absence of its attorneys.

Department 1.

Petition by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for a writ of mandamus to compel John Hunt, judge of the superior court of San Francisco, to settle a bill of exceptions. Denied.

Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto, for petitioner.
J. C. Bates, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Motion to compel the respondent to settle a bill of exceptions. After a verdict had been rendered against the petitioner, it gave notice of its intention to move for a new trial, and caused to be settled and filed with the clerk a bill of exceptions which it had prepared, and also filed an affidavit made in its behalf, stating "that after the court had instructed the jury, and the jury had retired to deliberate upon their verdict, the said jury returned into court, when the following occurred: The foreman of the jury, addressing the court, said: 'The jury would like to be instructed, if they find for the plaintiff, they can find without interest or not.' Mr. Bates, counsel for plaintiff, being present, then stated to the court, in the hearing of the jury: 'The plaintiff will be satisfied without interest.' The court then, addressing the jury, said: 'The law entitles the plaintiff to interest at seven per cent. per annum upon any amount that you may award him, if you award him anything since 1879, but he says he is willing to give up interest. Therefore, if you award him a verdict, you need not award interest upon it.' Thereupon the jury again retired, and after deliberation returned with a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, awarding him $1,580.98, without interest." After its motion for a new trial was denied, it presented to the trial judge for settlement another bill of exceptions containing the foregoing affidavit, with the statement that it, together with the judgment roll, the bill of exceptions, and notice of intention to move for a new trial, had been presented and used at the hearing, and that the motion had been denied in the absence of its attorneys. The judge declined to settle the proposed bill of exceptions, and the present application is brought to compel him to do so.

The matters set forth in the affidavit were instructions of the court to the jury, and, if deemed by the defendant to be erroneous, constituted "error at law occurring at the trial," and should have been excepted to and embodied in the bill of exceptions provided for in section 650, Code Civ. Proc. Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a new trial, the notice of intention to move for a new trial is not a part of the record on appeal, and need not be included in a bill of exceptions, unless the opposite party insists that it is insufficient. Pico v. Cohn, 78 Cal. 386, 20 Pac. 706. As an appeal may be taken from the order denying a new trial, it is deemed to have been excepted to, and need not be embodied in a bill of exceptions. As reference may be made on the hearing of the motion for a new trial to the pleadings in the case (Code Civ. Proc. § 600), for the purpose of ascertaining the issues and determining the correctness of the court's rulings (Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 586, 36 Pac. 936), it will be presumed that such reference was made; and, as the judgment roll is a part of the record to be used on appeal from the order denying the new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 661), the fact that such reference was made need not be presented by a bill of exceptions. The judge, therefore, correctly declined to settle the proposed bill. The motion is denied.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA LUMBER CO.
v. McDOWELL, Sheriff. (No. 19,468.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1894.)

REDEMPTION FROM EXECUTION SALE—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. The right of a judgment debtor to redeem land sold under the judgment is not affected by the fact that he did not have title to the land, nor that he had conveyed part of it after the judgment was entered.

2. One who, after land is sold under judgment, receives from the judgment debtor a conveyance of all his interest in the land, "for the purpose of having the certificate of redemption of said property from said sale issued in his name," is a "successor in interest," within Code Civ. Proc. § 701, allowing redemption by such successor, though after the entry of the judgment, and before the sale, the judgment debtor had conveyed part of the land to another person, and had never had title to the rest of the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; George Puterbaugh, Judge.

Mandamus by Southern California Lumber Company to compel S. A. McDowell, sheriff of San Diego county, to execute to him a deed of land sold under execution. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. J. Stevens, for appellant. Harry L. Titus, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Proceeding by writ of mandate against the defendant in his official character as sheriff of the county of San Diego, to compel him to execute to plaintiff a deed of certain real property, to wit, block 71 of Ocean Beach, in the city of San Diego, with the building thereon, said block consisting of 54 lots, numbered serially from Nos. 1 to 54, inclusive. It appears that on December 1, 1888, the plaintiff obtained a decree of the superior court against the Ocean Beach Hotel Company, a corporation, foreclosing a lien upon said block and appurtenances for the sum of $297.10 and costs, amounting to about $75. After the entry of this decree, to wit, on March 5, 1889, the Ocean Beach Hotel Company, by a grant deed, conveyed lots numbered 1 to 19, inclusive, of said block to the San Diego Eastern & Terminal Railway Company, a corporation. Afterwards, on February 24, 1890, in execution of said decree of foreclosure, the defendant, as sheriff of said county, officially sold the whole of said block to plaintiff in one parcel for the sum of $451.40, subject to redemption, and delivered to plaintiff a certificate of such sale in due form. Before the expiration of the period for redemption, to wit, August 25, 1890, the Ocean Beach Hotel Company executed to E. J. Swayne "a conveyance of all its interest in and to the property described in said petition (the whole of block No. 71), for the purpose of having the certificate of redemption of said property from said sale issued in his name." On August 30, 1890, Swayne, as successor in interest to the Ocean Beach Hotel Company, paid to defendant $730.86 for the purpose of redeeming the whole of block No. 71, and defendant accepted the same for that purpose, and issued to Swayne a certificate of redemption. It further appears, however, that the Ocean Beach Hotel Company never owned more than the first 19 lots of the series of 54 of which the block is composed, which 19 lots it purchased from Carlson and Higgins on December 1, 1888, and sold as aforesaid to the San Diego Eastern & Terminal Railway Company. The plaintiff refused to accept the redemption money deposited with the sheriff by Swayne, on the ground that Swayne was not the successor in interest of the Ocean Beach Hotel Company, and therefore not entitled to redeem. But the court found that Swayne was successor in interest of the hotel company, and that as such he had made a valid redemption, and thereupon dismissed the proceeding.

Counsel for appellant contends that Swayne was not successor in interest of the hotel company in the sense of section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that property sold subject to redemption may be redeemed "by the judgment debtor, or his successor in interest in the whole or any part of the property." As affecting the right of the hotel company (the judgment debtor) to redeem the whole block, the admitted fact that the hotel company had never obtained title to more than 19 of the 54 lots of which block 71 is composed, is immaterial. The plaintiff had obtained a decree of the superior court against the hotel company ordering the whole block to be sold by the sheriff; had purchased the whole block at the sheriff's sale under that order, as the property of the hotel company, in satisfaction of its alleged lien thereon; and by virtue of such purchase now, by this suit, demands of the sheriff a deed of the whole block. Under this state of facts, the plaintiff will not be heard to object to the redemption on the ground that the hotel company never owned the whole block (Lorenzana v. Camarillo, 45 Cal. 125); nor is it a valid objection to a redemption of the whole block by the judgment debtor (hotel company) that, before such redemption, it had sold a part (19 lots) of the block to the San Diego Eastern & Terminal Railway Company (Yoakum v. Bower, 51 Cal. 539; Eldridge v. Wright, 55 Cal. 531). Therefore, conceding, as we must, that the hotel company had a sufficient interest in the property to entitle it to redeem the whole block, notwithstanding its conveyance of the 19 lots to the San Diego Eastern & Terminal Railway Company, it must follow that it (the judgment debtor) could convey or assign such interest to Swayne, "for the purpose of having the certificate of redemption of said property from said sale issued in his name," as expressed in the deed to Swayne, and thereby authorize and entitle Swayne to make the redemption in his own name as he did. I think Swayne was the successor in interest of the judgment debtor in the sense of section 701 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and as such properly redeemed the property; and that the judgment should be affirmed.

Appeal of BUCKLEY. (No. 15,732.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1894.)

EXECUTORS—ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW—PETITION—SETTLEMENT—SUPPLEMENTAL INVENTORY OF PERSONALITY—APPRAISEMENT—WHEN NECESSARY—LIFE TENANT—POSSESSION OF PERSONAL ESTATE—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1466, which confers on the court power to make reasonable allowance out of the estate for the maintenance of the family, the court may make such allowance without first setting apart a homestead, as authorized by section 1465, and determining that it is insufficient for the widow's support.

2. The son of the widow may petition for the allowance to her, though he is also the executor.

3. Where the executor disposes of certain personal property without including it in the inventory, in accordance with the expressed wish of the decedent, and, on final settlement, makes a supplemental inventory of such property, the court may determine its value, and it need not be appraised as other property of the estate.

4. Where testator gives "all" his property to his wife to hold and to "enjoy" for life, and to others the residue "remaining upon the termination of the life estate," the wife is entitled to the possession of the personal estate without security, in the absence of adverse showing by the remainder-men.

5. A decree of distribution directed the personal estate to be delivered to the widow, "provided $100 of said distribution shall have been heretofore received by T., and that $15 has been received by J." Held, that such proviso was improper, since such a decree is intended to be a final, and not a contingent, disposition of the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Joseph P. Jones, Judge.

Distribution of the estate of C. C. Garrity, deceased. From the decree, Elizabeth Buckley appeals. Modified.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for appellant.
John B. Mhoon, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. C. C. Garrity died, testate, June 4, 1890. His will was admitted to probate in the superior court of Contra Costa county, and letters testamentary thereon issued to James Garrity, November 24, 1890; and on January 7, 1891, the executor filed an inventory of the estate, which was appraised at $24,681.36. By his will the testator made certain legacies, amounting to $2,500, and gave to his wife "all and singular my property, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind and character, wheresoever situated, to have, to hold and to enjoy for the term of her natural life only, and not otherwise"; and in a subsequent item gave to three of his children, of whom the appellant is one, "all and singular, the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and property, real, personal, and mixed, of every kind and character, and wheresoever situated, remaining upon the termination of the life estate hereinbefore granted and bequeathed to my said wife." The entire estate was community property, and, after paying the debts and expenses of administration, there remained in the hands of the executor certain real estate, which was appraised in the inventory at $13,040; certain personal property, consisting chiefly of farming implements, appraised at $188; and the sum of $8,068.74 in money, which was on deposit in the bank at the testator's death. January 23, 1892, the executor filed a supplemental inventory, setting forth that he had received from the testator two watches and a gold chain, and had disposed of them in accordance with certain instructions of the testator, given prior to his decease. November 17, 1892, a petition for a family allowance to the widow was filed on her behalf by the executor, which was contested by the appellant; and, after a hearing thereon, the court made an order allowing the sum of $50 per month, amounting to $1,500. This allowance was paid by the executor, and allowed to him in the settlement of his final account. December 3, 1892, the court made a decree of distribution, by which it distributed one-half of the real estate to the widow in fee as the survivor of the community, and the other undivided one-half to her for the term of her natural life, and, after directing the payment of the legacies out of the money in the hands of the executor, distributed to her in her own right, as the survivor of the community, one-half of the balance of said money, and one-half of the other articles of personalty; and the other half of said articles and the remaining sum of money, viz. $1,834.37, were distributed to her, to hold and enjoy during her life, and at her death to the three children. From the orders making the family allowance, settling the final account, and from the decree of distribution, Elizabeth Buckley has appealed.

1. It is claimed by the appellant that the court could not make an order for a family allowance to the widow under section 1466, Code Civ. Proc., unless there had been previously set apart to her the property authorized by section 1465; and it had been determined that the property thus set apart was insufficient for her support; that as the inventory showed that there was property of the estate out of which a homestead might have been set apart to the widow, and as no application had been made therefor, the court had no jurisdiction to make the order of family allowance. The right of the family to an allowance for its support is not, however, contingent upon a previous order setting apart a homestead for its use. Whether a homestead be set apart or not, section 1466 confers upon the court the power, in its discretion, to "make such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family according to their circumstances during the progress of the settlement of the estate." The circumstances and condition of the family, as well as those of the estate, may be such that the court would more wisely exercise its discretion in making a pecuniary allowance for the support of a family out of the estate than in setting apart to it a homestead; and, if the widow is content with such allowance without having a homestead set apart to her, it would seem that the other heirs ought not to complain. A homestead is primarily the place of abode for the family, and it might be that although, if one were set apart, they would thus be furnished with an abiding place, they would not receive a sufficient income for their support, and the expense of maintaining the homestead would be disproportionate to their necessities; while, on the other hand, the widow might be better cared for by receiving an allowance sufficient for her support, and residing elsewhere than upon a portion of the property of the estate. It was not requisite that the widow should herself petition for the allowance. The order could be made upon a petition by any one in her behalf, and the fact that the executor was also her son should not prevent a petition made by him on her behalf from receiving the same consideration by the court as though he had not held that office. The allowance to the executor in the settlement of his account of the amount which he had been directed to pay to the widow as a family allowance is not objected to, except as the allowance itself was objected to. As that allowance is sustained, the credit to the executor of the amount paid under the order was properly allowed by the court.

2. At the hearing, upon the settlement of the final account, the appellant made the objection that the watches and chain mentioned in the supplemental inventory were not accounted for in said account, and thereupon evidence of their value was taken by the court. It is recited in the bill of exceptions that, after hearing this evidence, the court rendered its decision, "charging the executor with fifty dollars as the value of said watches and chain, to which decision contestant then and there excepted." No exception was taken to this decision upon the ground that the value was not correctly found by the court, nor is it urged here that the court erred in this respect; but it is claimed that the watches should have been appraised as other property, and that the court could not, without such appraisal, determine their value. The record is not very clear as to the action of the court in this matter, but we think it sufficiently appears therefrom that the court charged the executor with $115, as the value of these watches and chain. The account, as rendered by him, shows the sum of $10,053.74 in his hands; and, in its order settling the account, the court charges him with $10,168.74 in his hands at the date of the filing; and in connection with the finding of the court that, since the rendition of said account, nothing has been received by the executor, it must be held that $115, the difference between these two sums, is the amount for which the executor was charged as the value of the watches and chain. There was evidence before the court from which it could have found their value; and, in the absence of any assignment of error in this respect, its conclusion must be accepted as correct, whether it be assumed to be $50, as recited in the bill of exceptions, or $115, as appears from a comparison of its order of settlement with the account as rendered. As the executor had disposed of the watches, the court was authorized to take evidence of their value for the purpose of ascertaining the amount with which he should be charged, and was not required to appoint appraisers for that purpose.

3. It is contended by the appellant that the widow was not entitled to the possession of the personal property, in which she was given only a life estate, but that the superior court, instead of distributing the property directly to her during the term of her life, should have directed that it be converted into money, and invested in some securities from which she should be entitled to receive only the income thereof during her lifetime, and at her death the securities should be delivered to the children. In England, and in some jurisdictions within the United States, the administration of an estate is regarded as a continuing trust, and the executor as a trustee for all the parties interested in the estate, for the purpose of carrying into effect the various provisions of the will; and in these jurisdictions the rule prevails that when personal property, consisting of money or securities, is given to one for life, with a remainder to another, the executor, as a trustee for both, shall convert the property into interest-bearing securities, and pay the income thereof to the legatee for life, and, after his death, deliver the securities to the remainder-man. Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137; Howard v. Executors, 16 N. J. Eq. 486; Covenhoven v. Shuler, 2 Paige, 132. At an early day in England it was the rule in chancery that the life tenant, before he could demand the delivery to him of property bequeathed to him for life, should give security to the executor; but as early as the time of Lord Talbot, in 1734, this rule had been modified to such an extent as to require the life tenant merely to deliver to the remainder-man an inventory that the property was held by him for life only. Slanning v. Style, 3 P. Wms. 336. See, also, Foley v. Burnell, 1 Brown, Ch. 279; Wescott v. Cady, 5 Johns. Ch. 349. This rule has been made applicable in this state only to a bequest for life of specific legacies. Civ. Code, § 1365. If the will is silent concerning the disposition of the corpus of the legacy during the continuance of the life estate, the general rule in equity is that the legatee for life is not entitled to demand from the executor the possession of the legacy, unless he gives security to the executor, and that the remainder-man may require that the tenant for life, before receiving the property bequeathed to him, shall give such security; but, in order that the remainder-man may demand that such security be given, he must make it appear that there is some danger that the estate will be impaired or suffer waste if left in the possession of the life tenant. In re Camp, 126 N. Y. 377, 27 N. E. 799; Story, Eq. Jur. § 604; Langworthy v. Chadwick, 13 Conn. 42. The rule is one of equity, established by courts for the protection of the remainder-man, in the absence of any direction in the will; but the rule thus established must yield to the terms of the will, and if it appears, from a proper construction of the will, that it was the intention of the testator that the property should be placed in possession of the life tenant without security, such intention will be carried out. It is to be assumed that the testator intended the life tenant to have the full enjoyment during his lifetime of the property bequeathed to him, and that this enjoyment shall not be impaired, except for the protection of the remainder-man. The testator has the right to make the life tenant the trustee of the property bequeathed, without requiring any security from him; and very slight indications in the will will be construed as showing that the testator intended the life tenant, rather than the executor, to be the trustee, subject, of course, to the general rules applicable to the obligations of a trustee to his cestui que trust. If the testator has not required such security to be given by the life tenant, courts are not authorized to require it, in the absence of any showing of danger or liability of waste; otherwise the will of the testator that the life tenant shall enjoy the property will be frustrated. There is nothing, however, in the rules of procedure in this state, or in the will under consideration, which authorized such a procedure in the distribution of an estate. The administration of an estate in this state is conducted under the direction of the superior court, mainly for the purpose of securing to the creditors payment of their claims; and after this purpose has been accomplished, in the absence of any express provisions in the will, the estate is to be distributed to the beneficiaries under the will in accordance with its terms, and the executor is entitled to be discharged from any further duties. The provisions of the will become merged in the decree of distribution, and the terms of this decree become the measure of the rights of the several beneficiaries. Sitting as a court in probate, the function of the superior court is limited to a judicial determination that the estate of the testator is to be transferred to the beneficiaries as the testator has provided in his will; and the court is not authorized to add to its terms or qualify those provisions. There is no provision in our statutes authorizing the court to direct a conversion of the testator's property, or requiring the legatee for life to give any security before receiving his legacy. If the legatees in remainder deem it necessary that their rights in the property shall be protected or preserved, they must seek such relief from the equity arm of the superior court.

A consideration of the terms of the will before the court leads to the conclusion that it was the intention of the testator that his widow should have the possession of the property bequeathed to her without being required to give any security for its preservation. If he had intended that, upon the death of his widow, his children should receive the entire estate given to her, or that she should receive only the income thereof, it is reasonable to suppose that he would not have qualified the character of the estate which he gave to them; but the language used by him in the bequest to them indicates that such was not his intention. After giving to her for the term of her natural life "all" of his property, of every character, he gives to the three designated children the rest, residue, and remainder of his estate and property remaining upon the termination of the life estate granted to the widow. Instead of giving to them the same property and estate by way of remainder, after the termination of the life estate, he expressly limits the property given to them to the "rest, residue, and remainder" thereof, that may be "remaining" after the termination of the life estate. These terms imply that there was a distinction in his mind between the property given by him to his widow and that which the children would receive at her death, and his use of the word "residue" shows that it was within his contemplation that some of the property received by her might not be in existence at her death to be received by the children. Some effect must be given to these words, and they receive their natural construction by holding that it was his intention that the possession of the property should be delivered to her at the distribution of his estate. This construction also consists with the terms in which the estate was given to her. He had given the property to her "to have, to hold, and to enjoy for the term of her natural life"; and, in the absence of any limiting clause, the use of these words would imply a right to the possession of the property in order that she might "enjoy" it. In Flanagan v. Flanagan, 8 Abb. N. C. 413, the testator, after giving to his widow the use of certain property during her life, disposed of "the portion left" or said property, and it was held that the words "the portion left" implied a right to the possession, and even the disposition, of the property. In Markley's Estate, 132 Pa. St. 352, 19 Atl. 138, the testator gave a life estate in all his property to his widow, and directed that, at her death, the "residue" should go to his children; and the action of the executor in delivering the property to the widow without any security was sustained by the court. In Downing v. Johnson, 5 Cold. 229, it was held that, under a provision in the will giving a life estate to the widow, she was entitled to its possession, and that the testator's disposition of "the balance of my property which may be on hand at the death of my wife" implied a right in the widow to consume the property given to her. In Warren v. Webb, 68 Me. 133, the testator gave a life estate in all his property to his widow, "and after her decease said estate and property, or the residue and remainder thereof, to be legally divided to and among my children." It was held that the widow was entitled to the possession of the estate, and that the language used in the will implied that it might be diminished while in her hands. See, also, In re Woods, 35 Hun, 60; Champion v. Williams (Sup.) 12 N. Y. Supp. 697; Smith v. Van Ostrand, 64 N. Y. 278; Sutphen v. Ellis, 35 Mich. 446; Houser v. Ruffner, 18 W. Va. 244; Burleigh v. Clough, 52 N. H. 267; Starr v. McEwan, 69 Me. 334. The appellant did not make any showing before the superior court that there was any danger of loss if the property should be delivered to the widow, nor did she present to that court any reason why the property should not be so delivered; but has appealed directly from the decree of distribution, upon the theory that it is the invariable duty of the court to cause the property to be converted and direct that the life tenant shall receive the income only.

4. In the decree of distribution the court added to the clause distributing the personal estate to the widow the following: "Provided that the sum of one hundred dollars of said distribution shall have been heretofore received by Thomas Garrity, and that the sum of fifteen dollars has been received by James Garrity." No reason is assigned for inserting this condition in the decree of distribution, and we are of the opinion that it should not be included therein. The decree of distribution is intended to be a final disposition of the estate, and not contingent upon the establishment at some future time of the existence of such condition. If, as is suggested by the respondent, the money thus referred to represents the value of the watches, as his executor was charged for that value in his account there would be no occasion for inserting this proviso. The executor has not, however, appealed from the decree, and the rights of the appellant are not affected by this clause.

The superior court is directed to modify the decree of distribution by striking therefrom the foregoing proviso, and, as so modified, the decree is affirmed. The orders for a family allowance and settling the account are also affirmed; and the costs of this appeal are to be borne by the appellant.

HARMON v. SAN FRANCISCO & S. R. R. CO. et al. (No. 15,450.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1894.)

CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

A finding not against the weight of evidence will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angelotti, Judge.

Action by S. H. Harmon against the San Francisco & San Rafael Railroad Company and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Powell, for appellant. Charles F. Hanlon and Stanly, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley, for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien upon the San Francisco & San Rafael Railroad, extending from Point Tiburon to San Rafael, in the county of Marin, taken to secure the sum of $39,770.83, less about $7,000 paid on account thereof, claimed to be due the plaintiff for lumber, timber, etc., furnished by him as a subcontractor to one M. MacDonald, an original contractor, and used in the construction of said railroad. There was another action brought by the Gordon Hardware Company (a corporation) to foreclose a lien upon the same property. The two actions were consolidated, tried together, and judgment entered by the court in favor of the defendants, from which judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, S. H. Harmon, plaintiff in the first-mentioned cause, appeals.

The case involves but two questions of importance. The first relates to the time within which the lien was filed after the work was completed. The complaint avers the completion of the work on the 8th day of June, 1884, and the filing by plaintiff of his notice of lien as a subcontractor on the 18th day of June, 1884. The answer of the defendant railroad company negatives the allegations of the complaint in this behalf, avers the work to have been completed on or about May 5, 1884, "and that the plaintiff did not, within thirty days after the completion of said railroad, and the work mentioned in said contract, file for record," etc., his claim, etc. The court found that the contract under which plaintiff furnished supplies was completed May 8, 1884, "and that the plaintiff, Harmon, did not, within thirty days after the completion of said railroad and the work mentioned in said contract, file for record with the county recorder of Marin county any claim containing a statement of his demands," etc., and then proceeds to find that plaintiff's claim was filed June 18, 1884, long after the expiration of the 30 days after the completion of said railroad and of all work done or required to be done under said contract, etc. These findings are challenged by appellant, upon the ground that they are not supported by evidence, etc. In order to a better understanding of the drift of the evidence it is proper to state that on the 23d day of October, 1882, the defendant railroad company entered into a written contract with M. MacDonald, by the terms of which the latter agreed to construct the excavations, embankments, tunnels, piers, culverts, rubble walls, bridges, etc., on the line of the proposed railway from San Rafael to Point Tiburon in the county of Marin, at certain agreed prices, which aggregated say $242,240.66, of which amount 20 per cent., or say $48,452.20, was to be reserved by defendant until the time for filing liens by subcontractors should expire. Monthly payments were to be made upon progress estimates by defendants' engineer up to 80 per cent. of the work performed. The defendant railroad company also reserved the right in its discretion to pay off any debt of the contractor for labor or materials which might be or become a lien on the railroad, or any part thereof, and to deduct the sums so paid from the amount due the contractor. The work under the contract was to be completed November 1, 1883, and a bond for the faithful performance of the contract in accordance with its provisions was required and given in the penal sum of $50,000. Reference to this bond, and other facts not concerning the first question involved or the defendant corporation, will be made hereafter.

That plaintiff's lien as a subcontractor was filed for record June 18, 1884, was not disputed at the trial. There was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the time when the MacDonald contract and the railroad were completed. That the road was substantially completed prior to April 28, 1884, is established beyond question. On the last-named day the first passenger train ran over the road, and on the following 4th day of May an excursion party went over the road, and thenceforward regular passenger trains, under a fixed schedule, ran several times a day. The last spike had been driven April 10th preceding. The contention of appellant was that certain rock taken from tunnel No. 1 had been deposited off the railroad right of way and upon the land of one Porter, which the contractor was required to return to the right of way, and which was in fact returned, and not completely done until say June 2, 1884. S. C. Walsh, a witness on the part of plaintiff, testified that the last work was done under the contract June 2, 1884, in removing the rock to the right of way; that he received orders from May 17th from Zook, defendant's engineer, to remove it, and sent a letter to a man named Bird, who was left upon the ground, who, with a man named McMahon, removed it, consuming about 10 days. This witness testified that all work except this rock had been completed, and the men, except two, had been discharged, on or before May 10, 1884. C. K. Bird corroborated Walsh as to the time of removing the rock, and that he and McMahon, who had been acting as watchmen over the tools and property left on the line of road, did the work. On the other hand, David Porter, the owner of the land upon which the rock was deposited, testified as to giving notice for its removal, and that subsequently he went over from San Francisco to the land by steamer to San Quentin, thence by buggy to the land and back, being driven by Robert Warden, who was his farmer on the ranch, and found the rock had been removed. The date he did not remember, but did remember that he went and returned by steamer. It was further shown by two witnesses that the steamers ceased running to San Quentin April 25 or 26, 1884. Robert Warden testified to driving Porter to the ranch, and that the rock was removed in "the fore part of April"; that he left the ranch April 14th, and it had then been removed. Felix Sands had been in the employ of the contractor at tunnel No. 1, and superintended depositing the rock; ceased work April 12th, and was then employed by defendant as bridge tender near the tunnel; saw the rock removed by Bird and McMahon, and was certain it was before trains began running on the road (April 28th). H. C. Whiting testified the rock was removed before the trains ran on the road. Corbaley testified to the same effect, as did some other witnesses.

Upon the whole it must be said that the weight of testimony is to the effect that the rock was removed before April 28, 1884, and as this was the last work shown to have been done under the contract (if it be conceded as being done under the contract, of which there is grave doubt), and, as the road was then completed, it follows that the finding of the court is amply supported by the evidence, and that the notice of lien of plaintiff was not filed within the time prescribed by the statute to constitute a lien on the railroad of the defendant railroad company, and is conclusive of plaintiff's right to a foreclosure.

There is another branch of the case in which the court finds in favor of the defendants, and which is equally conclusive against the plaintiff. The five specifications of insufficiency of evidence not noticed, and the errors of law assigned upon the admission and rejection of evidence, relate to such other branch. To discuss it intelligently would require a lengthy statement of facts, and occupy much space, and hence, as no error is perceived in the action of the court below in its disposition, it is not deemed necessary to dwell upon the matter here. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BAIRD. (No. 21,107.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1894.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

On trial for forgery of a note, where, to show a guilty intent, other alleged forged notes were admitted in evidence on proof of extrajudicial confessions by defendant that they were forged by him, and the only objection made was that the notes were incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, the objection that sufficient foundation for their admission was not laid cannot be made for the first time on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

One Baird was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Seth Mann, W. H. Hatton, and Goucher, Jacobs & Jones, for appellant. Harris & Vickery, Atty. Gen. Hart, W. D. Tupper, and Firman Church, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was indicted for the crime of forgery, the indictment alleging that he did on or about August 20, 1891, "fraudulently, falsely, and feloniously," "make and forge a certain promissory note," bearing date June 20, 1891, and which promissory note is set out in the indictment. The defendant was convicted of the offense charged, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Upon the trial the district attorney, for the purpose of showing guilty intent upon the part of the defendant, offered in evidence various other alleged forged notes, 31 in number, bearing different dates, between May 29, 1891, and June 19, 1891, together with proof that they were uttered by the defendant during the latter month, and near its close. The only evidence tending to show that these notes were forgeries consisted of proof of the extrajudicial admissions of defendant to that effect. The defendant objected to the admission in evidence of one of the notes referred to, dated May 29, 1891, upon the ground that he was under indictment for its forgery, and that the note itself was not an act "done at or about the time of the alleged transaction in this case"; and that the same was "incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, because the date of this note is May 29, 1891, and it being still further removed than the date of the other note [referring to the note of June 1, 1891, previously admitted in evidence] from the alleged date of this transaction; and also that it is not embraced in any of the issues of this case, and is incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant for any purpose whatever." The objection was overruled, and the note admitted in evidence. Substantially the same objection and similar rulings were made in reference to the other offered notes. These rulings constitute the main ground upon which it is claimed that the judgment should be reversed, and we do not deem it necessary to notice in this opinion the other points suggested by the appellant.

It is argued here in behalf of the appellant that the court erred in admitting these notes in evidence, because it was not proven that they were forgeries, the testimony in relation to the admissions of defendant not being sufficient for that purpose; and, in support of this proposition, counsel for appellant refer to the general and well-settled rule that extrajudicial confessions of a defendant are not of themselves sufficient to establish the corpus delicti; and, to further sustain their contention, counsel cite section 111 of volume 3 of Greenleaf on Evidence, in which, after stating that, upon a trial for uttering a forged instrument, evidence that the defendant about the same time had uttered other forged instruments of the same description is admissible for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge, that author says: "But, where such other instruments said to be forged are offered in proof of guilty knowledge, there must be strict proof that they are forgeries." And this seems to have been so held in Rex v. Forbes, 7 Car. & P. 224. Conceding that under this rule the proper foundation was not laid for the introduction of these notes in evidence, because there was no proof, aside from the extrajudicial admissions of defendant, tending to show that they were forgeries, still they were not objected to upon this ground in the court below, and such an objection cannot be successfully made for the first time on appeal in this court. The case at bar is in this respect the same in principle as that of Crocker v. Carpenter, 98 Cal. 421, 33 Pac. 271. In that case the defendants had objected in the trial court to the admission of certain unverified answers (filed for them in another action by their attorneys therein) in evidence, upon the general ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The objections were overruled, and on appeal to this court the defendants argued that this ruling was erroneous, because it was not shown that they had any knowledge of the contents of such answers when filed; and, in sustaining the judgment of the lower court, this court said: "If the defendants desired to object to the offered evidence upon the ground that the proper foundation for its admission had not been laid, because it had not been shown that the facts stated in said answers were inserted with the knowledge of defendants, the objection should have been specifically pointed out, and called to the attention of the court and the opposing counsel. If this specific objection had been made, it is possible that it could have been removed by further evidence upon the part of plaintiff showing such knowledge, but the general objection that the offered evidence was incompetent was not sufficient. When such a general objection is overruled by a trial court, the party against whom the ruling is made cannot be permitted for the first time to urge in the appellate court the particular objection, which, if it had been openly urged in the trial court at the time of the ruling complained of, might have been easily cured. This is not laying down a merely technical rule. It is one which has its foundation in the proper consideration of what is due to the court and adverse counsel in the trial of a case." See, also, on this point, Elliot's Appellate Procedure (sections 769, 770). So, in this case, if the specific objection now urged had been made in the lower court, it is quite possible that such objection might have been obviated by additional evidence tending to show that the offered notes were forgeries, but the general objection that such notes were incompetent and irrelevant as evidence was not sufficient to indicate that defendant objected to their introduction because the proper foundation for their admission in evidence had not been laid by more strict proof that they were forgeries. Judgment and order affirmed.

PACIFIC LAND ASS'N et al. v. HUNT,
Judge. (No. 15,918.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1894.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE.

A mandamus will not lie to compel a trial judge to settle a bill of exceptions, where the instrument submitted as such bill does not show an attempt to present a fair and bona fide statement of the case.

Department 2.

Mandamus by Pacific Land Association and others to compel Hon. John Hunt, Judge, to settle a bill of exceptions. Petition dismissed.

A. Everett Ball, for petitioner. Wilson & Wilson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent to settle what is claimed to be a bill of exceptions. We agree with the respondent that the instrument submitted does not show an attempt to present such a fair and bona fide statement of the case as entitles it to be considered and settled as a bill of exceptions. The prayer of the petitioner is denied, and the petition dismissed.

GOLDEN GATE LUMBER CO. et al. v. SAHRBACHER. (No. 15,625.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1894.)

BUILDING CONTRACT — BREACH BY CONTRACTOR — FURNISHING INFERIOR MATERIAL.

1. Nonpayment of an installment due under a building contract is such a breach of the contract as will justify the contractor in leaving the work.

2. A contractor who abandons work for nonpayment of an installment due under the contract may recover on a quantum meruit.

3. Where a building contract calls for laths $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches wide, and for No. 1 rustic, and the best quality of joist and studding, and the contractor supplies laths $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, No. 2 rustic, and a second quality of joist and studding, there is such a substantial breach of the contract as will warrant the owner in refusing to pay the contract price.

4. A building contractor is not excused for failure to furnish the quality of material contracted for by the fact that the work done was a fair average job for that class of building.

5. The refusal of the court, in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien, to hear oral argument, is a proper exercise of its discretion.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Golden Gate Lumber Company and others against Charles Sahrbacher to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. Parker & Eells, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiffs recovered judgment as material men and subcontractors foreclosing liens upon the building of defendant, and this appeal is taken from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial. The contract price was $4,000, payable in four equal installments as the work progressed. The first payment was due when the building was framed, and the second payment when the brown coat of mortar was on. In due time the contractor received his first installment of the contract price, and when the brown coat of mortar was on demanded payment of the second installment. The owner refused to make the second payment, and thereupon the contractor declined to proceed further with the work, and the building was subsequently finished by third parties. Nonpayment of an installment of the contract price when due is such a breach of the contract as to justify a contractor in leaving the work and recovering upon a quantum meruit. Porter v. Reservoir Co., 100 Cal. 500, 35 Pac. 146. Was the contractor entitled to receive the second installment of money? In other words, was the second installment due? And the answer to that interrogatory is solely dependent upon a determination of the fact as to whether or not the contractor had progressed with the building according to the plans and specifications, to the extent of having placed the brown coat of mortar thereon. If he had done so, he had the legal right to stop work when the second installment was not forthcoming; but if he had not performed the contract according to its terms at the time he demanded the second installment, then it was not due, and he was not justified in leaving the work; and if he left the work without cause it was an abandonment of the contract, as contemplated by section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the plaintiffs' rights in this action will be measured by the provisions of that section. Upon an examination of the evidence, we conclude that the contractor failed to comply with the terms of his contract in substantial particulars, and, having committed breaches of the contract, he was not justified in leaving the work as he did leave it. It follows from this conclusion that the finding of the court that the contractor had duly performed all the terms and conditions of said contract upon his part, up to the 10th day of March, 1892, fails for want of support in the evidence.

Appellant's counsel claims that the contractor failed to perform his contract in many respects, and we particularize at least two of these alleged breaches as fully shown by the evidence; and we further consider them substantial and material departures from the plans and specifications. The contract called for laths $1\frac{1}{4}$ inches wide, and laths $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide were used. The contract called for No. 1 rustic and the best quality of joist and studding; the contractor used second quality of joist and studding, and No. 2 rustic. Such is the evidence of defendant's witnesses, and opposing counsel have directed our attention to nothing in the record to the contrary. While the record is voluminous, our reading of it has produced nothing to show a compliance with the contract in these respects, and the contractor himself while upon the witness stand did not testify to the contrary. Plaintiff introduced the evidence of carpenters and architects to the effect that, as far as the work had progressed at the time the contractor left the building, it was a fair, average job for that class of building. But we do not think this kind of evidence met the issue made. The question at issue was not as to whether it was a fair, average job for that class of building, but was, did the contractor furnish the kind of laths and the quality of lumber that he was called upon to furnish by the terms of the contract? And, if he did not, was such breach of the contract a substantial one? There is a wide difference between first and second class lumber, both as to the price and quality; and, as appears by the evidence, there is likewise a substantial difference as to the laths. A contractor should live up to his contract, and when he has covenanted with the owner that a certain quality of lumber shall be placed in the building the owner is entitled to have that kind of lumber placed therein. Deeming these breaches of the contract substantial and material, it is unnecessary to notice other alleged violations of its terms, for we conclude that the contractor abandoned his contract before completion, and that the rights of lien claimants must be admeasured according to the provisions of section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure. For this reason it becomes unnecessary to determine whether or not the provisions of that section would apply to these lien claimants, if the contractor had fully and entirely carried out the terms of the contract up to the time the second installment of the contract price was due.

Upon the conclusion of the evidence the court declined to hear an oral argument of the case, but gave the attorneys the privilege of filing briefs. Appellant insists that he had a legal right to orally argue the case to the court. We have no doubt that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, had the right to decline to hear oral argument. We also think the objections to the liens untenable; and the percentage of $95.50 allowed by the court as costs was fully justified by the following cases: Whitaker v. Haynes, 49 Cal. 596; Packard v. Wilson, 72 Cal. 124, 13 Pac. 220; Fanning v. Leviston, 93 Cal. 186, 28 Pac. 943. It is ordered that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WHITNEY et al. v. DODGE. (No. 15,498.)

CONFLICT OF LAWS — PERPETUITIES — PUBLIC POLICY.

1. The disposition of personal property is governed by the law of the domicile of the owner, and a trust of personal property, created by a will which is valid by the law of a foreign state which was testator's domicile, may be enforced in California, though the will would be invalid under the latter's statute relating to restraints on the power of alienation.

2. Where the public policy of a foreign state as well as California is against perpetuities, and the only difference is that in the former the suspension of the power of alienation may, in certain cases, extend longer than is permitted in the latter, the courts of the latter will not refuse, on the ground of public policy, to enforce a trust created by the will of a resident of such foreign state which is valid there, though it would be invalid in California under the statute against perpetuities.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by George G. Whitney and Winnie A. Durgin, infants, by James P. Sweeney, guardian ad litem, against Josephine H. Dodge, to enforce a trust, and for removal of defendant as trustee. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, and from a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellants. Joseph Leggett, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action is for an accounting by defendant as a trustee of an alleged trust fund, and her removal as such trustee. A general demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and judgment was rendered for defendant. From the judgment, plaintiffs appeal, and the question is whether or not the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

From the complaint it appears that one Jones Dyer, who was a resident of and domiciled in the state of Pennsylvania, died in the city of Philadelphia, in said state, on the 15th day of July, 1860, leaving a last will and testament. By said will he gave to the respondent herein, who was his daughter (to take effect after the death of his wife, Lydia Dyer), $12,000 in state bonds of the state of Maine, in trust for certain uses and purposes. The trust was that respondent should devote the interest and dividends of the bonds to the support and education of one Alice S.

Knight, a granddaughter of the testator, until she should be 21 years old, and afterwards said Alice was to receive said interest and dividends during the period of her natural life. In case said Alice should die leaving lawful issue, then her children should receive said interest and dividends until the youngest thereof should be 21 years old, when the corpus of the fund should be equally divided between such children. The said will was duly probated in Pennsylvania. In 1866 the said Lydia Dyer, surviving wife of the deceased, died; and in August, 1867, the respondent received and accepted said bonds in trust as aforesaid. The said Alice S. Knight was married twice during her lifetime and died in February, 1876, leaving the two appellants herein her sole and lawful issue. The latter were not born until after the death of the testator. The respondent, having accepted said fund in trust as aforesaid, and received all the said interest and dividends, has appropriated and converted said trust fund to her own use, and now denies and repudiates said trust, and refuses to account to appellants for any part thereof. Under the laws of Pennsylvania the said provisions of said will were valid,—those laws permitting the suspension of the power of alienation for the period of lives in being and 21 years afterwards. The foregoing are the only material averments of the complaint necessary to be here stated, and for the purposes of the demurrer they must, of course, be taken as true. Respondent contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action, because the provisions of said will upon which appellants rely were void under the laws of California; and that, therefore, they cannot be here enforced.

1. Counsel for appellants has argued with great learning, ability, and ingenuity that the said provisions of said will would be valid under the laws of California if the testator had been domiciled and the will had been made here, and if no consideration of the law of comity or the law of domicile were involved in the case. It is sufficient to say on this point that the learned counsel has not convinced us that his position is tenable, or that the said provisions of the will as to the children of Alice Knight born after the death of the testator are not within the limitations of sections 715 of our Civil Code, which provides that “the absolute power of alienation cannot be suspended by any limitation or condition whatever for a longer period than during the continuance of the lives of persons in being at the creation of the limitation or condition.” (Of course, in case of a will, the “creation of the limitation or condition” takes place at the death of the testator.) We will assume, therefore, that if the will had been made in this state, by a person domiciled here, it could not have been here enforced.

2. But it does not follow that respondent can escape the obligations of a trust touching personal property created in another state, and perfectly valid there, by removing into this state, where such a trust, if created here, would not have been valid. It is the clearly established general rule, arising out of considerations of justice and the principle of comity, that the disposition of personal property is governed by the law of the domicile of the owner. The rule is well stated, and many authorities to the point cited, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Ross in Estate of Apple, 66 Cal. 432, 6 Pac. 7. Story, Conf. Laws, p. 538, after having given various accounts of the origin of the rule, says: “But be the origin of the doctrine what it may, it has so general a sanction among all civilized nations that it may now be treated as a part of jus gentium. Lord Loughborough has stated it with great clearness and force in one of his most elaborate opinions. ‘It is a clear proposition,’ said he, ‘not only of the law of England, but of every country in the world where law has the semblance of science, that personal property has no locality.’ The meaning of that is, not that personal property has no visible locality, but that it is subject to the law which governs the person of the owner. With respect to the disposition of it, with respect to the transmission of it, either by succession or by the act of the party, it follows the law of the person. The owner in any country may dispose of his personal property. If he does, it is not the law of the country in which the property is, but the law of the country of which he was a subject, that will regulate the succession.” Of course the law of any one state or nation does not ex proprio vigore extend beyond its own territory; and any state would have the rightful power to provide that the rule above stated should not prevail within its jurisdiction. But the rule is part of the general law of every state in which it has not been abrogated either by express legislative language, or the enactment of statutes which work such abrogation by necessary implication. In the absence of such abrogation, the rule is not to be considered as imposed by foreign power upon the state in which it is invoked, but as part of the law of such state. Story says: “The same doctrine was recognized by Lord Chief Justice Abbott on another occasion. ‘Personal property,’ said he, ‘has no locality, and even with respect to that it is not correct to say that the law of England gives way to the law of a foreign country, but that it is part of the law of England that personal property should be distributed according to the jus domicilii.’ The same doctrine has been constantly maintained both in England and America, with unbroken confidence and general unanimity.” Conf. Laws, p. 539. The rule is founded on the most substantial principles of justice and right. A man is presumed to know the law of his own state or country upon the subject of the disposition of personal property, but not the law of all states or countries; and if he make such disposition thereof as is valid in his own state it ought in fairness to be recognized in another state into which the property might be brought. Story says: "If the law rei sitae were generally to prevail in regard to movables, it would be utterly impossible for the owner in many cases to know in what manner to dispose of them during his life or to distribute them at his death, not only from the uncertainty of their situation in the transit to and from different places, but from the impracticability of knowing with minute certainty the law of transfers inter vivos, or of testamentary dispositions and successions, in the different countries in which they might happen to be. Any change of place at a future time might defeat the best-considered will, and any sale or donation might be rendered inoperative from the ignorance of the parties of the law of the actual situs at the time of their acts. These would be serious evils, pervading the whole community, and equally affecting the subjects and interests of all civilized nations." Conf. Laws, p. 537. The rule in question is fully recognized in section 946 of our Civil Code, which provides that: "If there is no law to the contrary in the place where personal property is situated, it is deemed to follow the person of the owner, and is governed by the law of his domicile." It is true, as stated by counsel for respondent in his very able brief, that a law of another state, upon any subject, which conflicts with the public policy of this state, will not be recognized here. And this principle is sought to be applied in the case at bar, upon the ground that the policy of this state is against perpetuities, and that the provisions of the will under review are in conflict with that policy. But the public policy of Pennsylvania, and of every American state so far as we have observed, is also against perpetuities. What is a perpetuity? It is a word "applied to attempts to invest money or restrict the alienation of land in such way as forever to retain it for the benefit or in the enjoyment of the persons of a particular line of descendants." Abb. Law Dict. To prevent such a thing is within the settled policy of both Pennsylvania and California, and the only difference between the laws of the two states on the subject is that in the former the suspension of the power of alienation might, in certain cases, extend to a somewhat longer period than would be permitted in the latter. But this difference is not sufficient to work by necessary implication the abrogation of the well-recognized rule as to personal property above stated. All statutes must be construed with reference to well-known general principles and rules of law existing at the times of their enactment. The recent case of Cross v. Trust Co., 131 N. Y. 330, 30 N. E. 125, is very similar to the one at bar. There a trust in personal property was created by a will made by a resident of Rhode Island, which was valid there, but which would have been invalid under the statutes of New York concerning perpetuities if made in the latter state. The whole question is elaborately discussed, and the conclusion reached that the lex loci domicilii governed the case, and was not overcome by any consideration of conflict with the public policy of New York touching the matter of perpetuities. The court, among other things, said: "The only material difference in the law of the two states on this subject is that in each a different rule is adopted for measuring the period within which absolute ownership may lawfully be suspended. Granting that in most cases this period might be longer in Rhode Island than in New York, have we any right for that reason to declare the dispositions of this will void? If so, then a person desiring to make a will must not only know the law of his domicile, but also the law of every other country in which his personal estate may happen to be at his death, and our courts will become the resort of dissatisfied heirs or legatees, seeking to nullify wills valid by the laws of the place where the persons who made them were domiciled." We might add to this category persons who should go with trust funds to another state for the purpose of avoiding the will and the trust.

Respondent contends that the provisions of the will in question contravene the express provisions of certain cited sections of our Code. We do not construe those sections as either expressly or impliedly abrogating the above-stated rule as to personal property. They must be construed in connection with section 946, above quoted, and the general law upon the subject. It may be said, generally, that it would not be within the scope of a just and enlightened public policy to allow a trustee with trust funds in his hands, received under a will perfectly valid in another state, to avoid the trust, appropriate the funds to his own use, and defeat the beneficiaries, by the simple device of coming to this state, and bringing the funds with him. We do not know that these are the facts in the case at bar, but they are alleged in the complaint, and we are here dealing with the averments of the complaint alone. Our conclusion is that the demurrer should have been overruled. The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

(No. 15,654.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where the evidence is conflicting, the judgment will not be disturbed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the Patent Brick Company against J. W. Wissinger. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cameron H. King, for appellant. Roger Johnson and D. H. Whittemore, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment went for plaintiff in the superior court, and defendant appeals. Appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment and order denying a new trial, upon two grounds: (1) That the evidence was insufficient to justify the finding that there was not an account stated between the parties; and (2) that it was insufficient to justify the finding that there was a balance of $3,365.24 due from appellant. These contentions are very fully and well presented in the brief of counsel for appellant; and it is there very strongly argued that the case at bar does not come within the rule which obtains in cases where there is a substantial conflict of evidence. But, after an examination of the record, we are satisfied that there was such a substantial conflict as brings the case within said rule. A statement of the evidence here would serve no useful purpose. One asserted error of law in ruling out a certain question asked a witness is referred to in the brief, although apparently not much relied on. Considering the other evidence in the case, it was unimportant whether the question was allowed or not. Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BLYTH et al. v. TORRE et al.¹ (No. 15,526.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1894.)MECHANICS' LIENS — MEMORANDUM OF CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY OF DESCRIPTION — ESTOPPEL.

1. A memorandum of a contract for a building costing over $1,000, filed in the recorder's office, in which the only description of the property and of the work to be done is that "the building is to be a frame building," is fatally defective.

2. A material man is not estopped from enforcing his lien because he is on the contractor's bond to the owner to secure him from loss on account of the default or negligence of the contractor.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. Hebbard, Judge.

Consolidated action by Henry Blyth and others against Luigi Torre and others to foreclose mechanics' liens. From the judgment, plaintiff Blyth appeals. Reversed.

E. H. Wakeman, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden and McGee & Cavagnaro, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought to foreclose a number of mechanics' liens, and Henry Blyth appeals from the judgment. A written contract was entered into between Luigi Torre and Antonio Raffo, the owners of certain land, and a contractor, Gardiner, for the erection of a building thereon. The contract was for an amount in excess of $1,000, and was not filed in the recorder's office, but a memorandum thereof was so filed. The contractor failed to pay the laborers, material men, etc., and this action was brought by various lien claimants. Blyth, appellant, as the assignee of Blyth and Trott, material men, is a party plaintiff. His claim for relief, as evidenced by his complaint, is based upon the idea that the memorandum of contract filed in the county recorder's office is void in failing to contain those matters required by the statute. It is alleged that it neither contains a statement of the general character of the work to be done, nor does it describe the property to be affected. The defendants, by their answer, claim the sufficiency of the memorandum, and as an affirmative defense allege that plaintiff Blyth was a surety upon the contractor's bond in the sum of $1,900, and by the terms of which bond he guaranteed that the contractor would faithfully perform the conditions of his contract, and that he would save and keep these defendants safe and harmless from all liens that might be filed on account of any claim against the contractor, not exceeding the sum of $1,900. Defendants further allege that liens in large amounts had been filed against the building, and by reason of the conditions of the bond aforesaid plaintiff was estopped from filing, asserting, or enforcing any lien against the property. The trial court held the memorandum of contract sufficient in law, and also held that plaintiff was estopped from prosecuting this action for a foreclosure of his lien, upon the grounds relied upon by defendant. The action was a consolidated action, and other lien claimants recovered judgment, but their interests are not here involved. We think the memorandum of contract fatally defective in attempting to state the general character of the work to be done. As a compliance with this provision of the statute the memorandum says: "The building is to be a frame building." While the law requires no description in detail of the general character of the work to be done, still it requires more than is here found. This statement is too general. To say that the building is to be a stone building or a brick building or a frame building entirely fails in essentials to give that notice to the public which the law contemplates. By consulting the memorandum of contract it would be impossible to say whether the building is to be a diminutive cottage, or a large public caravansary, or whether the contract price is at all in proportion to the character of the building to be erected. In Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 235, 29 Pac. 629, it was held that a memorandum of contract describing the building as "three stories high" is void; likewise a "two-story building, 51 by 25." Butterworth v. Levy, 38 Pac. —. See, also, Dunlop v. Kennedy, 102 Cal. 443, 36 Pac. 765.

We think the lower court's position unsound as to the estoppel. The necessary facts to constitute an estoppel do not arise in this case. Plaintiff has a cause of action which he is entitled to litigate, and this bond, given to the owner to secure him from loss against the default or negligence of the contractor, in no way bars him from coming into court with his cause of action. The bond is simply to indemnify the owner against damage, and until his damage has been alleged and proven in some appropriate action it can avail him nothing. If he has not been damaged, he has no right of action upon the bond; and, if no right of action upon it, it is valueless to him, even for the purpose of an estoppel. The case appears to have been considered as though the presentation of the bond in open court at the trial ipso facto estopped plaintiff from taking any other step in the prosecution of his action, and this, too, regardless of the amount of the bond, as compared either to the amount of plaintiff's claim or the amount of defendants' damage. If defendants' damage is nothing, or trifling in amount, plaintiff should not be deprived of all remedy; or, if plaintiff's indemnifying bond is trifling in amount, as compared to his claim of lien, the doors of the courts should not be shut against him. In other words, the principle of estoppel is not involved, but it is rather a question of a cross complaint or set-off. The defendants, in answer to plaintiff's action to foreclose his lien, may set out the bond, prove their damage, and establish plaintiff's liability thereon, and the rights of both parties be thus fully and equitably adjudged. Such was the course pursued in Blyth v. Robinson (Cal.) 37 Pac. 904, and such is undoubtedly the proper course. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

ZELLER v. JORDAN et al. (No. 15,775.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1894.)

GIFT—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

1. The apprehension of death from some present disease or impending danger is essential to the validity of a gift causa mortis.

2. Delivery of a check, drawn on a fund in bank, under an agreement that the payee is not to use it until after the death of the maker, is not a sufficient delivery of the fund to constitute a gift inter vivos.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by H. J. Zeller against one Jordan and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. Hepburn Wilkins, E. B. Martinelli, and W. S. Goodfellow, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to recover from the defendant, the German Savings & Loan Society, the sum of $19,807.74, deposited with said defendant by Sophia Steineke, who afterwards became the wife of plaintiff, and is now deceased. The defendant Jordan is the executor of the last will of the said Sophia, and is made a party to this action by reason of the fact that he claims said deposit as a part of the estate of his said testator. The Superior court rendered judgment in his favor, and the plaintiff appeals. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that his deceased wife, in the month of January, 1886, "in consideration of the love and affection she had and bore unto plaintiff, and also for other good considerations her thereunto moving, made an assignment in writing" of her demand against the German Savings & Loan Society, arising out of the deposit before referred to, and that he "has ever since been, and still is, the lawful owner thereof, and of all accrued dividends thereon." The action was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found that the deceased never assigned to plaintiff, by way of gift or otherwise, her said demand against the German Savings & Loan Society; and the only question necessary to be considered on this appeal is whether this finding of the trial court is sustained by the evidence.

1. It appears from the evidence that the deceased wife of plaintiff was subject to epilepsy, and died in March, 1893. The immediate cause of her death is not shown. There was also evidence tending to prove that, between the years 1883 and 1886, she signed and delivered to the plaintiff an undated check drawn by her in his favor on the German Savings & Loan Society for the sum of $18,807.24, with interest, and to be charged to her account as a depositor with that bank. The pass book representing the deposits so drawn against was not delivered to plaintiff, and under the rules of the said defendant bank, which were printed in said pass book, deposits entered therein could only be withdrawn by an order accompanying the pass book. The plaintiff was the only witness examined in relation to the making of the check, and he testified that, at the time it was signed and delivered, his wife was not confined to her bed, and was well, and further said: "The check was given to me in consideration of love and affection. That was the reason for getting it. That was the only consideration. It was the understanding between me and my wife, at the time this check was signed, that I would not use the check or present it until after her death, and nothing was to be done with it until after my wife died. I was not to touch anything in that book of that money until after my wife's death." The check was not presented to the defendant bank until some time after the death of plaintiff's wife. It is clear to us that, under this evidence, the finding of the court that there was no completed gift or assignment to plaintiff of the fund in controversy must be sustained. We do not find it necessary to pass upon the question whether a bank check uncollected in the lifetime of the drawer, and unaccompanied by a delivery of the pass book, which, under the depositor's contract, must be presented with the order for a withdrawal of the deposit, is effectual as a donatio causa mortis. There was here nothing in the nature of such a gift. "A gift in view of death is one which is made in contemplation of the fear or peril of death, and with intent that it shall take effect only in case of the death of the giver." Civ. Code, § 1149. "To constitute a donatio causa mortis, the gift must be made in contemplation of the near approach of death by the donor." Daniel v. Smith, 64 Cal. 349, 30 Pac. 575. In some cases it is said: "The rule of law, in such cases of gifts made in prospect of death, demands for their validity that the proof shall show the existence of a bodily disorder, or of an illness which imperils the donor's life, and which eventually terminates it." Williams v. Guile, 117 N. Y. 349, 22 N. E. 1071. But perhaps the law upon this point is more accurately stated in Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 579, 26 N. E. 627, as follows: "The gift must be made under the apprehension of death from some present disease, or some other impending peril, and it becomes void by recovery from the disease or escape from the peril. It is also revocable at any time by the donor, and becomes void by the death of the donee in the lifetime of the donor." The evidence here entirely fails to show that the deceased delivered the check referred to under any belief of or apprehension of the peril of death from any existing disease, and for this reason its delivery cannot be sustained as a gift in view of death. "A gift mortis causa, made while the donor is in full health, or while suffering from a disease that in reasonable expectation will not produce death in the near future, is invalid. Thus, a deposit made in a bank while the donor was in full health or medium health, 'payable also to A. in case of the death of' the donor, was held to be an invalid gift." Thornt. Gifts, § 28.

2. And the evidence also fails to show a gift inter vivos. "A gift inter vivos, to be valid, must take effect at once, and there must be nothing to be done essential to the validity; and, if it is to take effect in the future, there is no gift, but only a promise to give. So a gift to take effect at the death of the donor is void." Thornt. Gifts, § 76. In other words, to constitute such a gift, there must be an immediate transfer of the title, and the donor must relinquish all present right to or control over the thing given. The donor here retained her dominion over the fund against which the check was drawn, and the check was delivered to the plaintiff, under an agreement that he was not to use or present it until after the death of the wife, or, as stated by the plaintiff in his testimony, "I was not to touch anything in that book of that money until after my wife's death." Judgment and order affirmed.

MENZIES et al. v. WATSON et al. (No. 15,756.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1894.)

ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—MOTION TO CORRECT DATE—EVIDENCE.

1. On motion to correct the date of the entry of a judgment as made in the judgment book, movant's witness testified that, a few days after such date, he went to the clerk's office, to obtain a copy of the judgment; that being unable to find the judgment, he asked several of the clerks about it, without result; that he looked in vain through a judgment book into which judgments were being copied; and that he did not remember whether there was a judgment roll, or whether the judgment had been docketed. The deputy clerk testified that the date written in the judgment book as the date of the entry of the judgment was not necessarily the date of its actual entry. Held, that the evidence did not show that the date was incorrect.

2. The fact that the court erroneously excluded certain evidence cannot be considered on appeal in determining the sufficiency of the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Stewart Menzies and others against Henry James Watson and others. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants moved to correct the date of the entry of the judgment. From an order denying the motion, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellants. Henry N. Clement, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from an order made after judgment. It is a proceeding after judgment to correct an alleged mistake as to the date of the entry of the judgment. The record does not show how the alleged error affects any rights of the moving party, but it is stated in the briefs that the defendants, having taken an appeal from the judgment, were confronted in this court by a motion to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that it was taken more than one year after the judgment was entered. The judgment purports to have been entered December 6, 1892. The appeal was taken December 8, 1893. The moving party does not pretend to know when the judgment was actually entered, but claims that it was not before December 10, 1892. The motion was based principally upon the affidavit of H. A. Massey, who was a clerk for Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, who were the attorneys for defendants. His affidavit is broad enough, perhaps, to entitle the defendants to the relief demanded; but the affiant was also called as a witness at the hearing of the motion, and his cross-examination shows that he did not know all the matters stated in his affidavit to be true. He was sent to the clerk's office "to obtain copies of the findings in said cases and of the judgments therein, if he should find that such judgments had been entered." He went there, as it otherwise appeared, on the 8th of December, 1892. He found the findings, but could not find the judgment. He inquired and was sent to the room where judgments are copied into the judgment book. He asked several clerks there about it, but they knew nothing of it. He was finally directed to a certain copyist, who was copying judgments into the judgment book, and together they looked through the book, and found that the judgment had not been copied there. He did not look through more than one judgment book to see whether the judgment had then been recorded. He did not remember whether there was a judgment roll, or whether the judgment was docketed. He did not remember whether the register showed that the judgment had been entered on the judgment roll filed. The judgment roll was apparently filed on the 5th, or, at least, that is what the register shows. On that day the judgment appears to have been docketed. All this is in direct violation of plain provisions of the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 668, provides that judgments shall be entered in the judgment book. There is no other "entry" of judgments mentioned in the Code. After this entry, and not before, the judgment roll can be made up and filed. Id. § 670. After this, and not before, the judgment can be docketed, and a judgment lien created. Id. § 671. But the testimony of the deputy clerk and the copyist shows a state of things still more surprising. The deputy in charge of this part of the work in the clerk's office testified that the date of the record in the judgment book and the date of the filing of the judgment roll and of the docketing of the judgment are not necessarily the true dates, and were not intended to show such date. The deputy says: "In no case, however, does the date indorsed at the foot of the record of judgment in said judgment book necessarily indicate the date at which the clerical work of writing such judgment in said judgment book was done; and in many cases judgments were actually written into said judgment book at a later date than that so indorsed thereupon." And it seems the register and the docket are kept with a like disregard of truth as to dates. In the whole range of the duties of the clerk there is none more important than the duty of keeping a true history of the time when this "clerical" work was actually done. Under our practice, it is the initial point of many rights. To willfully make a false certificate as to these matters is a violation of official duty. In this case it is quite possible, if the truth could be ascertained, that defendant has not lost his right of appeal. But, unfortunately for him, he has not been able to show it. The deputy and the copyist were unable to remember when the judgment was actually entered, although both confessed that, notwithstanding all the official entries which were designed to show when it was done, it may have been entered later. As the burden was upon the moving party, it must be held that he has not made out his case. Quite possibly, he is a loser through this vicious practice in the clerk's office. The explanation of the practice seems to be that the deputy knew that a deed was deemed to be recorded when filed for record, and he thought a judgment should be deemed entered when the attorney ordered it to be entered. But he is working under a very different statute, and one which plainly makes the date of the actual entry of the judgment the material matter. Even under that view it is difficult to see where he acquired his idea as to the filing of the judgment roll and the docketing of the judgment.

The counsel for the appellants say that the learned judge below declined to consider other evidence, because he was of the opinion that the record evidence was of such a high nature that he could not go behind it. The record does not show this, and, even if it did, we could not consider the evidence as though this were a trial court. If the learned judge did take that view of the matter, however, I am not sure that he has not reason on his side. The matter of the date of the actual entry of the judgment is so important that perhaps public policy would require that the certificate shall be held conclusive, except, of course, when the clerk may be sued for damages for having made a false entry. Whether this be so or not is not essential here, and the matter is not decided. However we consider the evidence, we can but find that the moving party has failed to make a case. The order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1894.)

WRIT OF RESTITUTION—REVERSAL OF ORDER—EJECTMENT—EJECTMENT—FORM OF RELIEF—TAXATION OF COSTS—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. On reversal of an order for a writ of restitution on a judgment for the recovery of land, one previously evicted under the writ is entitled to the removal from possession of all who entered under the writ, and of all who subsequently entered under them.

2. The decision of the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed.

3. In an ordinary action of ejectment, the fact that plaintiff's title is derived through a purchase under mortgage foreclosure does not entitle him to the relief proper in case he had sought a writ of assistance under the decree of foreclosure.

4. An order denying a motion to retax costs will not be reviewed where no copy of the order or of the cost bill is in the transcript, and it is not shown that the transcript is not correct.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by William Ford against Robert Boyle, Benjamin S. Green, and others to recover possession of land. Henry C. Hyde, as assignee in bankruptcy for Ford, was substituted as plaintiff, and recovered judgment against defendant Green. A writ of restitution was issued on the judgment, under which certain tenants of R. S. Thornton were evicted. Thornton thereupon moved to set aside the order allowing the writ to issue, and to set aside an order adjudging such tenants guilty of contempt for violating it. An order denying the motions was reversed on appeal (93 Cal. 1, 29 Pac. 247), and Thornton thereafter applied for a writ of restitution, which was granted. From an order denying a motion to recall the writ and vacate the order for its issuance, and from an order denying a motion to retax costs, plaintiff and C. P. Robinson (as assignee of plaintiff's interest) and others appeal. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellants. Edward F. Fitzpatrick, B. B. Newman, and Fox, Kellogg & Gray, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. This action was commenced August 12, 1873, by William Ford against Robert Boyle, Benjamin S. Green, and five others, for the possession of certain land in San Mateo county. The defendants other than Green answered the complaint, and upon a trial of the action a judgment of nonsuit was entered in their favor August 12, 1881. August 22, 1881, the plaintiff caused a judgment to be entered in his favor against the defendant Green, whose default for want of an answer had been entered October 10, 1873. Prior to the entry of these judgments, Ford had been adjudged a bankrupt, and Henry C. Hyde, who had been appointed his assignee in bankruptcy, was substituted as plaintiff in the action. Green died in 1882, and on the 20th of November, 1888, an ex parte order of the superior court was made upon an application on behalf of the plaintiff for the issuance of a writ of restitution upon the judgment against Green. The writ was issued, and on the next day was placed in the hands of the sheriff, who on the 23d of November, 1888, returned the same with his indorsement thereon that he had executed it according to its terms. Certain tenants of the respondent Thornton were evicted under the writ, and afterwards reentered upon the lands; and on the 11th of March, 1889, the superior court made an order adjudging them guilty of contempt, and directing that an alias writ of restitution issue. April 23, 1889, the respondent Thornton moved the said court to set aside its order of November 20, 1888, ordering a writ of restitution; also its order of March 11, 1889, adjudging his tenants guilty of contempt, and directing the issuance of an alias writ. This motion was denied May 24, 1889, and from this order Thornton appealed. Upon that appeal the order was reversed, and the superior court was directed to vacate and set aside the orders referred to in his motion. Hyde v. Boyle, 93 Cal. 1, 29 Pac. 247. After the remittitur had been filed in the court below, that court made an order March 1, 1892, vacating and annulling its previous orders of November 20, 1888, and March 11, 1889, in accordance with the directions of this court, and also all orders and proceedings based thereon, and, upon the application of Thornton, made an order March 25, 1892, for the issuance of a writ of restitution, directing and commanding the sheriff to remove all persons in possession of the land and premises described in said writ under the order made and entered on November 20, 1888, and to place Thornton in the quiet and peaceable possession thereof. Under this order a writ of possession was issued, and placed in the hands of the sheriff for execution March 26, 1892; and on April 8, 1892, the appellants herein moved the court for an order recalling the writ and vacating the order for its issuance, and directing that a writ of restitution upon the judgment in the action be issued in their favor, as the successors in interest of the plaintiff therein. This motion was denied, and from the order denying the same the present appeal has been taken.

The lands involved in this proceeding have been in litigation for upwards of 20 years, during which time many actions and proceedings have been instituted between the respective claimants thereto, from which appeals have in some cases been taken, so that the history of the litigation is not entirely unfamiliar to the court.

In their application to vacate the order restoring Thornton to the possession of the lands from which he had been evicted under the writ of restitution issued November 20, 1888, the appellants state as the grounds therefor "that no persons are in possession of any of the lands in said writ described, who entered under the writ of restitution issued herein on the 21st day of November, 1888, and executed on the 23d of the same month; that R. S. Thornton has no right, title, or interest in or to said premises, nor any right to the possession; and that the execution of said writ issued on the 26th of March, 1892, would be an abuse of the process of the court." Upon the reversal of the orders for the writs of restitution, Thornton was entitled to be restored to all that he had lost by virtue of these orders, and to be placed in the same position as he was prior to the execution of the writ. This would require the removal of all persons who had been placed in possession of the land by virtue of the writ, as well as all others who had come in under them after that date. The sheriff returned that he executed the writ of restitution of November 21, 1888, "by placing C. P. Robinson, the assignee of the plaintiff therein, by his agent, Mr. T. M. Osmont, in the quiet and peaceable possession of the premises therein described." Hannah Green, one of the appellants, states in her affidavit that the writ was executed as to her by her attorney to C. P. Robinson, and that she signed a memorandum acknowledging the rights of Robinson to the possession of the premises; that Robinson had conveyed all his title to the premises to T. M. Osmont, and that for more than two years last past (that is, prior to April 6, 1892, the date of her affidavit) she had occupied the premises by the consent, leave, and license of said Osmont. The court was thus authorized to find that she had come into possession of the land under Robinson, who had been placed there by the sheriff by virtue of the writ, and that her possession was that of Robinson through Osmont. Although she also claimed to have been in possession of the premises for a period antedating the commencement of the action in ejectment, yet, on the other hand, Thornton claimed that for a long time next prior to the execution of the writ her possession was as his tenant. If in fact she was in possession of the premises as a tenant of Thornton at the time the writ was executed, her eviction was the eviction of Thornton, and he was entitled to be restored to the possession.

The right of a plaintiff, in whose favor a judgment for the recovery of land has been rendered, to dispossess, under a writ of restitution, not only the defendants in the action, but all persons who have entered under them subsequent to its commencement, is not questioned on this appeal. But in the present case the main, and almost the only, question which the court below was called upon to determine, was whether Thornton had entered under Green after the commencement of the action in 1873, and whether the other occupants of the land were tenants of Thornton. Upon both of these propositions there was a very sharp and decided conflict in the affidavits, and the action of the court in denying the motion of the appellants must be affirmed upon the ground that the decision of the trial court upon conflicting statements of fact will not be reviewed by this court. But even if the conflict in the affidavits had been less marked, and only such as to create an uncertainty in the mind of the judge, he was not required to grant the motion of the appellants, but would have been justified in requiring that their respective rights to the land should be presented to a jury, before which the witnesses might appear in person, and be subjected to a cross-examination upon their statements. There are many circumstances presented by the affidavits herein which would naturally suggest such a course. More than seven years had elapsed after the entry of the judgment before the application for the writ of restitution was made. Green, who was the only defendant against whom the judgment ran, died within less than two years after the judgment. Green had made a conveyance of the land to Thornton more than a year before the commencement of the action in ejectment, and Thornton had stated in his affidavit that Green had then put him in possession of the land, and had himself thereafter, and until his death, occupied it as his tenant; and, while the affidavit of Mrs. Green contradicted these statements, there were other matters presented in her affidavit and in the other affidavits on her behalf submitted to the court which tended to corroborate the statements of Thornton. Mrs. Green does not claim to have had any separate title to the property, or that during the lifetime of her husband she had any possession distinct from his, or that after his death she had any claim thereto other than by succession as his widow. We cannot say from an examination of the record that the appellants have shown a clear right to have the judgment executed as against the respondents, or that the respondents entered upon the land after the commencement of the action. The conflict between the affidavits on behalf of the respective parties was at least sufficient to create a doubt in the mind of the court.

The suggestion of the appellants, that because the plaintiff's title is derived through a purchase under the foreclosure of a mortgage, they are entitled to the same relief as if they had asked for a writ of assistance under the decree of foreclosure, cannot be maintained. This action is an ordinary action of ejectment, and the relief to be given is the same as that in any other action of ejectment, irrespective of the evidence by which the plaintiff established his right to the possession of the land.

The notice of appeal contains also an appeal from an order denying the plaintiff's motion to retax the costs, and refusing to strike out the items of cost embraced in the cost bill of the respondents; but the transcript contains no copy of this order or of the cost bill, nor has the plaintiff presented any reason why the order is not correct. For these reasons this order must be affirmed. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

CUNNINGHAM et al. v. KENNEY. (No. 15,484.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1894.)

WAREHOUSEMAN—CONTRACT FOR STORAGE—CONSTRUCTION.

A warehouseman, under a contract to store property for a certain time for a certain sum, cannot recover for storage where the property is destroyed, though without negligence on his part, before the expiration of the time.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by James F. Cunningham and another against Daniel Kenney. There was a judgment for defendant, from which and from the order denying a new trial plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

A. S. Kittredge, for appellants. W. L. Gill and C. D. Wright, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover $369.45 as bailees for the price of storage by defendant of certain hay in the warehouse of plaintiffs. Defendant had judgment, from which judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. The findings, which are supported by the evidence without conflict, show: (1) That in 1838 the plaintiffs and their grantor and E. J. Swift, deceased, of whose estate T. V. Mathews is administrator, were the owners of a warehouse in the county of Santa Clara. (2) On or about September 1, 1888, defendant delivered to plaintiffs for storage in said warehouse certain hay, upon the terms and conditions expressed in an agreement in writing, of which the following is a copy: "Ynigo Rancho Warehouse, Mountain View, Oct. 17, 1888. This is to certify that Mr. Daniel Kenney has this day stored in sections — of the Ynigo Rancho Warehouse 3,016 bales wheat hay, weighing 720,000 lbs. balers' weight, subject to the following conditions: The warehouse owner will not be responsible for loss or damage to hay from effect of water, fire, damp, or other causes. Hay stored only for the season ending June 1st of each year. Rate, $1.00 on balers' weight. Storage payable only in gold coin of the United States, and must be paid before withdrawal of the hay. Weighing, 25 cents extra. M. W. Wilcox, Manager. 37 North First street, San Jose." (3) Said hay remained on storage under said agreement until the 17th day of March, 1889, when, without the fault of defendant, the said warehouse and hay were wholly destroyed by fire. The answer of defendant charged plaintiffs with negligence, upon which issue the court did not find, deeming it unimportant, and holding as a conclusion of law that the contract of storage was an entire and not a severable contract, and that, as the warehouse and hay having burned before the time for the storing of said hay expired, the agreement of plaintiffs to store the hay until June 1, 1889, was never performed or complied with by them, and the storage never earned.

The following extract from the opinion of the learned judge who tried the case in the court below contains a correct exposition of the law applicable to the case, and is adopted as the opinion of the court: "To defeat the plaintiffs' claim, defendant insists, among other things, that the plaintiffs did not perform the contract, and hence cannot recover upon it. I am of opinion the point is well taken. As I understand the contract, it is an entire one. The terms are that, for a compensation of $1 per ton, the plaintiffs agreed to store the hay for the season ending June 1, 1889. It is the duty of a bailee at the end of the term for which property is stored to return it to the bailor. While the law relieves a bailee at the suit of the bailor from liability for the value of the article stored when it is destroyed by fire without his fault, and when he has exercised reasonable care towards its preservation, it does not permit him to recover compensation for its custody and care when he is unable, through the loss, to perform the contract he has undertaken. His right to recover compensation is to be determined from the contract itself, and, in order to recover, he must show performance according to its terms. The industry of counsel has furnished no authority which holds that a warehouseman agreeing to store property for a given time can recover the compensation provided by the contract when the property was lost by fire before the term of storage had expired. The case of Schmidt v. Blood, 24 Am. Dec. 154, cited by counsel, does not so hold. The only point, aside from the question of negligence, involved in that case was whether the warehouseman, after part of the goods stored had been stolen without his fault, had a lien upon the remainder for the compensation due for the whole, and the court held that he had. From that decision it can only be inferentially argued that if he had the lien he had the right to compensation, but it may be with equal force argued that the compensation may have been earned and the contract performed before the goods were stolen. As the terms and conditions of the contract in that case are not set forth, and the point in dispute here was not directly involved in that case, it cannot be considered as authority. The case at bar comes, I am satisfied, under the rule announced in Archer v. McDonald, 36 Hun, 194. In that case McDonald agreed to store for Archer from October until May from 15,000 to 30,000 barrels of lime, and to deliver it at the end of his wharf in May. For this he was to receive 15 cents per barrel. In November, after 20,000 barrels had been received, they caught fire without any fault of McDonald, and were ruined by slacking. In that case the court held that the contract was an entire one, and that not only was McDonald not entitled to recover any compensation, but that Archer was entitled to recover back the money he had paid on account for storage. I see no difference in principle between the case cited and the case at bar. It is true that in both cases during all the time the articles were in possession of the warehousemen they had incurred liability and responsibility in the care of the property, and it seems inequitable that they are entitled to no compensation, as it seems to be equally inequitable to allow them compensation for services not performed. That, however, is not the fault of the law, but of the warehousemen. They could have provided in their contract for contingencies and for a proportionate compensation for proportionate service. They have not done so. The court cannot make contracts for the parties; it can only determine such contracts as they have made. In this case the plaintiffs have seen fit to enter into a contract entire in its terms, and their rights must be measured by it. As the plaintiffs failed to perform their contract, and store the property for the time specified in their contract, they are not entitled to recover. The defendant is entitled to a judgment for his costs, and it is so ordered. W. G. Lorigan, Superior Judge."

The foregoing reasons render a finding upon the question of negligence of no importance to the result. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

WORMMOUTH v. GARDNER et al. (No. 15, 645.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1894.)
HOMESTEAD — ENTRY — LOCATING HOUSE OUTSIDE BOUNDARIES — RIGHTS AGAINST TRESPASSERS.

1. Under Act March 23, 1874, § 2, one who has made a United States homestead entry, and obtained a receipt from the land office on making full cash payment for the land, being a resident on the land at the time of such entry, and continuing to reside thereon, and to comply in good faith with the homestead law, till after final payment, may recover possession of that part of the land covered by the entry, of which another, not in privity with the United States, had adverse possession at the time of the entry, and continued in adverse possession.

2. A homestead entry is valid though the house in which the person making the entry is at the time living is a short distance outside the land entered, he having believed that it was on the land entered, and having moved onto it as soon as the true boundaries were discovered.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; F. M. Angelotti, Judge.

Action by Wormmouth against Gardner and others. There was judgment for defendants, but a new trial was granted, and defendants appeal from the order. Affirmed.

Hepburn Wilkins, for appellants. E. B. Mahon, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to recover possession of a tract of land containing 46.26 acres. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, the issues of fact being found in favor of the defendants, judgment was thereupon rendered against the plaintiff. Subsequently the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was granted, and from this order the defendants have appealed.

1. The motion for a new trial was properly granted. The plaintiff's right to the possession of the land in controversy was based upon a United States homestead entry, made May 20, 1881, and a receipt given by the receiver of the proper United States land office, on plaintiff's making full cash payment for the land July 22, 1892. The defendants are not in privity with the United States, and there was evidence tending to show that plaintiff was residing on the land embraced in his homestead entry when such entry was made, and continued to reside thereon, and to comply in good faith with the United States homestead law, until final payment for the land. This was sufficient to entitle him to recover under section 2 of the act of March 23, 1874, "for the protection of pre-emption and homestead claimants" (St. Cal. 1873-74, p. 543), notwithstanding the fact that the defendants and their predecessors were, at the date of plaintiff's homestead entry, in the adverse possession of so much of the land covered by such entry as is involved in this action, and have at all times since continued in such adverse possession.

2. Even if it be conceded, as claimed by appellants (and as to whether the fact is so or not there appears to be some confusion in the evidence), that the house in which plaintiff was living at the date of the homestead entry was not upon the land so entered, but was a short distance therefrom, and within the boundaries of the Mexican grant known as the "Rancho Corte Madera del Presidio," still the court was justified in finding from the testimony that plaintiff believed at the time of the entry that his house was outside of the boundaries of the grant mentioned, and upon the land entered by him as a homestead, and the mistake in the location of his house, if it was one, was corrected by plaintiff as soon as the true boundaries of the adjoining rancho were discovered, by the removal of his actual residence to the land covered by such entry. Under these circumstances the original homestead entry was valid under the laws of the United States,—Case of Phylorman Higgins, 1 Copp, Pub. Land Laws (1882) p. 406; 3 Op. Attys. Gen. 312, opinion of March 10, 1838; 1 Lester, Land Laws, p. 385,—and the plaintiff's right to the possession of the land embraced therein, as against trespassers and persons having no superior right, is clearly within the spirit, if not the strict letter, of section 2 of the act of March 23, 1874, before cited. Upon the whole, we cannot say that the superior court abused its discretion in granting the motion for a new trial, and its order must be affirmed. Order affirmed.

DAVIS et ux. v. CALIFORNIA STREET CABLE R. CO. (No. 15,497.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1894.)
CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries, it appeared that, while building its road, defendant left a rail on the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's house, and that it had been there for four weeks before the accident. Plaintiff knew it was there. On the night of the accident, it was dark, and there was a cry of fire, and plaintiff started into the street, and fell over the rail. Held, that a non-suit was properly granted.

2. One who, knowing of an obstruction on a street, negligently falls over the same, cannot predicate her right to recover on an ordinance requiring a light to be placed on the obstruction.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Samuel Davis and Sarah Davis, his wife, against the California Street Cable Railroad Company for personal injuries sustained by the wife. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiffs, Samuel Davis and Sarah Davis, his wife, brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries to said Sarah Davis, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court, at defendant's request, instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, which was done; and, judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiffs appealed therefrom within 60 days, upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The only point made upon this appeal is that the court erred in directing a verdict for defendant. The material facts are that in 1891 the defendant was constructing a street railroad on Hyde street, and deposited a large quantity of rails and yokes upon the sidewalk in front of plaintiffs' residence, all of which, except one rail, were removed and used in the construction of the road about four weeks before the accident occurred resulting in the injury complained of. The rail that was left upon the sidewalk was 28 feet long and 3 inches high, and one end of it was under a street gas-light. This rail had remained there for about four weeks, and Mrs. Davis not only knew it was there, but had seen children and one Chinaman fall over it. The night the injury was received, at about half past

8, there was an alarm of fire, and some one on the street cried, "Fire! Fire!" The night was dark, and it was raining. Mrs. Davis went out to see where the fire was, and Mrs. Smith, who occupied the upper floor of Mrs. Davis' house, came down for the same purpose. Mrs. Davis told Mrs. Smith to go back, as it was raining, and then started to go out into the street to find out where the fire was, and fell upon the rail, and dislocated her shoulder. She testified that she did not know whether or not she ran against the rail; that she knew it was there, but on this night forgot that it was there. The street railroad was not then completed, and the defendant was then engaged in putting in switches in the same block, and this rail was left upon the sidewalk, the defendant expecting to use it in the construction of the switches.

There was no conflict in the evidence, and the court did not err in directing a verdict for the defendant. The rule in such cases is well stated by the supreme court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Converse, 139 U. S. 472, 11 Sup. Ct. 569, as follows: "Undoubtedly, questions of negligence in actions like the present one are ordinarily for the jury, under proper directions as to the principles of law by which they should be controlled; but it is well settled that the court may withdraw the case from them altogether, and direct a verdict for the plaintiff or the defendant, as the one or the other may be proper, where the evidence is undisputed, or is of such conclusive character that the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it." In Stephenson v. Southern Pac. Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 Pac. 618, and 36 Pac. 407, it was said: "Where the facts are admitted or proven without contradiction, the court will determine whether or not they establish negligence or show contributory negligence; but, where the conclusion is open to debate, it is one for the jury, under proper instructions from the court." We quite agree with counsel for appellants that previous knowledge or familiarity with a dangerous place or obstruction in a highway is not, per se, conclusive evidence of contributory negligence in failing to avoid it. In this case, if the plaintiffs' house had been falling, rendering great haste in escaping from imminent danger necessary, the haste, excitement, and fear might reasonably be held sufficient to obliterate all memory or thought of the presence of the obstruction upon the sidewalk. But that is not this case. There was an alarm of fire, a common occurrence in the city, and wholly insufficient, where its locality is not known to be in the immediate vicinity, to disturb the memory or prevent that reasonable care commonly exercised by persons of mature years. When Mrs. Davis reached the sidewalk, she discovered it was raining. She saw no fire. She was sufficiently calm to advise Mrs. Smith to return to the house. Mrs. Smith, after stating that she heard the alarm of fire, and thought it was close by, testified as follows: "I went down to see Mrs. Davis, and, when I got down, she was out, and told me to go back, because it was raining. She just wanted to go down the street, and see where the fire was. Just as I turned around, she fell. It seemed to me she was out from the steps, and she fell before I could turn around hardly." No danger could have been apprehended by Mrs. Davis from the fire after she reached the sidewalk, but mere curiosity induced her to start to go down the street to see where the fire was. That she forgot the presence of the rail is not disputed in the evidence, but that the circumstances justified her forgetfulness and consequent want of care cannot be conceded. Appellants cite some 50 cases upon this branch of the case. We cannot review them within the limits of an opinion, nor is it at all necessary. Each rests upon its own peculiar circumstances. If the facts are doubtful, as the result of uncertain evidence or conflicting testimony, the question should be submitted to a jury; but here the facts are not doubtful, nor the evidence conflicting, and the question is one of law for the court.

One point urged by appellants remains to be noticed. It is contended that order No. 1,588, of the city and county of San Francisco, required defendant to have guarded this iron rail by a lighted lantern every night. Even if it be conceded that the ordinance required the defendant to keep a lighted lantern at the rail, the only object of the requirement was to enable persons using the walk to see the rail, and, if this purpose was served by the gaslight, it was sufficient. It is not contended that the rail could not be seen, nor that lanterns had been kept there until the night of the accident, and then were omitted, leading plaintiff to believe the rail had been removed. She knew the rail was there, and was therefore bound to use reasonable care, and could not be absolved from such care by the negligence of defendant in not keeping a lighted lantern at the place, even if it was its duty to do so.

In re SYLVESTER'S ESTATE. (No. 15,673.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1894.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

A finding of a probate court on conflicting evidence in an accounting by an executor will not be disturbed on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by Daniel Sylvester to settle his accounts as executor of John Sylvester.

From the decree made, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the executor appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. Blake, Williams & Harrison, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by Daniel Sylvester, executor of the last will of John Sylvester, deceased, from an order of the probate court settling the account of said executor, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial in the matter of said order. The transcript presents rather a vague and confusing representation of the proceedings out of which this appeal arises. The executor is also the surviving partner of the deceased in a certain business, and appellant contends that the account involved here is his account as surviving partner, under section 1585 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the probate court has no jurisdiction to settle such an account. But the account is, upon its face, the account of appellant, not as surviving partner, but as executor; and the only specifications of error are that the evidence shows: First, that the executor had no money of the estate in his hands; second, that he had paid to the surviving wife over $2,900, for which he received no credit; and, third, that all the money received by the executor as such had been legally and properly laid out. On all these questions there was substantially conflicting evidence, and we cannot disturb the disposition made of them by the lower court. It is argued by appellant that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the court "that the whole of the estate received by said executor as such amounted to the cash sum of $12,021.75, all of which was received by him prior to the 12th day of June, A. D. 1882." But, assuming that this point can be raised under the specifications of error, it is sufficient to say that the transcript contains a stipulation, made at the trial, which commences as follows: "It was agreed by and between the parties hereto that the whole of the estate received by said executor as such amounted to the cash sum of $12,021.75, all of which was received by him prior to the 12th day of June, A. D. 1882." The stipulation, after reciting that said sum was the property of a firm of which the deceased and the executor were the only members, proceeds to provide that "said executor has no claim to or share in said sum of $12,021.75, or any part thereof, by reason of his said partnership with said deceased, but is chargeable with the whole thereof on the settlement of said account, as having been received by him on the said 12th day of June, A. D. 1882, and is entitled to credit also for partnership liabilities paid by him, and amounting to $2,000.00; and that all payments made for the proper expenses of administration and the personal indebtedness of said deceased should be charged against said widow as a part of her distributive share of the estate." This stipulation is really an answer to all the contentions of appellant, except those concerning the amounts of certain charges and credits, as to which, as before stated, the evidence warranted the findings of the court. The orders appealed from are affirmed.

HENNESSY v. NICOL, Judge. (No. 15,870.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1894.)

SUIT FOR DIVORCE—CHANGE OF VENUE—IMPOSITION OF CONDITIONS.

1. In an action for divorce, it is error to postpone the hearing of defendant's motion for a change of venue to the county in which he resides till after a motion for temporary alimony is heard.

2. After temporary alimony has been granted, it is error to refuse to hear the motion for change of venue till the alimony is paid.

3. Before a party can be brought into contempt for failure to obey an order, the order must be served on him.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Mandamus by John C. Hennessy to compel George W. Nicol, judge of the superior court of Tuolumne county, to hear a motion for a change of venue. Writ granted.

Clement, Cannon, Kline & Stradley, for petitioner. F. P. Otis, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an application for a writ of mandate commanding the respondent, as judge of the superior court of Tuolumne county, to hear and determine a motion made in an action pending in his court for a change of the place of trial of said action. The facts upon which the application is based are as follows: On June 1, 1894, Cornelia Hennessy commenced an action in the superior court of Tuolumne county against John C. Hennessy, the petitioner here, alleging that the parties to the action were married on July 4, 1889, in said county, and had ever since been, and still were, husband and wife; that from the time of their marriage they continued to live and cohabit together as husband and wife in this state until June 21, 1891, when the defendant willfully and without cause deserted the plaintiff, and had ever since refused to live with her, or to provide a home for her, or to allow her to return to him; that in November, 1891, a son, the issue of the marriage, was born, and that since the said separation the defendant had refused and neglected to pay or contribute anything towards the support of plaintiff or the said child; that defendant had an income sufficient to pay plaintiff a reasonable sum for the support of herself and child; and that $40 per month was a reasonable sum for such support. And the prayer was that defendant be adjudged to pay plaintiff, for permanent support and maintenance of herself and child, the sum of $40 per month, besides the costs and counsel fees in the action. The summons in the action was served upon the defendant in the city of San Francisco on June 11th, and at the same time notice, with an affidavit of plaintiff, was served upon him, stating that on June 29th, at 10 o'clock a. m., counsel for plaintiff would move the court for an order requiring the defendant to pay her the sum of $200 as alimony pendente lite, and for costs. On June 23d the defendant served and filed a notice that on June 29th, at 10 o'clock a. m., he would move the court for an order changing the place of trial of the action to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, upon the ground that, at the time of the commencement thereof, he was a resident of the said city and county. And at the same time he also served and filed a demurrer to the complaint, a demand that the place of trial be changed from the county of Tuolumne to the city and county of San Francisco, and his affidavit stating that he then was, and for more than three years had been, a resident of said city and county, and also stating in proper form that he had a good defense to the action on the merits. On June 29th the cause was continued by consent. On July 17th counsel for plaintiff moved the court that the motion for alimony be heard before the motion for change of the place of trial. This motion was submitted and taken under advisement until August 6th, when it was granted. The motion for alimony was heard August 11th, and thereupon an order was made and entered that the defendant pay to the plaintiff forthwith the sum of $150 as alimony pendente lite. A certified copy of this order was served on the defendant in San Francisco on August 24th. On August 14th counsel for plaintiff called up the motion to change the place of trial, and it was ordered that the matter be continued until the 17th. On the last-named day, counsel for defendant renewed the motion, and counsel for plaintiff objected to the hearing of it, upon the ground that the alimony ordered had not been paid. It was admitted that the alimony had not been paid; and thereupon "the court ordered that the said objection be, and the same is hereby, sustained; and the court refuses to hear said motion until the order granting alimony pendente lite is complied with."

We think the court erred in refusing to hear and decide upon the defendant's motion for change of venue. The action was one which, under section 395, Code Civ. Proc., the defendant was entitled to have tried in the county of his residence. And, when proper application for the change was made, the court had no discretion to refuse to hear the motion, or to impose terms as a condition precedent to the hearing. In Watts v. White, 13 Cal. 324, it is said: "The party desiring a change of venue should move the court to change the place of trial, and then the court, in the proper case, has no discretion to refuse the motion. It seems to be made by the statute a matter, in such cases as this, of peremptory right." In Watkins v. Degener, 63 Cal. 500, it is said: "When the action is not one of those mentioned in sections 392, 393, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the defendant resides without the county where it has been commenced, it is the right of the defendant, upon satisfying the court of his residence, to have the place of trial changed, if, at the time, he appears and answers or demurs, he files an affidavit of merits, and demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county." And in Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 33, 21 Pac. 381, it is said that the right to a change of the place of trial "is to be determined by the condition of things existing at the time the parties claiming it first appeared in the action." Under the law as thus declared, the plaintiff had no right to have her motion for temporary alimony first heard, and the court had no right to make a compliance with the order awarding such alimony a condition precedent to the hearing of defendant's motion.

It is claimed for respondent that the defendant was not entitled to have his motion heard, when it was called up, on August 17th, for the reason that he was then in contempt of court, because he had not paid the alimony awarded the plaintiff, and ordered to be paid by him forthwith. This claim cannot be sustained. The defendant was not in contempt of court for two reasons: First, under the circumstances shown, the order awarding alimony was unauthorized; and, second, "before a party can be brought into contempt for not complying with an order of court, such order must be served upon him." Johnson v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 580. The order was not served on defendant until August 24th, while his motion was denied on the 17th. It follows, in our opinion, that the defendant was entitled to have his motion for change of venue heard, and that a peremptory writ of mandate should be issued commanding the respondent to immediately hear and decide the same.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate be issued from this court, commanding the respondent to immediately hear and decide the defendant's motion for change of the place of trial of the action referred to.

VON SCHMIDT v. WIDBUR, City Treasurer. (No. 15,160.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1894.)

POWERS OF CITY—PURCHASE OF SMALLPOX HOSPITAL—ISSUE OF CITY WARRANT—RIGHT TO WITHDRAW.

1. The board of supervisors of a city authorized the committee on health to purchase certain land. The deed was delivered to the committee, and presented to the board, which directed that it be held "in escrow" till the consideration therefor was allowed. A warrant for the consideration was issued, and ordered by the board to be paid, and was duly audited and delivered to the grantor. Held, that the board could not, by repealing its action as to the purchase, divest the grantor of his right to collect the warrant.

2. Under San Francisco Charter (St. 1856, p. 170, § 84), providing that the allowance or approval by the board of supervisors or any other board or officer of any demand which, upon the face of it, appears not to have been expressly made by law payable out of the treasury or fund to be charged therewith, shall afford no warrant to the treasurer for paying it, the treasurer is charged with knowledge of the objects for which public money in his custody may be expended, and, if a demand is presented to him which, on its face, appears to be for a claim not authorized by law, he should refuse to pay the same.

3. Where the board of supervisors issue a warrant which they are authorized to issue, the treasurer can exercise no discretion in regard to paying it.

4. San Francisco Charter (St. 1856, p. 145, § 1), providing that the city may purchase real property for the common benefit, is not a grant of unlimited power to purchase land, but declaratory of the corporate capacity to be exercised under the limitations subsequently provided.

5. St. 1863, p. 168, authorizing the board of supervisors of San Francisco "to allow and order paid out of the general fund, not to exceed $6,000 for any one year, for the support of" a smallpox hospital, does not authorize the board to purchase a site for such a hospital.

6. St. 1863, p. 540, authorizing the board of supervisors of San Francisco, to make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the prevention of contagious diseases, does not authorize the board to purchase a site for a smallpox hospital.

7. Const. art. 11, § 11, authorizing a city to make all such police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, does not authorize the purchase of a site for a smallpox hospital.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sander-son, Judge.

Mandamus by A. W. Von Schmidt to compel James H. Widbur, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay a city warrant. Judgment was rendered for petitioner, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harry T. Creswell, for appellant. Tilden & Tilden, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In September, 1890, respondent made an offer in writing to the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to sell to the city certain real property therein, known as "Shag Rock," for the sum of $15,000. The communication was referred by the board of supervisors to the committee on health and police, and on the 2d of December, 1890, that committee reported in favor of the purchase, and its report was adopted by the board of supervisors. December 9, 1890, the board of supervisors adopted a resolution authorizing the committee on health and police to purchase the property on behalf of the city and county for the sum of $15,000, as a site for a smallpox hospital; the title to the said property to be first passed upon by the city and county attorney, and, if found perfect, then such purchase to be made. January 2, 1891, the city and county attorney gave to the committee his opinion that the title thereto was in the respondent, Von Schmidt, and on the same day Von Schmidt executed an instrument sufficient in form, and purporting to convey the property to the city and county of San Francisco, and delivered it to the chairman of the committee on health and police. At the meeting of the board of supervisors in the evening of that day the chairman of this committee presented the deed, and upon his motion the clerk was directed to "hold said deed in escrow until the consideration therefor had been duly allowed." At the same meeting of the board of supervisors a warrant or demand for the sum of $15,000 in favor of Von Schmidt was presented, and upon the approval of the auditing committee, to which it had been referred by said board, was allowed and ordered paid, and on the following day, after having been duly audited by the auditor, was presented to the treasurer for payment, and was by that officer registered, but was not paid. January 5, 1891, the board of supervisors passed a resolution purporting to repeal its action in allowing and ordering the payment of the demand and in authorizing the purchase of the property, and directing the treasurer not to pay the said demand, and also to cause the cancellation of its registration upon its books, and also directing the auditor to cancel all action in his office whereby the said demand had been audited, and the clerk of the board was directed to return to Von Schmidt his deed of conveyance. Under these resolutions entries were made on the books of the auditor and of the treasurer canceling their previous action in reference to the demand, and the clerk returned the deed, but Von Schmidt declined to receive it, and returned it to the custody of the clerk. January 6, 1891, Von Schmidt again presented the demand to the defendant, as treasurer, and demanded payment, which was refused; and on the 12th of January made application to the superior court for a writ of mandate directing the payment of the demand. Upon the hearing by that court judgment was rendered in favor of the petitioner. A motion for a new trial was made on behalf of the defendant and denied, and from this order the defendant has appealed.

The delivery of the deed by Von Schmidt to the chairman of the committee on health and police was sufficient, on his part, as a delivery to the city. That committee had been authorized by the board of supervisors to make the purchase, and to that extent was the agent of the city to which the delivery might be made, and the action of the supervisors in directing the clerk to hold the deed until the consideration therefor had been duly "allowed" was in accord with the purpose of Von Schmidt in delivering it to the chairman that it might be delivered to the city when the warrant was issued. The term "escrow" in the direction to the clerk had no technical significance, and did not change the character of the instrument or of its delivery, but was used in the same sense in which Von Schmidt stated that the delivery was made, viz. "If I received the warrant, the sale was complete, and, if not, I was to have the deed back." It was the ordinary case in which the delivery of the deed is to be made simultaneously with the payment of the purchase money. The mere act of the grantor in placing the deed in the hands of the grantee, without an intention thereby of parting with the control of the deed, does not render the delivery complete unless the purchase money is paid. The subsequent approval by the board of Von Schmidt's demand for the purchase money, and issuance to him of the warrant therefor, completed an acceptance of the deed by the city; and, if the board of supervisors had the power to make the purchase, the transaction would have been complete, and his title to the land transferred to and vested in the city, and his right to the purchase money would also have been complete. In Laforge v. Magee, 6 Cal. 650, it was held that when the holder of a county warrant had presented it for payment at a time when there was money in the treasury which had been appropriated for that purpose, his right to the money became fixed, and could not be destroyed by a subsequent legislative enactment. The subsequent action of the board of supervisors, purporting to repeal its allowance of the petitioner's claim, could not divest him of his right to the money. McConoughey v. Jackson (Cal.) 35 Pac. 863.

The writ of mandate is issued to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085); and, unless there is some duty enjoined by law upon the defendant to pay the claim of the petitioner, the writ ought not to issue. Section 82 of the act incorporating the city and county of San Francisco, commonly known as the "Consolidation Act" (St. 1856, p. 169), declares: "No payment can be made from the treasury or out of the public funds of said city and county unless the same be specifically authorized by this act, nor unless the demand which is paid be duly audited as in this act provided, and that must appear upon the face of it." Section 84 of the same act also provides that, before any demand upon the treasury can be paid, it must be presented to the auditor and allowed; and further declares that "the allowance or approval of the auditor or board of supervisors, or any other board or officer, of any demand which, upon the face of it, appears not to have been expressly made by law payable out of the treasury or fund to be charged therewith, shall afford no warrant to the treasurer, or other disbursing officer, for paying the same"; and in section 86, as amended in 1857 (St. 1857, p. 217), it is provided that "every officer who shall approve, allow or pay any demand on the treasury not authorized by this act shall be liable to the city and county individually and on his official bond for the amount of the demand so illegally approved, allowed or paid." Section 95 of the act, as amended in 1857 (St. 1857, p. 218), limits the objects for which the public moneys may be expended by declaring that "payments of demands on the treasury of said city and county may be made for the following objects, and none others"; and, after enumerating these objects, provides in the fifteenth subdivision that "expenditures previously authorized by the board of supervisors, in the lawful exercise of their powers, for objects other than those specified in the preceding fourteen subdivisions of this section may be paid out of the surplus fund as specified in sections 97 and 98, but not otherwise." Acts giving additional authority for some special expenditure of public moneys have been passed by the legislature from time to time, but the restrictions placed upon the payment of moneys out of the treasury in the original act have never been modified. From these provisions it appears that it is the duty of the treasurer to examine every claim presented to him for payment, and that the mere fact that the claim has been allowed by the supervisors or approved by the auditor does not of necessity impose upon him the duty to pay it. He is charged with a knowledge of the objects for which the public moneys in his custody may be expended; and if a demand is presented to him which on its face appears to be for a claim not authorized by law, or for an expenditure which was beyond the power of the supervisors to incur, he is required to refuse such payment. Upon the face of the demand presented to the treasurer by the petitioner herein it appears that it was for the payment for certain real property purchased from him by the board of supervisors in behalf of the city and county "as a site for a smallpox hospital," and the treasurer was required to determine whether such purpose was within the power of the board of supervisors. If the board of supervisors had the authority to make this purchase, it was his duty to pay the demand; whereas, if they did not have such authority, he was justified in refusing to pay it.

The validity of Von Schmidt's title to the land purchased cannot be inquired into in this proceeding. The condition in the resolution for its purchase, that the purchase should be made if the title was found perfect, was addressed to the committee, and was to be determined upon the examination and report upon the title by the city and county attorney, and his subsequent opinion that the title was in Von Schmidt was not open for revision by the treasurer. The treasurer is not authorized to review the action of the board of supervisors in any matter within their power upon which they have exercised their legislative judgment or discretion. He is not justified in refusing the payment of any demand for an expenditure which the board of supervisors is authorized to make, and which it has allowed and ordered paid. It is only when it directs the payment for an expenditure which it has no power to incur that the treasurer is justified in refusing to make the payment. The rule is so familiar as to be trite that a municipal corporation can exercise only such powers as have been conferred upon it in its charter, or by some general law, and that any person, in dealing with it, is charged with a knowledge of every limitation upon its power to contract a liability. This rule is not, however, to be so considered as to require an authority in express terms for the performance of every municipal act. If an express power to accomplish some result has been conferred, it will carry with it the authority to do such subsidiary acts as are incidental and necessary to the exercise of that power. The rule, as stated by Mr. Dillon (1 Mun. Corp. [4th Ed.] § 89), and approved in various authorities, is that: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no others: First, those granted in express words; second, those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; third, those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation,—not simply convenient, but indispensable. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied." And in section 91 the same author says: "The rule of strict construction of corporate powers is applicable to grants of powers to municipal and public bodies, which are out of the usual range, or which may result in public burdens, or which in their exercise touch the right to liberty or property, or, as it may be compendiously expressed, any common-law right of the citizen or inhabitant." There is a marked distinction between the incidental powers that are implied in favor of the acts of a business corporation and those of a municipal corporation. The inability of a business corporation to avoid its obligation upon the plea of ultra vires, when it has received and retained the consideration for its obligation, has no application to a municipal corporation. The former is organized for the profit of its members, and its executed acts in purported furtherance of that object, unless restrained by its charter or prohibited by positive law, will be upheld; whereas municipal corporations are organized for governmental purposes, and invested with a portion of the authority which properly appertains to the sovereign power of the state, and can exercise only such powers as are expressly conferred or necessarily implied. As the power of raising money by taxation is conferred for the purpose of defraying the public expenditures, and is to be exercised only for the purpose of meeting such expenditures, the limitation upon this power is effected by limiting the objects for which the moneys may be expended. This power of taxation is one of the highest attributes of sovereignty, and as a municipality seeking to exercise it must find express authority from the legislature, so its power to disburse the public moneys, being correlative to the power of taxation, must equally find express authority for its exercise. The purchase of real estate, by itself considered, is not the exercise of any governmental function, and such purchase by a municipality can be sustained only by the production of an express authority from the legislature therefor, or upon its being shown that it is necessarily incidental to the exercise of some express function of government with which the municipality is charged.

It is conceded in the brief on behalf of the respondent that there is no statutory provision which in so many words states that the city and county of San Francisco shall have the power to purchase a site for a smallpox hospital; but it is contended by him that such power is inherent in a municipal corporation, and necessarily incident to the powers already granted, and to the discharge of its governmental functions; and in support of this proposition he cites certain provisions of the consolidation act and certain statutes subsequently enacted. The provision in section 1 of the consolidation act, that the corporation then known as the city of San Francisco should remain and continue to be a body politic and corporate by the name of the city and county of San Francisco, and declaring that by that name it "may purchase, receive, hold and enjoy real and personal property, and sell, convey, mortgage and dispose of the same for the common benefit," is to be considered not as a grant of unlimited power to do the acts therein enumerated, but merely as declaratory of the corporate capacity and power of the body politic, to be exercised in the mode and under the limitations subsequently provided in the act. The powers of a municipality are to be exercised through its legally constituted agents,—its officers, boards, or departments,—and the authority of each officer, board, or department to exercise any of the corporate power with which the municipality has been clothed must be distinctly conferred upon that officer, board, or department, or its act will create no obligation against the municipality. As the obligation sought to be enforced in the present case is claimed to arise solely from the acts of the board of supervisors, only the powers of that board to create the obligation need to be considered. The powers of this board, as conferred by the original act of incorporation, are contained in article 5, §§ 65-74 of the act, and in section 67 it is declared: "The powers of the board of supervisors are those granted in this act, and they are prohibited from exercising any others." Other statutes conferring additional and specific powers upon the board have been enacted by the legislature from time to time, and these statutes have been held to be in the nature of amendments to, and to form a part of, the charter of the city and county. By the act of April 4, 1863 (St. 1863, p. 168), the board of supervisors were authorized "to allow and order paid out of the general fund, not to exceed the sum of six thousand dollars for any one year, for the support of the smallpox hospital of said city and county." The authority to purchase land "as a site for a smallpox hospital" cannot be implied from the power conferred upon the board of supervisors by this statute. Aside from the fact that this statute makes no mention of real estate, or of any purchase thereof, its language limits the power to the expenditure of "six thousand dollars for any one year," and the money thus allowed to be expended is for the "support" of the smallpox hospital,—words which eminently refer to an existing hospital, rather than to one to be thereafter brought into existence. It is not to be inferred that when the legislature was thus careful in limiting the amount of money to be expended, and in the language in which it described the mode of its expenditure, it intended to confer an unlimited authority upon the board of supervisors to expend any amount of money that it might choose for the purchase of a site for the hospital for whose support it had thus provided. The provision in the twentieth subdivision of section 74 of the consolidation act, as amended in 1861 (St. 1861, p. 552), giving to the board of supervisors power "to provide for the care and maintenance of the indigent sick of said city and county, but not to incur any expense therefor exceeding the sum of three thousand dollars a month," is subject to the same observation, and the expenditure thus authorized is particularly provided for in the thirteenth subdivision of section 95 (St. 1857, p. 219), which directs its payment as follows: "Out of the general fund bills duly audited for expenditures in the care and maintenance of the indigent sick of the city and county, previously authorized by the board of supervisors, and not exceeding the amount in this act limited for that purpose." The "indigent sick" is a class distinct from that to be cared for in the smallpox hospital; and the subsequent act in 1863, by which additional power was given to the supervisors to allow "six thousand dollars for any one year" for the support of the smallpox hospital, shows that this provision had no connection with the provision in the original act for the support of the indigent sick. Further confirmation of this construction of the provision in section 74 is found in the act of 1865 (St. 1865, p. 214), by which, when the city desired to build an almshouse and hospital, express authority was granted by the legislature, either to set apart land belonging to the city, or to purchase land therefor, if the land owned by the city was not suitable. Nor did the board of supervisors derive authority to purchase the land in question from the power given by the act of April 25, 1863 (St. 1863, p. 540), "to make all regulations which may be necessary or expedient for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases," or from the provisions in section 11 of article 11 of the constitution, giving authority to the city "to make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." The "regulations" which the board of supervisors is thus authorized to make are rules of conduct to be observed by the citizens, and cannot, by any construction of language, be held to include the purchase of real estate; nor can the power to make such purchase be implied from the authority to make the regulations. Ketcham v. City of Buffalo, 14 N. Y. 360. We are of the opinion that in none of these statutes has the legislature conferred upon the city and county of San Francisco the authority to purchase any real estate as a site for a smallpox hospital, and, consequently, that the board of supervisors had no authority to make the purchase of real estate for which the demand was given to the petitioner, and that the action of the treasurer in refusing to pay the demand was in the exercise of an authority conferred upon him by the terms of the consolidation act. The order denying a new trial is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

Ex parte BUCKLEY. (No. 21,190.)

HABEAS CORPUS—PETITION FOR WRIT.

A petition for a writ of habeas corpus to release one held on a criminal charge, which merely alleges that no evidence was taken in the preliminary examination showing or tending to show petitioner's guilt, is insufficient.

In bank.

J. A. Buckley, held to answer a charge for forging election returns, petitions for a writ of habeas corpus. Denied.

J. J. Guilfoyle and Ben B. Haskell, for petitioner. W. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petition in this case is substantially the same as that in Ex parte Walpole, reported in 84 Cal. 584, 24 Pac. 308, where it was held that the matters alleged were insufficient to justify the issuance of the writ. But, as some members of the court were in doubt as to the correctness of that decision, we concluded, after some hesitation, to treat this petition as sufficient, and issue the writ, to which the sheriff has made his return, showing that he holds the petitioner under and by virtue of a commitment based upon an order of a committing magistrate, holding him to answer for the offense of forging election returns, and willfully substituting forged and counterfeit returns of an election in place of true returns, etc. The evidence adduced upon the examination of the petitioner, with the exception of some exhibits, consisting of the election returns in question, and other documents, which are in the official custody of the registrar of voters, has been produced for our inspection, from which it appears that the offense above specified has been committed.

As to the person or persons who made the alterations, the evidence is less satisfactory, but we cannot say that it was insufficient to warrant the committing magistrate to hold the petitioner to answer. Upon a reconsideration of the point decided in Ex parte Walpole, supra, we are satisfied that it was correctly decided, and that the petition in this case was insufficient to call for the issuance of the writ. The petitioner is remanded.

TURNER v. LUNING. (No. 15,640.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 20, 1894.)

SALE OF NOTE—EVIDENCE—OTHER LIKE SALES.

1. A judgment rendered on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed for want of sufficient evidence to support it.

2. On an issue as to whether plaintiff had bought a note from defendant, where there was evidence that plaintiff bought at a great discount, evidence that at about the same time defendant had sold other notes at a great discount was admissible.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Richard B. Turner against John N. Luning on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Langhorne, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The action is upon a promissory note made by defendant in January, 1883, for $1,500, and interest at 2 per cent. per month, payable to himself or order, and indorsed by him. Defendant admits the making of the note, but denies that it was ever sold to the plaintiff, or that the latter ever owned it. The only real question in the case is whether we should reverse the judgment for a want of sufficient evidence to support it. But the evidence was clearly conflicting, within the rule so often heretofore announced. Plaintiff testifies that defendant brought the note to him, and offered to sell it to him for $300, and that he bought the note for said sum, and paid it to defendant. This, he says, was on the 30th of January or 1st of February, 1883. Defendant testifies that he never sold the note to plaintiff, nor delivered it to him, nor received from him $300, or any sum of money whatever; but that he delivered the note to one Wasserman for the purpose of having it negotiated by Wasserman, and that Wasserman failed to negotiate it, and that he had never heard of the note afterwards until this suit was brought. Wasserman testifies that, to the best of his recollection, he gave the note to plaintiff upon the latter's representation that he could sell it, and that plaintiff afterwards informed him that he could not do anything with it. Plaintiff, however, says that he returned the note to Wasserman, and that defendant afterwards himself brought it to him, and sold it to him as aforesaid. Considering all the details of the testimony, the best that can be said of it favorable to appellant is that it is doubtful whether the preponderance of the evidence was on the side of respondent; but there is no such lack of substantial evidence in favor of respondent as would warrant us in disturbing the judgment.

We do not think that the court committed any material error in allowing evidence to the point that appellant had sold other notes about that time at a great discount. This was proper to account for the great discrepancy between the face of the note and the amount paid for it by the respondent. The appellant was impecunious at the time, but seems to have had great expectations.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MARTIN v. SANTA BARBARA COUNTY. (No. 18,449.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1894.)

COUNTY GOVERNMENT ACT—TIME OF TAKING EFFECT—COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

County Government Act, § 183 (St. 1893, p. 346), provides that "in counties of the twenty-first class the county officers shall receive as compensation * * * the following 'salaries,'" and this formula is repeatedly used in the act with reference to the difference classes of counties. Subdivision 14 of section 183 provides that constables shall be allowed certain "fees," not to exceed a certain amount monthly. Subdivision 17 provides that such section shall take effect immediately, except as to the "salaries" of present incumbents; and section 237 provides that the act shall, except as otherwise provided, take effect on the first Monday after January 1, 1895. Held, that the word "salary," as used in section 183, means "compensation," and applies to all officers enumerated in the various subdivisions, whether they are paid in fixed salaries or in fees; so that by subdivision 17 the act does not become operative as to incumbents of the office of constable in counties of the class designated until the first Monday after January 1, 1895.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by D. W. Martin against the county of Santa Barbara. Plaintiff had judgment for less than his claim, and appeals. Reversed.

Boyce & Taggart and C. A. Storke, for appellant. Thos. McNulta, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This action was brought to recover the sum of $359.40 for fees alleged to be due plaintiff as a constable of the second township of said county. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, written findings filed, and a judgment rendered thereon in favor of plaintiff for $222.70 and costs, from which judgment said plaintiff appeals.

The cause was submitted to the court upon the pleadings and upon a certain written stipulation of facts agreed to and signed by the attorneys for the respective parties, from which it appears that plaintiff claims that he is entitled to the sum demanded in his complaint as constable fees under an act to regulate fees and salaries, etc., approved March 5, 1870, and it is admitted that plaintiff is entitled thereto if said last-mentioned act is in force. Defendant admits that plaintiff is entitled to compensation for the services set out in his complaint under "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments," approved March 24, 1893, but that such recovery should not be had in this action, for the reason that the claim was not presented to the board of supervisors properly itemized and verified as required by said last-mentioned act, and was rejected by the supervisors for that reason. It is admitted that the sum of $222.70 is the amount which would be due to plaintiff upon due presentation under the act of March 24, 1893. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $222.70, being the amount due as per the act of March 24, 1893, which, for the sake of convenience, will be referred to herein as the "county government act." Plaintiff, as before stated, appeals from the judgment, and contends that he was entitled to compensation under the statute of 1870. The cause comes up upon the judgment roll without a statement or bill of exceptions.

We are not concerned to inquire into the sufficiency of the presentation by plaintiff of his claim to the board of supervisors under the county government act, for the reason that the court below held the presentation and verification sufficient, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff thereon under said act. Respondent is not appealing from the judgment, and is not, therefore, in a position to question its validity. There is no contention but that the claim as presented was duly itemized, verified, and presented as required by the fee bill of 1870, and, if that statute is still in force, the claim should have been allowed by the board of supervisors for $359.40, and judgment should have been rendered therefor; while, if the county government act of 1893 was in force and applicable, the judgment is correct, and should be affirmed.

The county of Santa Barbara, of which plaintiff is a constable, is a county of the twenty-first class, as designated in the county government act of March 24, 1893, and the fees claimed by plaintiff are for services rendered in April, May, and June of 1893. Section 183 of the county government act ("An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments"), approved March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 346), provides as follows: "In counties of the twenty-first class the county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries, to wit." Then follow subdivisions of the section fixing the salary of the clerk, sheriff, recorder, etc., at a given sum per annum; giving to the coroner, public administrator, and surveyor "such fees as are now or may hereafter be allowed by law." The thirteenth subdivision fixes the fees of justices of the peace, which are to be charged and collected for their own use. The fourteenth subdivision provides that "constables shall be allowed to charge and collect for their own use fees as follows." Then follows the schedule of fees allowed for the discharge of various duties, followed with the proviso that no constable shall receive in any one month a sum in excess of $125 in criminal cases, or a sum in excess of $30 in vagrancy cases, "and his claim against the county shall so state." For services not enumerated he is allowed the same fees as are allowed the sheriff for like services. The seventeenth and last subdivision of the section is as follows: "This section shall take effect immediately, except such provisions as affect the salaries of the present incumbents." Section 234 of the act is as follows: "The provisions of this act, unless otherwise herein provided, so far as it relates to the compensation and salaries of all officers named, shall not affect the present incumbents; provided, that when the salary of any such officer, or fees in lieu of such salary, is not fixed by law, the same shall as to such officer take effect immediately." Section 235 applies the law to new counties to be thereafter created or organized, and provides that the salaries of officers in counties the population of which has been decreased by the organization of new counties shall not be affected during the terms for which they shall have been elected. Section 237 is as follows: "This act shall, except as herein otherwise provided, take effect on the first Monday after the first day of January, eighteen hundred and ninety-five." The contention of appellant is that subdivision 14 does not affect the present incumbents of the office of constable of Santa Barbara county. In aid of this contention it is urged that the term "salaries" in subdivision 17 of said section 183 must be construed to include the word "fee," and to be as general as the word "compensation" in its meaning. It will be observed that section 183, hereinbefore quoted, provides that county officers in counties of the twenty-first class "shall receive as compensation * * * the following salaries," and then follow the titles of the several officers, and the provisions fixing their compensation, which in some instances consists of a fixed salary per annum, and in others of fees. The word "salary" signifies the periodical compensation due to men in official and other situations. The word is derived from "salarium," which is from the word "sal" (salt), that being an article in which the Roman soldiers were paid. Black, Law Dict. tit. "Salary"; Cowdin v. Huff, 10

Ind. 85. While the term "salary" in its original and strict sense signifies a fixed compensation, it is frequently used in our constitution and laws as the equivalent of "compensation." In Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal., at page 396, 25 Pac. 488, it was said: "The words 'compensation' and 'salary' were evidently used synonymously in the constitution and in the county government act." The phrase, "The county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries," is repeated at least 50 times, at the commencement of as many sections, applicable to counties of different classes, in each of which provision is made for the remuneration of some of the officers by fixed and stated sums per annum, and for others by fees of office as now provided by law or as shall be hereafter provided. I regard the conclusion as irresistible that the term "salary," as used in this connection, is used not in its original and restricted sense, but in the broader and more comprehensive sense of "compensation," and as applying equally to all officers included in the act whose compensation is fixed thereby, whether such compensation is limited to a fixed sum of money, or is payable in fees, or in fees not exceeding a certain fixed amount for the performance of certain specified duties, as in the case of constables. It is, therefore, held that the term "salary," used in section 183, was intended to apply and does apply to all the officers included in the twenty-first class, viz. county and township officers therein specified.

Subdivision 17 of section 183 of the act, which, as before shown, provides that "this section shall take effect immediately, except such provisions as affect the salaries of the present incumbents," must receive the same interpretation as is given to it in its previous occurrence in the section; that is to say, that while it is to take effect at once, it does not do so as to the officers whose salaries are fixed by the section, whether by fees or by a fixed lump sum per annum. In other words, the term "salaries" in the seventeenth subdivision of section 183 must be construed as broadly as the same word where it first occurs in the first clause of the same section, and must be held not to take effect as to the compensation of the officers enumerated until the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1895, when, by the 237th section, the act, except as otherwise provided, takes effect. This view leaves the law to take effect at once in the cases provided for in sections 234 and 235, viz. in cases where the compensation of officers is not fixed by law, and in counties within the twenty-first class, created or organized after the passage of the act, and to all matters contained in said section 183 as do not relate to the compensation of officers. These views render it unnecessary to consider other questions raised by appellant. The judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for $359.40 and costs of suit.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for $359.40 and costs of suit.

PEOPLE v. WORTHINGTON. (No. 21,084.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1894.)

HOMICIDE—INSANITY AS DEFENSE — HYPNOTISM—EVIDENCE—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

1. On a prosecution for murder, a witness for the state may, on cross-examination, be asked if deceased was not her lover, to show her spite against defendant.

2. Where a witness, on cross-examination by the state, denies having stated out of court that defendant had done certain things, evidence to contradict him is inadmissible, as his statements are not evidence against defendant.

3. To prove insanity, defendant's family physician may be asked if he did not consider defendant "weak-minded."

4. Evidence showing that defendant was told by her husband to kill deceased, and that she did so, does not tend to prove that defendant was hypnotized, and render admissible evidence of the effect of hypnotism on people subject to its influence.

5. Where, to prove defendant's insanity, evidence of her account of the homicide is admitted, it is proper to instruct that such evidence can only be considered as bearing on defendant's mental condition.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Louisa Worthington was convicted of murder, and appeals. Reversed.

Robert Ferral and Burnette G. Haskell, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, for the People.

TEMPLE, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state's prison for the term of 25 years. Her motion for a new trial was denied, and she appeals. The defendant is a young married woman, having been born in England in 1870. She was the mother of two children. In January, 1893, she met the deceased, while he was doing some plumbing on the premises where she resided. Her husband was then absent, in Europe. Illicit relations were immediately established between herself and Baddeley. In February the husband returned, and, soon after, defendant eloped with Baddeley, taking with her her youngest child. They went to Stockton, where, after about 10 days, Baddeley deserted her, leaving her entirely destitute. The husband had in the meantime got on the track of her, and took her home. He forgave her, so he says, because of the children, and because he thought she was not right in her mind. Annie Kelly had been a servant in defendant's family, and, when Mr. Worthington went to Europe, he employed her to stay with the defendant. Annie knew all about the illicit relations between defendant and deceased, and, as she testified, acted as a "go-between" for them. After defendant had been forgiven and taken back by her husband, she continued to correspond with Baddeley, both directly and by procuring Annie Kelly to write to him for her. She assured him of her continued regard, and urged him to return. In one letter to Baddeley, written March 18th, she said: "He [her husband] said that he will give me a week's time in which to find you, and, when I do, I must shoot you, or be shot myself. So what am I going to do? I am sure I don't know what to do unless I shoot myself. I think that is the best thing to do. I would not give you away to save my life. I love you too much to do that." April 26th, Baddeley, who had been away for a month or two, returned to San Francisco, and on the same day had a clandestine meeting with defendant. The meeting was by appointment, and was arranged through Annie Kelly. The record does not disclose the nature of the interview. The next day Baddeley called upon defendant during the absence of her husband, and, as defendant told her husband, tried to ravish her, whereupon she fired at him three times with a pistol. On the 1st of May, according to her story to her husband, Baddeley met her on the street, and again proposed a renewal of the illicit relation. The next morning Mr. Worthington saw Baddeley in the street, watching his windows, and went out, and procured a pistol for his wife. He gave it to her, at the same time telling her: "You protect yourself, protect your honor. I have brought you home, and agreed to forgive everything;" and, further: "Here is a gun. You protect yourself, and if he interferes with you, or attempts to interfere with you, again, you kill him, and I will do the same." That evening, at about half past 4 o'clock, deceased was seen on the wharf, leaning against a pile of sacks. The defendant walked up to him, and fired four shots at him from a pistol, when she was interfered with and arrested. She seemed not at all excited. Three shots took effect on the deceased, causing his death.

The defense was insanity and hypnotism. Annie Kelly was an important witness for the prosecution. She testified as to the improper relations which existed between defendant and Baddeley, of devices on the part of the defendant to deceive her husband. The evidence tended to show, and was evidently introduced for the purpose of showing, depraved conduct on the part of defendant; that she was not seduced from a state of innocence by the deceased. A number of letters were read in connection with her testimony, which she claimed were written by her at the instance of the defendant, and addressed to Baddeley. They were mostly written during the short period that the deceased was absent from the city. They assured deceased of the great affection of defendant for deceased, and implored him to return to her. As Baddeley did return, and was soon thereafter killed by defendant, the effect they were likely to have is obvious. There were in the letters many expressions of affection for Baddeley on the part of Annie Kelly herself. She sometimes implores him to return for her sake, and also expresses great disgust for her friend Dolf, for having loved whom she says she must suffer. In one letter she used the expression: "I must tell you I am disappointed, for the quicker I have it the better for me." Defendant's counsel asked: "What do you mean by that?" It was objected to as not cross-examination. Defendant's counsel then explained that he wished to show by it that the relation of mistress and lover existed between the witness and the deceased, in order to show the animus of the witness. The objection was still insisted upon that it was not cross-examination. No other objection was made, and it was sustained. The intent was, doubtless, to show that the remark referred to a criminal operation upon herself which the witness contemplated. If this were shown, it would tend to explain the urgent requests to Baddeley to return, and also to prove a special spite against defendant for having killed her lover. The best comment upon this ruling is found in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 446: "The power of cross-examination has been justly said to be one of the principal, as it certainly is one of the most efficacious, tests which the law has devised for the discovery of truth. By means of it the situation of the witness with respect to the parties, and to the subject of litigation, his interest, his motives, his inclination and prejudices, his means of obtaining a correct and certain knowledge of the facts to which he bears testimony, the manner in which he has used those means, his powers of discernment, memory, and description, are all fully investigated and ascertained, and submitted to the consideration of the jury before whom he has testified." To investigate just such matters as that is one of the best reasons for allowing cross-examinations at all.

Mr. Worthington, testifying for the defense, said that, in his efforts to find where his wife was, he called upon the Baddeleys. He there had some conversation, which he related. He was allowed to do this because he said he had related it to his wife, and the question of her sanity was being investigated. On cross-examination the people were allowed, over the objection of the defendant, to ask him if he did not in that conversation say that he once asked his wife to go to the Midwinter Fair, and that she did not go because she had a headache. He replied, denying that he had said so. The prosecution then called two witnesses who testified, against the objection of defendant, that he did so state. This was clearly error. The materiality of the evidence consists in the fact that another witness had said that defendant feigned headache to excuse herself from going to the fair, so that she might have an opportunity for a clandestine meeting with Baddeley. Admitting that Worthington could have been asked on cross-examination if he made the statement, because the remark was made in a conversation of which he had related a portion, still it was not binding upon his wife. His admission was not evidence against her. It was therefore immaterial whether he made the remark or not, and his denial was conclusive.

The family physician was called by the defense to prove insanity. He testified to having assisted at the birth of the two children, and that he also attended defendant for womb trouble. He was well acquainted with defendant and her ailments. He was also an expert upon the subject of mental disease. He was allowed to give testimony as to many peculiarities of the defendant, and he was asked: "From your treatment of her, from her ailments, and all you know of her, was she of an ordinarily good mind, or was she what you would ordinarily call a weak-minded woman?" This was objected to, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The objection was sustained, and defendant excepted. Apparently, the objection was sustained on the ground that the test of legal responsibility was whether the accused was capable of knowing right from wrong, and not whether she was weak-minded. This is true; but here it is alleged as a defense that, at the time of the homicide, defendant was insane, and therefore had not the capacity of knowing that the act was wrongful. To this inquiry the character and quality of defendant's mind is a material fact. It was a fact which might have a favorable or unfavorable effect to the defense, according to circumstances. Action which would seem strange or abnormal in a person of strong mind might not seem so in a person of weak mind. So, too, it might show a person predisposed to certain species of mental disease. The evidence of insanity in the case was certainly of the weakest; yet the counsel had a right to submit it to the jury, and I think the witness should have been permitted to answer the question.

Counsel offered testimony as to the effect of hypnotism upon those subject to such influence. The court ruled out the evidence, and, I think, rightly. There was no evidence which tended to show that the defendant was subject to the disease, if it be such. Merely showing that she was told to kill the deceased, and that she did it, does not prove hypnotism, or, at least, does not tend to establish a defense to a charge of murder.

The defendant did not testify as to any material fact in the case. But, in order to show that she was insane, her husband was allowed to testify as to what he had told her, and what she had told him. In this way her story—if it was her story—was got before the jury. The court then charged the jury, in effect, that this testimony was put in merely to show the mental condition of the defendant, and that her declarations thus introduced could not be regarded as proof of the facts stated or of her belief in them. This was correct. The declarations lacked the sanction of an oath, and should not have been considered by the jury except in connection with the claim that the defendant was insane.

I see no objection to any of the instructions. Those refused were, in substance, given elsewhere. For the errors noted, I think the judgment should be reversed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Ordered that the opinion and direction for judgment this day filed herein be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to direct the following judgment in said action:

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

LONDON & LANCASHIRE FIRE INS. CO.
v. LIEBES et al. (No. 15,784.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 22, 1894.)

ACTION FOR DECEIT — SHOWING OF DAMAGE—INSURANCE—FALSE PROOFS OF LOSS—MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED.

1. A complaint in an action for false representations in furnishing proofs of loss on an insurance policy, which admits that there were more goods in the building than were destroyed, and that the value of such goods was greater than the sum paid by plaintiff on the policy, but fails to allege the amount saved therefrom, or that the amount of loss given by defendant in the proofs of loss was false, is insufficient, since it does not show that plaintiff was damaged.

2. A complaint in an action to recover for money paid to defendants through their false representations in making proofs of loss on an insurance policy, which fails to allege a breach of contract by defendants, does not state a cause of action for money had and received.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by the London & Lancashire Fire Insurance Company against Louis Liebes and Jacob Liebes to recover money paid on insurance policies. Judgment for defendant Jacob Liebes, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. Estee & Miller, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from a judgment entered in favor of defendant Jacob Liebes upon his demurrer to plaintiff's complaint. Louis Liebes was not served. The complaint alleges: That the plaintiff on January 27, 1890, issued to Liebes Bros. & Co., a firm composed of Jacob and Louis Liebes, a policy of insurance in the sum of $2,500 upon merchandise, consisting of cigars and tobacco, in a building on Davis street, in the city and county of San Francisco. Other insurance was carried by the insured in some 15 other companies, the total amount carried being $59,500. That on November 13, 1890, a fire occurred, whereby said merchandise "was damaged and partially destroyed." That proofs of loss, sworn to by respondent, were presented, wherein it was claimed that the loss amounted to $65,705.60. "That in support of said claim of loss it was represented" by defendants that their stock of merchandise on hand on January 1, 1890, was of the value of $92,442.31. That between January 1st and the date of the fire they had purchased cigars and tobacco of the value of $174,376.62, and between the same dates their sales amounted to $196,481.89, of which last-named sum $44,432.78 were profits. That plaintiff believed said statements, and, relying thereon, "did, subsequent to the presentation of said proof, and prior to the commencement of this action, pay to the defendants the sum of $2,500, being the total amount of indemnity named in its said policy of insurance." The complaint then proceeds: "That the plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that each and all of said statements so made by defendants to the plaintiff in support of their said claim of loss were false and fraudulent," and made for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, and followed this allegation with a statement of the particulars in which it is claimed the statements were false, viz.: that the stock on hand January 1, 1890, was but $67,442.31; that, of the $174,376.62 purchased, $9,447.37 had not been received by defendants, and 54 bales of Sumatra tobacco, of the value of $10,025.25, were at the time of the fire in a bonded warehouse on Broadway, leaving the value of the goods purchased and put in the store between January 1 and November 13, 1890, $154,904; and that goods of the value of $781.20 were sold and not accounted for, which should be added to the sales represented, making such sales $152,830.31. According to these allegations, the merchandise in the building at the time of the fire stands thus:

On hand Jan. 1, 1890.....	$ 67,442 31
Purchased before Nov. 13.....	174,376 62
	$241,818 93
Mdse. sold	$152,830 31
Mdse. not received..	9,447 37
Mdse. in bond.....	10,025 25
	$172,302 93

In building Nov. 13th..... $ 69,516 00

The complaint further alleged that, in and by the terms of the policy, it was stipulated and agreed that the entire policy should be void in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to the insurance, or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss.

The 15 other insurance companies hereinbefore mentioned assigned their several claims to the plaintiff, and these claims were set up in different counts, in each of which were alleged the same facts we have above stated.

The demurrer was: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) that the allegation as to the time of payment is uncertain; (3) that several causes of action are improperly united; and (4) the statutes of limitation. A like demurrer was interposed to each count.

Appellant contends that the actual loss of the defendants by the fire was $20,451.78; that they received from the plaintiff and the other insurance companies $59,500 or $39,048.22 more than they were entitled to. The result is reached argumentatively, as follows: It is alleged that the loss was not total, but partial; that the proof of loss showed the amount of the actual loss to be $65,705.60; that defendants, in their statements or representations in support of their proofs of loss, represented that the total amount of merchandise in the building at the time of the fire was $114,769.82; that deducting the alleged actual loss therefrom, viz. $65,705.60, shows the salvage to have been $49,064.22, and deducting the salvage from the amount plaintiff alleges was in the building at the time of the fire, viz. $69,516, leaves $20,451.78 as the amount of actual loss. But this is mere matter of argument, which assumes facts not alleged. It is alleged that the proofs of loss presented by defendants showed the actual loss to be $65,705.60, and it is nowhere alleged that that statement was not true, nor that the actual loss was less than that sum, while it is alleged that there was in the building at the time of the fire a larger amount, viz. $69,516. It is alleged that the loss was partial, but the amount or value of the goods saved is nowhere alleged. It is alleged that, in support of the proofs of loss, it was falsely represented that the goods in the building were of the value of $114,769.82; but as it is conceded that the value of the goods in the building did exceed the amount of the actual loss claimed by defendants, and as the amount of the actual loss is not controverted, either directly or by an allegation of the amount or value of the goods saved, it must be taken as conceded that the actual loss was as claimed by defendants, since it may be true that the representation as to the total value of the goods in the building was false, and yet the actual loss have been the amount claimed. If, then, the action is to be regarded as one for fraud, the complaint is insufficient, since the actual loss exceeded the amount insured and paid by the plaintiff and its assignors, and therefore they were not injured. In Morrison v. Lods, 39 Cal. 381, it was said: "The rule is well settled that a recovery cannot be had for a false representation, without proof of damage." See, also, Patterson v. Donner, 48 Cal. 369; Baker v. Brown, 82 Cal. 64, 22 Pac. 879; Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 Pac. 58.

But it is further argued by appellant that the fraud and false representations of the defendants rendered the policy void, under the provision hereinbefore stated; that hence there was no consideration for the payment to the defendants; and that it may be recovered upon that ground, as money had and received,—and cases are cited to the effect that under such a policy any willfully false statement in the proof of loss after the fire, or of some pretended losses, will completely forfeit the entire policy, even though the actual loss truly stated exceeds the entire amount of the policy. Conceding, without deciding, the law in this regard to be as stated by the learned counsel, the complaint does not state a cause of action for money had and received. Such action is based upon a promise, express or implied, to pay the money to the plaintiff, and is therefore an action upon a contract, the breach of which is the nonpayment of the money, and no breach alleged. In Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71, it was said: "In an action for the breach of a contract, it is necessary to allege that the contract has been broken, and there is no difference in this respect between a promissory note and other contracts. 1 Chit. Pl. 332. The failure to pay constitutes the breach, and must be alleged." See, also, Roberts v. Treadwell, 50 Cal. 520; Scroufe v. Clay, 71 Cal. 123, 11 Pac. 882; Barney v. Vigoreaux, 92 Cal. 631, 28 Pac. 678.

As the judgment must be affirmed upon the ground already considered, it is not necessary to decide other questions discussed by counsel. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SANTA CRUZ ROCK PAVEMENT CO. v.
HEATON et al. (No. 15,609.)

STREET IMPROVEMENTS — SPECIFICATIONS BY CITY COUNCIL.

1. Act March 18, 1885, providing, in regard to street improvements, that "the city council may, by ordinance," prescribe general rules "as to the materials to be used and the mode of executing the work" under all subsequent contracts, is not mandatory, but leaves the matter to the discretion of the council.

2. Under Act March 18, 1885, plans and specifications for any particular street improvement need not be adopted by ordinance, a resolution of the council being sufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by the Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Company, a corporation, against W. D. Heaton and W. E. Miller, to enforce an assessment for street work. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Dunne & McPike, for appellants. Parker & Eells, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce the lien of an assessment of $413 on defendants' lot for work done by plaintiff on Broadway, in the city of Oakland, under contract with the superintendent of streets. The cause was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, whereupon judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which defendants appeal on the judgment roll, and contend here that the stipulated findings of fact do not support the judgment.

The street work for which the assessment was levied upon defendants' lot was done under "An act to provide for work upon streets," etc., approved March 18, 1885 (St. p. 147), in section 3 of which it is provided, among other things, that, "before passing any resolution for the construction of said improvements, plans and specifications and careful estimates of the costs and expenses thereof shall be furnished to said city council, if required by it, by the city engineer of said city, and for the work of constructing sewers specifications shall always be furnished by him." And in section 6 of the same act it is provided: "The city council may by ordinance prescribe general rules directing the superintendent of streets and the contractor as to the materials to be used, and the mode of executing the work, under all contracts thereafter made." It appears and is admitted that the plans, specifications, and estimates for the work in this case were required by and furnished to the city council by the city engineer in strict accordance with the above extract from section 3, and that such plans and specifications were made a part of the contract for doing the work, though the work did not include the construction of any sewer. But it likewise appears that the city council of Oakland never had by ordinance prescribed any general rule as to the materials to be used or the mode of executing any kind of street work before ordering the work in question to be done, though both the order and the contract for doing the particular work in this case sufficiently and with extraordinary particularity specified the materials to be used and the mode of doing the work.

Counsel for appellant contend, in substance, that the above extract from section 6 of the act is mandatory; and that strict obedience to its behest by the city council is a necessary condition precedent to the acquisition of jurisdiction of the council to order any street improvement to be made; and, consequently, that the resolution ordering the work to be done and the assessment in this case are void. To effect this construction, they interpret the word "may," in the extract from section 6, as meaning "shall" or "must," and attempt to justify this interpretation on the ground that it is necessary to effectuate the intended object of the legislature as manifested by the context of the statute in which the word is used. Primarily, and as ordinarily used in a statute, the word "may" does not denote the imperative mood of the verb to which it is attached, but merely imports permission, ability, possibility, or contingency, and should never be interpreted or understood as mandatory except by compulsion of the context in connection with which it is to be read, showing that the legislature must have used it in that sense. Minor v. Bank, 1 Pet. 64; Thompson v. Lessee of Carroll, 22 How. 434; State v. Neuner, 49 Conn. 233. There is nothing in section 6, or in the whole act of March 18, 1855, indicating that the legislature intended to command the city councils to prescribe general rules as to what kinds of materials should be used, or as to mode of executing work, or that anything more was intended by the above extract from section 6 than the ordinary import of the language of that extract, namely, that city councils are thereby permitted, in the exercise of their discretion, to prescribe such general rules as they deem practicable. It is improbable that the legislature deemed it practicable for city councils to prescribe such general rules as would be properly adapted to all the different kinds of street improvements, though it may have been deemed practicable to frame general rules applicable to some kinds of work. But, surely, there is nothing in the act indicating an intention to make the adoption of such general rules a condition precedent to jurisdiction of councils to order work to be done. The conditions precedent to such jurisdiction are fully provided in section 3; and, as above remarked, the stipulated findings show that all the conditions prescribed by section 3 were fully performed in this case.

The only other point made for appellants is that the plans and specifications were adopted by mere resolution of the council, and not by an ordinance signed by the mayor. It appears by the agreed statement that the resolution was passed by vote of 11 members of the council, and that it was signed by the president of the council. As the plans and specifications were specially adopted for a particular improvement, they were properly adopted by resolution. Only the general rules provided for by section 6 of the act need be adopted by ordinance.

I think the judgment should be affirmed.

A final decree of distribution sufficiently describes property when it names it as the whole of the R. ranch, which was purchased by deceased from R. by a certain deed recorded in a certain place, though, in further describing the land, it names two erroneous courses, the error in which is apparent from the fact that they do not answer the calls in the deed as to following the boundaries of adjoining owners.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by George Bates against Charles Webb Howard to recover money paid under a contract. Judgment in favor of plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Talcott, for appellant. Fox, Kellogg & King and Kellogg & King, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, granting a new trial. On the 27th day of August, 1887, the defendant made and executed an agreement in writing, of which the following is a copy: "San Francisco, August 27, 1887. For and in consideration of the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) to me in hand paid, and the receipt of which I hereby acknowledge, I agree to obtain for George Bates, of Berkeley, a deed to a certain tract of land situated in the county of Alameda, township of Brooklyn, state of California, and more particularly described as follows: A tract bounded on the west by that county road generally known as the 'Redwood Road,' on the south by the lands of A. J. Gladding, and on the east by the lands of Brennen and others, and on the north by unknown owners. Said tract of land being that formerly belonging to the O. L. Shafter estate, and described particularly in the final decree of distribution in the estate of O. L. Shafter, deceased, in the probate court of Alameda county, containing eighty-eight and twenty-one hundredths (88 21-100) acres. The following are the terms and conditions of said sale: George Bates shall pay to me a further sum of fifteen hundred dollars ($1,500) on or before Wednesday, August 31, 1887, and a further sum of twenty-two thousand six hundred and thirty-one and twenty-five hundredths dollars ($22,631.25) within forty-five days from the date of this agreement, and thirty thousand dollars ($30,000) within two years from the date of this agreement. In consideration of the above, I hereby agree to procure, and upon receipt of the said sum of $22,631.25, as hereinbefore mentioned, to deliver to the said George Bates a good and sufficient conveyance, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, of said property, from all the owners thereof, free of all incumbrances, except that provided for in this agreement. The said deferred payment of $30,000 shall be secured by a mortgage on said property, which shall be

BATES v. HOWARD. (No. 15,481.)

NEW TRIAL—NOTICE—TIME—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—VALIDITY AND EFFECT.

1. A nisi prius court may grant a new trial, though the trial was without a jury, and there was a substantial conflict of evidence.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 12, providing that the time within which any act is to be done is computed by excluding the first day and including the last, a notice of a hearing of an application for administration, posted July 12th, is sufficient, as a 10-days notice, to authorize a hearing July 22d.

3. A final decree of distribution, of a probate court, does not create title in the heirs, but simply releases the title—already vested in them, under Civil Code, § 1384, which provides that the property of one dying intestate shall, on his executed and delivered upon the delivery of said deed as above provided, and shall bear interest at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum until paid. I further agree to release from the effect of said mortgage any part of the said tract which may hereafter be sold by said George Bates, on payment to me of a sum not less than three-quarters of the purchase money received by said George Bates for sale of such part: provided that he shall not sell any part of the east half of the said tract for less than four hundred dollars ($400) an acre, nor any part of the west half of the said tract for less than eight hundred dollars ($800). Charles Webb Howard."

The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury; written findings filed, which are responsive to the issues made by the pleadings, and in the following language: "That on August 27, 1887, at the city and county of San Francisco, defendant made and entered into the agreement in writing with plaintiff, set forth in the complaint herein, and the sum of $1,000 was duly paid by plaintiff to defendant in pursuance of the terms of said agreement, and as part of the consideration for the procuring of a good and sufficient title to the real property therein described. (2) That it was also understood and agreed by and between the parties in the said instrument named, at the time of its execution, that the defendant should promptly furnish to said plaintiff, for his approval, an abstract of title to the premises aforesaid, but that none was furnished to plaintiff until about the 10th day of September, 1887, when defendant submitted to plaintiff, for his examination and approval, an abstract of the title to said property, which he proposed and designed to offer to plaintiff in fulfillment of the terms and conditions of said agreement, and for the money considerations paid and to be paid by plaintiff; that plaintiff was advised by his counsel that the title to said premises and property was imperfect, and not a marketable title, of all which defendant was properly notified, but neglected and refused to perfect said title, and make the same marketable, as requested by said plaintiff. (3) That, upon the neglect and refusal of said defendant to perfect and make the title to said property marketable, plaintiff demanded of said defendant the repayment of the said sum of $1,000 paid by plaintiff to defendant on account and in pursuance of the terms of said written agreement; that defendant then refused, and has ever since refused, to repay to said plaintiff the said sum of $1,000, or any part thereof, and has never repaid any part of the same. (4) That plaintiff was at all times ready and willing to do and perform everything in said written agreement contained, on his part to be done and performed, until the defendant refused to perfect and make good and marketable the title to said property. (5) That time was not of the essence of said written agreement; that the plaintiff complied with all the terms and conditions of said written agreement on his part to be kept and performed, so far as he was called upon so to do, either in law or equity. (6) That the title to said property was not, during any of the time or times herein mentioned, a marketable title, and defendant took no measures to make said title marketable, and has not complied with the terms and conditions of the said agreement on his part to be kept and performed. (7) That defendant, by his conduct and actions, rendered unnecessary the further fulfillment of the terms of said written agreement on the part of said plaintiff." From the facts thus found, the court concluded, as matter of law: (1) That the title to the property was not marketable. (2) That plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant $1,000 and interest, for which sum judgment was entered. Defendant, in due time, moved for a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the facts as found, errors of law occurring at the trial, etc., specifying the errors complained of. The motion was supported by a statement, and upon a hearing the motion was granted and a new trial ordered, from which order, as before stated, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

As before stated, the motion for a new trial was based upon various grounds, one of which was that the evidence failed to support the findings. It is a cardinal doctrine of this court, the oft enunciation of which has rendered it monotonous, that where, upon a question of fact, the testimony in the court below involves a substantial conflict, the action of such court below will not be disturbed. These considerations, however, do not prevail with the nisi prius court. There, although there may be what to us, judging from the cold record, seems a substantial conflict in the evidence, the court, having heard the evidence, and having had ample opportunity to judge as to the demeanor, manner, and credibility of the witnesses, may, if he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and is of opinion that it is clearly against the weight of evidence, set it aside, and grant a new trial. The judge of the superior court is in a position to determine between the apparent and the real; to detect the fallacy of specious testimony, which may have misled the jury, but which his wider experience enables him to readily comprehend. Like considerations apply to cases tried by the court without the intervention of a jury. In the hurry of a trial, or in the disposition of cases, deductions of fact and conclusions of law may be indulged, which, on maturer reflection, do not commend themselves to his judgment, and to say that he is to be bound by hasty or improvident action, as against his more mature judgment, and that in the face of those wise provisions of the law intended for just such emergencies, is to lose sight of one of the fundamental objects of trials at law, viz. the promotion of justice.

It is for these and other reasons, which might be mentioned, that a wide discretion is accorded to trial courts in the disposition of motions for new trials. Watson v. McClay, 4 Cal. 288; Weddle v. Stark, 10 Cal. 302; Burnett v. Whitesides, 15 Cal. 35; Quinn v. Kenyon, 22 Cal. 82; O'Brien v. Brady, 23 Cal. 243; Hall v. The Emily Banning, 33 Cal. 522; Harrison v. Peabody, 34 Cal. 178; Phelps v. Union Copper Min. Co., 39 Cal. 407; Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 406; Bronner v. Wetzlar, 55 Cal. 419; Hawkins v. Reichert, 28 Cal. 535; Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 565; Mason v. Austin, 46 Cal. 385; Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 576; Higuerra v. Bernal, 46 Cal. 581. We might continue to quote cases coming down to the present time, to like effect, but the foregoing are, in all reason, sufficient.

There was a substantial conflict in the evidence upon many of the issues, and upon some of them, at least, the testimony in favor of the plaintiff was by no means conclusive, or even satisfactory. To illustrate: Under the agreement, plaintiff paid $1,000 down, and was to pay an additional $1,500 on the 31st day of August,—four days after the agreement was made. This he did not pay. The reason given therefor was that defendant had agreed to promptly furnish plaintiff with an abstract of title, and failed to do so until some time in September. The testimony of plaintiff on this point was that there was an understanding that defendant should furnish an abstract, and that he did it. Defendant testified, in substance, that he made no agreement with plaintiff, except the one in writing, and added that defendant might subsequently have asked him to furnish an abstract, and he might have consented, and done so. Plaintiff, in rebuttal, said the abstract, as far as he believed, never came into his hands; that he saw it in the hands of his attorney, and, when asked if he ordered it prepared, said he did not remember anything about it, but was sure he never paid for it. This was practically all the evidence upon the point, and was the basis upon which the court found that defendant agreed to promptly furnish an abstract, but that none was furnished until September 10, 1887. This is referred to, not by reason of its importance, but as a sample of the uncertainty of the evidence upon many of the issues in the case. In view of these conditions of the evidence, the action of the court below in granting a new trial must be upheld.

There is another question, however, which, while it is not absolutely essential to a disposition of the case here, is yet of prime importance in its final disposition, and is certain to arise in any future trial upon the merits. It is that which relates to the title of the property, to which defendant agreed to procure for plaintiff a deed of conveyance. It was to be "a good and sufficient conveyance, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, of said property, from all the owners thereof, free of all incumbrances, except that provided for in this agreement." It appeared at the trial that the tract of land agreed to be conveyed to plaintiff was conveyed to Oscar L. Shafter, May 1, 1869, by John M. Redding and Rose Redding, his wife, by a conveyance in due form, which described it as being "the whole of Redding's ranch," situate, etc., and then describing it by courses and distances, etc., and containing 88.21 acres. This description is conceded to be correct. Oscar L. Shafter died intestate prior to July 12, 1873, leaving, as heirs at law, a widow and several children. On the 12th day of July, 1873, James McM. Shafter and Charles Webb Howard filed a petition, in due form, in the probate court of Alameda, praying to be appointed administrators of the estate of said Oscar L. Shafter. On the same day an order was made by said court, fixing July 22, 1873, as the day for hearing said petition, and directing 10 days' notice of the hearing of said petition to be given by posting, etc. The notice was posted on said 12th day of July, etc., and a hearing had, and said petitioners appointed administrators, on said 22d day of July. Objection No. 1 to the title of the heirs is founded upon the allegation that the notice above mentioned was not posted 10 days, as required by the statute and order of the court. Such proceedings were thereafter had in the matter of the estate, that in 1885 a final decree of distribution of the real property of said estate to the heirs thereof (naming them, and the interest of each therein) was had, which, as the record states, "was regular in form, and regularly and properly distributed the property in dispute; the only question here made under such decree of distribution being as to the description of the property, and that in such decree of distribution this property is described as follows." Then follows a description stating that it is known as the "Redding Tract," containing 88.21 acres, situate, etc., "being the whole of the Redding ranch," and describing it by courses and distances, and further describing it as "being the property conveyed to Oscar L. Shafter, by John M. and Rose Redding, by deed dated May 1, 1869, recorded in Alameda County Records, book 41, pages 192-193-194." The description by courses and distances in the decree of distribution is in all respects the same as in the deed to Shafter, except that two courses in the decree are erroneous; the one reading 26° 30' E., instead of 36° 30' E., as in the deed, and the other reading 29° W., instead of 49° W., as in said deed. The evidence showed, without contradiction, that since the purchase by said Shafter, in 1869, the ranch or land had been in the possession of said Shafter and his heirs; that it was inclosed by a good, substantial fence; that all taxes had been paid by them; and that it was generally known as the "Redding ranch." Under these circumstances, plaintiff contended in the court below, and, as appellant, contends here, that the heirs at law of Oscar L. Shafter (from whom it is conceded the conveyance was to come, under defendant's agreement) could not convey a valid title to the land in question to plaintiff; and this is the second question presented in relation to said title. The court below, upon the foregoing facts, which are not disputed, found, as a fact and a conclusion of law, that the title was not a marketable title, and hence that defendant had not complied with his agreement.

The notice posted on the 12th day of July, giving notice of a hearing of the petition on the 22d day of the same month, was sufficient as a 10-days notice, under section 1373 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 12 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the time within which any act provided by law is to be done is computed by excluding the first day and including the last, unless the last day is a holiday, and then it is also excluded." In Misch v. Mayhew, 51 Cal. 514, section 1116 of the same Code, which provided for a notice of three days, was construed by this court, and it was said: "The case is, therefore, covered by section 12 of the same Code, and a list served on the 7th of December could properly be relied upon and proven at the trial on the 10th of December." See, also, Landregan v. Peppin, 86 Cal., at page 126, 24 Pac. 859, and Hagenmeyer v. Mendocino Co., 82 Cal. 214, 23 Pac. 14.

The second and more important question for consideration relates to the sufficiency of the title vested in the heirs of Oscar L. Shafter, to answer the requirement of defendant's agreement. There is no contention as to the willingness of the heirs to convey, but the question relates to their power to do so, viz. their power to convey the land described in defendant's agreement as the land that formerly belonged to the O. L. Shafter estate, and described in the final decree of distribution of said estate. We assume at the outset that defendant, under his agreement with plaintiff, was bound, not simply to obtain for the latter a conveyance in form,—a semblance or muniment of title,—but a conveyance of the land itself, and the fee simple title thereto. Civ. Code, § 1105. When Oscar L. Shafter departed this life, in 1873, the title to the land in question being vested in him, such title at once, and by operation of law, passed to his heirs, subject only to administration. "The property, both real and personal, of one who dies without disposing of it by will, passes to the heirs of the intestate, subject to the control of the probate court, and to the possession of any administrator appointed by that court for the purposes of administration." Civ. Code, § 1334. See Code Civ. Proc. § 1452. Section 1384 of the Civil Code, quoted above, was adopted in its present form in 1884, but is declarative of the law as previously interpreted by this court. Brenham v. Story, 39 Cal. 179; Estate of Donahue, 36 Cal. 329; Estate of Wood- worth, 31 Cal. 604; Chapman v. Hollister, 42 Cal. 463. The title of the heirs did not originate in the decree of distribution, but came to them from their ancestor; and the settlement of the estate in the probate court, and the final decree of distribution in that court, only served to release their property from the conditions to which, as the estate of a deceased person, it was subject. Waiving all this, however, and waiving the fact that all that defendant had agreed to have conveyed to plaintiff was the land "described particularly in the final decree of distribution," and assuming that the decree of distribution was essential, to the end of perfecting the title of the heirs, and we are of opinion that the description therein is amply sufficient to secure that result. It was described as "the whole of the Redding ranch." It was described as the property purchased by Shafter from Redding and wife by deed dated May 1, 1869, and the place of record thereof specified. That a grant of real property, having a descriptive name, may be described by such name, is elementary. Civ. Code, § 1092. The erroneous courses are apparent on their face, when applied to the land, for the reason that they do not answer the calls in the deed, as to following the boundaries of adjoining owners and the county road. Under such circumstances, the description being perfect without the erroneous courses, and the latter being apparent, they will be rejected as surplusage. It was said in Copertini v. Oppermann, 76 Cal., at page 186, 18 Pac. 256: "The words 'good title' import that the owner has the title, legal and equitable, to all the land; and the words 'defective title' mean that the party claiming to own has not the whole title, but some other person has title to a part or portion of the land." If the heirs of Oscar L. Shafter have not the title, legal and equitable, to the land in question, we are at a loss to determine where it is vested. Their right to the land, and to every part of it, is evidenced by paper title of record in the county where the land is situate; and there being no other person or persons, in whom any apparent title, legal or equitable, is vested, their conveyance of the property, duly executed, will estop them, and all persons claiming or to claim through or under them, or either of them. The order appealed from is affirmed.

STEEN v. HENDY et al.¹ (No. 15,644.)

HEARING BEFORE REFEREE — CLAIM AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE — FAILURE TO PRESENT CLAIM — PREMATURE OBJECTION — REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Pending a reference, defendant died, and his executor was substituted in his stead. On the hearing before the referee the executor objected to the taking of any testimony, because plaintiff had not filed his claim with him. Held that, the objection being made before there was any evidence as to whether the claim had been.

presented to the executor, it was premature, and the referee rightly proceeded with the hearing.

2. Where no motion for a new trial is made, the question whether the judgment is supported by the evidence will not be considered on appeal unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment on a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Action by J. W. Faulkner against Joshua Hendy and the Joshua Hendy Machine Works, a corporation, for the dissolution of a partnership and for an accounting. Pending the action, the cause of action was assigned to E. T. Steen, who was substituted as plaintiff, and defendant Joshua Hendy died, whereupon his executors were substituted in his stead. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Boyd, Fifield & Hoburg, for appellant corporation. W. H. H. Hart and Nowlin & Fassett, for appellant executors. Wm. H. Jordan, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment, with a bill of exceptions. The action was brought to obtain a dissolution of an alleged partnership, to have an account taken, and for other relief. It was commenced March 11, 1876. At the first trial plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appealed, and that appeal was disposed of here October, 1889. 80 Cal. 636, 22 Pac. 401. The facts of the case appear in the opinion then rendered. It was found that the partnership—if the relations between the parties could be so called—had ended before the suit was brought, leaving in Hendy's hands property in which Steen had a contingent interest, and which Hendy continued to sell from time to time after this suit was begun. By stipulation, however, it was found that Hendy had in his hands something more than $10,000, which belonged to Steen. The question left to be determined was what interest or what share of the profits of Hendy's business Steen was entitled to. After the remittitur was filed from this court, Steen amended his complaint, made for the first time the corporation a defendant, and claimed that Hendy had actually realized a large amount of money from the use of the trust funds which he, Steen, was entitled to recover. The corporation was created September 29, 1882, and it was made a party to this suit November 26, 1889. The supplemental and amended complaint, by which the corporation was brought in, charges, in effect, that Hendy owned all the stock of the corporation, and that it was organized to carry on Hendy's business, to hide plaintiff's property, and to defraud plaintiff. A money judgment was demanded against both defendants. Soon after, Hendy paid the amount found due, exclusive of interest, and the cause was referred to a referee to try, with directions to report findings and a judgment. While the trial was in progress, —October 21, 1891,—Hendy died. The record does not show when letters of administration were issued in the estate of Hendy, but it appears by order made August 10, 1892, that the death of Hendy was suggested by plaintiff, and it was ordered that the case be continued in the names of the executors; and the bill of exceptions recites that: "At the first session after his death and said substitution, to wit, on the 19th day of November, 1891, said defendants objected to further proceeding with the trial or the taking of any further testimony in the case upon the ground that the claim upon which the action is based has not been presented for allowance to the executors and executrix of Joshua Hendy, deceased; but the referee, notwithstanding such objection, proceeded with said trial and the taking of testimony in the case, to all of which the defendants duly excepted, and the said trial and taking of testimony was then proceeded with by said referee, the trial was concluded, and the case argued and submitted." The bill goes on further to state that no claim upon which the action was based was ever presented to the executors or executrix for allowance, or to either of them. That "the defendants, and each of them, excepted, and now except, to the decision, upon the ground that it is against law in the following particulars: * * * (3) The decision is against law in giving judgment against defendants, to wit, the executors and executrix of the estate of Joshua Hendy, deceased, inasmuch as no claim was presented to them. (4) The decision is against law in deciding that the action is not barred by the statute of limitations as to the defendant corporation." The appeal is from the judgment, and was not taken within 60 days.

It is objected that these points are really that the decision—that is, the findings—is not justified by the evidence, and such objection cannot be made in this way. The objection was not that improper evidence was offered, or had been admitted, but that plaintiff would not be able to produce certain evidence which was essential to his case. If the pleadings had shown that no such evidence could be produced, or counsel had admitted upon the trial that the fact could not be proved, the court could then and there have ruled upon the question. But the bill of exceptions does not show that any such admission was made. It is true, the bill of exceptions, after reciting the objection, the ruling, and exception, proceeds to state that the court proceeded to hear the evidence and to render judgment, and that no claim on the part of plaintiff was ever presented to the executors or executrix. The bill of exceptions was made after judgment, and does not show that at the time of the exception the fact that the claim had not been presented was an established or admitted fact before the court. Defendants could not dictate the order of proof, and, so far as the bill of exceptions shows, the court might well have presumed that such evidence, if essential, would be yet produced by plaintiff. The real objection is that the evidence does not support the decision—that is, the finding. As no motion for a new trial was made, and the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment, this question cannot be now considered.

The objection that the court erred in not finding in favor of the defendant corporation upon the plea of the statute of limitations is in the same position. No evidence is contained in the bill of exceptions, and, if it were there, it could not now be considered. The court found that the demand was not barred by the statute of limitations. This finding is not attacked in any mode authorized by law, to wit, by a motion for a new trial, or on an appeal taken within 60 days, with a bill of exceptions setting out the evidence. We must presume, therefore, that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding.

The other point—that plaintiff cannot recover interest, because he elected to claim the profits actually made by the use of the trust funds—was determined on plaintiff's appeal from this judgment. The judgment now appealed from was then modified by increasing the amount of interest allowed. Respondents then had an opportunity to be heard, and were heard at least in their petition for a rehearing. The question cannot be again raised. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DANIELS et al. (No. 21,010.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

PROSECUTION FOR CONSPIRACY — FALSE MAINTENANCE OF SUIT—REVIEW ON APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

1. As Pen. Code, § 1258, provides that the appellate court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties, a conviction will not be reversed merely because much of the evidence was immaterial.

2. On a trial for conspiring to falsely move and maintain a suit, the complaint in the suit is admissible to show an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy, as required by Pen. Code, § 184, providing that no agreement, except to commit a felony, amounts to a conspiracy, unless some act besides such agreement be done to effect the object of the conspiracy by a party to the agreement, though neither defendant was a party to the suit.

3. A conversation with one of defendants in regard to what was done as to the suit after its commencement may be admitted before the conspiracy is established, if the conspiracy is subsequently proved.

4. On a criminal trial, a witness who overheard only a part of a conversation with defendant may testify as to what he overheard.

5. Pen. Code, § 1118, provides that, if the court deems the evidence insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may "advise" the jury to acquit, but that the jury are not bound by the advice. Held, that the court cannot "instruct" the jury that there is no evidence in support of an indictment.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

E. P. Daniels and Joseph Hutchings were convicted of conspiracy to falsely move and maintain a suit, and appeal. Affirmed.

Graham & Terry and Frank H. Short, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HAYNES, C. Appellants were indicted for conspiring falsely to move and maintain an action of slander by Zua Daniels against M. J. Church, under division 3 of section 182 of the Penal Code, and upon the trial were found guilty by the jury, and a judgment against each was entered, imposing a fine; and they appeal from said judgments, and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial must be dismissed, because taken long after the time limited therefor by section 1239, Pen. Code. Appellants' brief, however, is almost wholly devoted to questions which could only be considered upon an appeal from such order, and point out no errors in receiving or rejecting evidence, unless it is contained in the statement that "the whole of the evidence for the prosecution is irrelevant, immaterial, and inadmissible for any purpose, for the reason that it did not even tend to show that Daniels and Hutchings had conspired together to falsely move or maintain the action of Zua Daniels v. M. J. Church." The bill of exceptions covers nearly 400 pages of the transcript, and clearly it was the duty of the counsel, if, in their opinion, any material error was committed, to have pointed it out, and shown how or why appellants were prejudiced by it. That the evidence took an exceedingly wide range, and that much of it was immaterial, is apparent; but we cannot, on that ground alone, reverse the judgment. The Penal Code (section 1258) provides: "After hearing the appeal the court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects, or to exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." The exceptions which seem to us to be most important will be briefly noticed.

The complaint in the action of Zua Daniels against M. J. Church was properly received in evidence. To sustain this prosecution, it was necessary to allege in the indictment, and to prove upon the trial, in addition to the conspiracy, some overt act in furtherance or pursuance of the conspiracy. The commencement of the action by filing the complaint was an overt act (Pen. Code, § 184), though such overt act need not be alleged or proved, if the conspiracy was to commit a felony.

Objection was made to evidence of a conversation between Church and defendant Hutchings relating to the suit, after its commencement, upon the ground that no conspiracy had then been established. Evidence had been given tending to prove a conspiracy, but it was not necessary that the conspiracy be actually shown to have been formed, before the declarations of either of the conspirators can be proven. If the conspiracy is not ultimately proved, such declarations must be disregarded; but generally conspiracy cannot be proved as an independent fact, such as the execution of a promissory note, but is shown from circumstances, some testified to by one witness, and others by other witnesses. It is largely in the discretion of the court as to how much evidence of the existence of the conspiracy shall be required before receiving evidence of the acts and declarations of one of the alleged conspirators in the absence of the other. The evidence objected to was properly received.

A witness for the prosecution was called to testify to what he overheard defendant Daniels and his wife say concerning Mr. Church, and suits against him for slander. The witness said he could not hear all that was said; that sometimes their voices would be so low he could not hear. The defendants objected to the witness stating any part of the conversation, unless he heard and could state the whole of the conversation. The objection was properly overruled. The general rule is that a witness called to testify to a conversation cannot give a part and withhold a part, but must give the whole conversation, at least in substance. But, where a part only of a conversation is heard by the witness, the rule that he must give all that was said applies only to so much as he heard. If what he heard is intelligible, and pertinent to the case, the prosecution is entitled to it. If the part not heard by the witness would in any material respect modify or explain the part he heard, the defendant can give it in explanation. Frank v. State, 27 Ala. 37.

Numerous other exceptions were taken, but, after reading the entire transcript, we do not find that any prejudicial error was committed in receiving or rejecting evidence. Great latitude was allowed in the introduction of evidence, and there is much that might have been omitted without prejudice to either side, but we cannot for that reason reverse the judgment.

The minutes of the court show that a demurrer to the indictment was overruled, but the demurrer is not in the record. We see no ground, however, upon which the indictment could be held insufficient.

When the prosecution rested after the introduction of its evidence in chief, counsel for defendants moved the court as follows: "We move the court to instruct the jury on two grounds: First, that there is no evidence of any conspiracy to do an unlawful act, and no evidence tending to support the allegations of the indictment." This motion was denied, and defendants excepted. Section 1118, Pen. Code, provides: "If, at any time after the evidence on either side is closed, the court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit the defendant. But the jury are not bound by the advice." The motion to "instruct" the jury was properly denied. The court was only authorized, in any case, to "advise" the jury to acquit. People v. Horn, 70 Cal. 18, 11 Pac. 470. It must be borne in mind that the court has no such power to control the action of the jury in criminal as in civil cases, for in criminal cases the court cannot "direct," but only "advise," an acquittal. We cannot say, therefore, that defendants were prejudiced by the refusal so to advise, since the jury might, notwithstanding the advice, have found the defendants guilty; and, if so, the verdict could not be set aside upon the ground that the jury had disobeyed or disregarded the instruction of the court, but only upon motion for a new trial, upon the ground that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. The obvious effect of this provision of the Penal Code is to take from the court the power to determine, as a matter of law, at the close of the evidence for the prosecution, that the evidence is insufficient to justify a conviction.

It is further urged by appellants that the court erred in giving the ninth instruction requested by the prosecution. They say that: "The prosecution, being unable to prove that defendants falsely moved or maintained said action, began to cast about for some grounds upon which the prosecution might be maintained by dropping out the word 'falsely,' * * * and came to the conclusion that they could admit that Church did slander Zua Daniels; that she had a good cause of action against Church; and yet, if the defendants advised or assisted her in said action, they became thereby criminally liable." As the record is not open to us for the purpose of considering whether the verdict is supported by the evidence, we can only examine this contention in the light of the instructions given to the jury. In People v. Richards, 67 Cal. 415, 7 Pac. 828, it was said: "A conspiracy is, in the absence of statutory limitations, an agreement of two or more to do an unlawful act, or a lawful act by unlawful means." This definition applies to the conspiracy here charged. Such charge may be maintained by proving a conspiracy to move an action without cause, knowing that no cause of action exists, or, a cause of action existing, to maintain it by false testimony, or other unlawful means. The ninth instruction given at the request of the prosecution, after referring to the case of Zua Daniels v. Church as the action to which the alleged conspiracy related, and cautioning the jury that they were not trying that action, proceeded as follows: "The issues here are, did E. P. Daniels and Joseph Hutchings, at the time and place as alleged in the indictment, willfully, unlawfully, conspire, combine, and agree together falsely to move or maintain that suit and action, as set out in the indictment, and whether, in pursuance of such agreement, they, or either of them, committed an overt act looking towards the carrying out of the common design." It will be seen that this instruction closely followed the statute, and did not omit the word "falsely." But instructions given at defendants' request, while entirely consistent with the instruction above quoted, were more specific, and expressly instructed the jury that, if they had any reasonable doubt whether the action of Zua Daniels against Church was one which could be justly and lawfully prosecuted, they should give the defendants the benefit of the doubt, and assume that it was a just one; and, if they should have any reasonable doubt as to whether said action was justly or unjustly prosecuted, "and you, under such circumstances, should assume, as it would be your duty to assume, that the said action was a just one, and one that could rightfully be prosecuted, then you may consider whether or not, in prosecuting said action, the said defendants conspired together, willfully, corruptly, falsely, and fraudulently, to prosecute said action by unlawful means, or by false and fraudulent testimony, corruptly procured." And upon this point, also, they were instructed to give the defendants the benefit of any reasonable doubt. In preparing these instructions, counsel stated the law as favorably to defendants as they could desire, and cannot complain that the jury were misdirected. We advise that the appeal from the order denying a new trial be dismissed, and that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

On rehearing. For former report, see 38 Pac. 363.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing in this case. The judgment, in my opinion, is not sustained by the findings. It is nowhere found that transactions in question were sales of stock on margin or for future delivery, nor do the special facts found necessarily imply such sales. That the evidence would have sustained such a finding may be true, but that is not sufficient. This court cannot take evidence, however conclusive, in place of a finding necessary to sustain the judgment.

ROBINSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,283.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1895.)

RAILROAD PASSENGER — RIGHT TO STOP OVER — ILLEGAL RULES OF COMPANY — EFFECT.

1. Civ. Code, § 490, empowers the purchaser of a railroad ticket to ride from the station at which the ticket was bought to the station of destination, "and from any intermediate station to the station of destination," at any time within six months thereafter. Held, that the right of a passenger to stop at an intermediate station, and resume his journey, is not affected by the fact that the ticket bought by him gave him the choice of two different routes, and he selected the longer route.

2. A passenger need not take notice of a rule of a railroad company which contravenes a statute.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

On rehearing. Affirmed. For former reports, see 38 Pac. 94, 109.

BEATTY, C. J. The three principal questions arising in this case were very fully and elaborately argued by counsel, both orally and in the printed briefs filed prior to its submission, and they were as carefully considered in the opinion of the court heretofore filed, wherein it was held: First, that section 490¹ of the Civil Code is still in force; second, that it confers stop-over privileges upon the holders of the tickets therein provided for; and, third, that the defendant is subject to its provisions. As to these points our views remain unchanged, and nothing further need be said concerning them. The rehearing, indeed, was ordered with special reference to a question which, although it had been stated in the briefs, had not been discussed at the oral argument, and had been but slightly considered in the opinion of the court. This question, to which the reargument was practically confined, may be briefly stated as follows: Did the plaintiff, by purchasing and accepting a ticket which in terms and in fact gave him the alternative right to go to Oakland or Alameda, become thereby entitled to go to Oakland, stop off there, and afterwards resume his journey to Alameda? When this question is considered in the light of the principles established by our former decision, and with reference to the facts stated in the opinion and other facts appearing in the record, it is of comparatively easy solution. The defendant had a ferry and railroad line which it was operating between the foot of Market street, in San Francisco, and the city of Alameda, and which passed through the city of Oakland, where there was a station at which passengers were accustomed to enter and leave its cars. The fact that defendant had another and more direct line of road (and ferry) between the same termini did not relieve its statutory obligation to fix (either alone or in conjunction with the railroad commission) a regular passenger rate by the longer route. The right to operate the road and the obligation to fix such regular rate are correlative. It had in fact complied with the statute, and fixed the rate at 15 cents, and this was well known, not only to the plaintiff, but to the public generally. Such being the case, the plaintiff, desiring to go from San Francisco to Alameda via Oakland, tendered the regular fare, and demanded the ticket which it was the duty of the defendant to furnish. He received a ticket in the form set out in our original opinion, which was the only ticket the defendant was accustomed to issue to passengers desiring to go by either of two routes to Oakland or either of two other routes to Alameda. But the fact that the ticket gave the plaintiff his choice of these various routes and different destinations made it none the less effective as a ticket from San Francisco to Alameda via Oakland. What he wanted was a ticket of that particular kind, with all the lawful privileges thereto attached, and it was not in the power of the defendant to deprive him of such privileges by offering him other privileges in exchange. This conclusion does not involve the consequences that are apprehended by counsel for appellant. We do not hold, and it does not follow, from the views herein expressed or from anything decided or said by way of argument in our original opinion, that there can be no ticket sold on any line of road which is not a stop-over ticket. We only hold that there must be a regular passenger rate established from one depot to another, and that a passenger who tenders the regular fare is entitled to a ticket to his place of destination, which ticket, under the law, gives him a right to stop over at an intermediate station. And the railroad company cannot demand the regular rate, and at the same time deny the privilege which the law confers upon all who pay it. If in consideration of an abatement from the regular established rate a passenger voluntarily accepts an excursion or other limited ticket, an entirely different case is presented. Here the regular established fare was tendered and accepted, and a ticket issued, which was the only ticket a passenger from San Francisco to Alameda via Oakland could obtain,—the only ticket provided by the defendant. This being so, the defendant cannot be permitted to say that it was not the ticket which the statute obliged it to provide and issue, and this is more especially true in view of the fact that it contained nothing which in terms denied or assumed to curtail the rights conferred by the statute.

But it is said that the ticket is not the contract; that it is a mere token or voucher, and that it is the duty of the passenger to inform himself of the rules and regulations of the carrier, which really determine his rights. This is, perhaps, true to a certain extent. But the passenger is not bound to take notice of any rule or regulation which contravenes the law of the land. So far as the law fixes the terms of the contract, it cannot be varied by rules of the company, known or unknown, unless assented to by the passenger. We have held that under the law of California the ticket issued by a railroad company upon receipt of the regular fare from one depot to another gives the holder the right to stop over at an intermediate station, and to resume his journey at any time within six months; and, if this is so, it matters not how well it may be known to a particular passenger that this right is contested or denied by the company. He nevertheless acquires, by payment of the regular fare, all the rights which the statute gives him. The passenger who is informed of the claim and practice of the carrier is in no worse position than one who is not informed. So far as the law goes, it protects all alike. These views are conclusive of the question submitted for reargument, and for the reasons here stated, and those set forth in the original opinion, the judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; FITZGERALD, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. There was nothing in the argument on rehearing which in the least changes my mind as to these propositions: (1) That section 490 of the Civil Code does not require a railroad company to "provide" or "furnish" a stop-over ticket, under either the legal or the common meaning of that word; and (2) that the ticket which appellant did "furnish" respondent was not, on its face, a stop-over ticket, but merely gave him the right to go either to Oakland or Alameda,—not to both; and that he well knew the meaning and purpose of the ticket when he accepted it. This action is not for refusing respondent the kind of ticket he wanted, but for refusing to do something for which the ticket he accepted did not provide. In my opinion, the judgment can be affirmed only upon the theory that, if respondent had paid the proper fare, he could ride, and get off, and get on again, as often as he pleased, upon any sort of a ticket, or without any ticket at all.

MILLS v. HOME BEN. LIFE ASS'N. (No. 15,201.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE — NONPAYMENT OF ASSESSMENT—WAIVER OF FORFEITURE — EVIDENCE.

1. In an action on a life insurance policy, on an issue as to whether a certain notice was sent to assured by the company, the secretary testified that it was customary to send the notice with another communication sent assured. Plaintiff, wife of assured, testified that it was customary for her to receive all insurance papers sent assured, and that she never received the notice. Held, that a finding that the notice was not sent would not be disturbed.

2. Where the failure of an insurance company to send to assured a certain notice waives the forfeiture of a policy for nonpayment of an assessment, the fact that the failure to send the notice was due to a mistake of an employé is not material.

3. A finding that an insurance company by a certain act waived a condition in a policy excludes the presumption that the act was unintentional.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Miranda E. Mills against the Home Benefit Life Association on an insurance policy. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. C. Van Ness and L. A. Redman, for appellant. L. T. Hengstler and Jas. Alva Watt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The facts of this case are fully stated in Murray v. Association, 90 Cal. 402, 27 Pac. 309. Upon that appeal, by the decision of the court, the cause was remanded for a new trial. The respondent has since married, a new trial has been had, and the case is again before us upon the merits. In this action a recovery is sought upon a policy or certificate of insurance issued by appellant upon the life of respondent's husband. Prior to his death he suffered default in the payment of two certain assessments, and such default is now relied upon to defeat the right of recovery. Respondent insists that the forfeiture incurred by reason of the aforesaid defaults was waived, owing to an extension of time being granted to make the payments, and this court's disposition of the case is solely dependent upon the conclusion to be arrived at from an examination of this question of forfeiture and waiver. The facts, in the main, are similar to the facts presented at the previous trial, and to a great extent the law of the case has been established by the prior decision of this court. The waiver of the forfeiture was based upon a letter written to the insured by the company, notifying him that a certain assessment would be due upon a named day in the future, and, in effect, requesting a remittance thereof on or before that time; and in this regard, upon the previous appeal, the court declared the law as follows: "But the letter notifying the insured that an assessment would be due and payable on October 1st, and in substance requesting payment, of itself constituted a waiver of the previous default, and must be construed as an unconditional offer to accept payment of that assessment on or before the date named. It was, in effect, an assertion that the certificate was still in force, and, notwithstanding previous defaults known to defendant, would remain in force until the date therein named for such payment. As already stated, this notice was sent after full knowledge by defendant of the nonpayment of the previous assessments; and, if it was the intention to make the acceptance of the amount to become due on this assessment conditional upon the payment of such prior assessments immediately upon the receipt of the other letter, it should have so stated. But, not having done so, we think its legal effect was to waive the previous forfeiture, and continue the certificate in force until October 1st; and, this being so, the insured had the right, at any time after receiving it, and before October 1st, to make payment of all assessments accruing prior thereto, and necessary to be made in order to give the certificate continued existence." To avoid the force and effect of the prior decision of this court as to the waiver, upon the second trial it was attempted to be shown that a health certificate (to be signed and returned to the company) was inclosed to the insured in connection with these notices of assessments due, to the effect that the insured was in good health when he forwarded the remittance. At the time the insured tendered a payment of the amounts due under his certificate of insurance he was not in good health, and was unable to make the certificate contemplated, and for these reasons it is now insisted the facts of the present case are different, the law of the case inapplicable, and the waiver not proven.

Upon the question of the sending of a health certificate to the insured an issue of fact was presented to the trial court, and upon that issue the court made its finding; and, after first finding as a fact that it was the customary practice of defendant to inclose these certificates with notices of delinquent assessments, the court further found "that said custom was not invariable, and was not followed in the instance of the sending to said Murray of the notice of said assessment to become due and payable on or before the 1st day of October, A. D. 1886, but the failure to so mail the notice that such certificate was required was an exception to the customary practice of said company." Appellant now insists that the portion of this finding to the effect that defendant mailed no health certificate to the insured is unsupported by the evidence, but we cannot say so by the record. The testimony upon the one side is that of the ex-secretary of the company, and upon the other that of the plaintiff, the former wife of the insured. The ex-secretary does not testify positively that the certificate was sent; the wife does not testify positively that it was not received. The evidence as to the fact is purely circumstantial upon both sides. The appellant says it was the custom of the company to send this paper under the then existing conditions; ergo, it was sent. The respondent says it was the custom of the wife to receive all insurance papers sent to the insured; she did not receive this one; ergo, it was not sent. The question appears to be one of presumption, inference, probability, and conjecture, and under such circumstances we will not disturb the court's best judgment as to the truth of the fact.

It is further contended that it is immaterial under the evidence whether the health certificate was mailed or not; that, if it was not mailed, it was an unintentional omission upon the part of the company, and a mistake of its employés; that a waiver is defined to be an intentional relinquishment of a known right, and that upon the present state of facts the elements constituting a waiver of the forfeiture are consequently wanting. Under the law of the case as declared in a former portion of this opinion, we do not see how this contention can be urged with any hope of success. In the absence of the receipt by the insured of a health certificate, the former decision seems to be conclusive of the rights of the parties. The case was litigated and decided solely upon that state of facts, and the reasons, good or bad, why the notices were forwarded to the insured by the company without health certificates, appear from the reading of that decision to be matters entirely immaterial. It appears to be held that the company's intentions are to be judged by its acts. But another conclusive answer to appellant's position in this regard presents itself to our minds. There is no finding of fact by the court that the failure to send the health certificate occurred by mistake or oversight, but, inferentially, the finding is to the contrary, if we concede appellant's position as to the law upon this point to be correct, for a waiver is found as a matter of fact, and as the ultimate fact, and, if an intentional failure by the company to send this health certificate is necessary to support the waiver, then we are bound to presume the court so found the fact. We think there is evidence to support an express finding of fact to that effect. Certainly, as the cause now presents itself to us, we are not justified in saying from the evidence that a failure of the company to send the certificate was an unintentional omission upon its part. There is nothing whatever to support such a statement, aside from the general custom of the company, for the court finds the practice was not an invariable one. As opposed to appellant's position, it is disclosed that the sending of the notice to the insured of the October assessment—there being two delinquent assessments unpaid at that time—was a wide departure from the custom of the company, and can only be explained upon the ground that the company was solicitous to retain the insured as a member thereof. If such a desire actuated its conduct in giving notice of the October assessment, it is most reasonable to presume that, actuated by the same reasons, it refrained from forwarding the health certificate. Again, there is no evidence whatever but that some one of its many officers, clothed with all necessary authority so to do, did not direct the notices to be sent exactly as they were sent, without the health certificate. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are affirmed.

EVANS et al. v. GERKEN et al. (No. 15,- 566.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

PLEADING—GENERAL DEMURRER—WAIVER — ACTION ON EXECUTOR'S BOND—PETITION — SUFFICIENCY—DEFENSE.

1. A general demurrer is not waived by consenting that it may be overruled.

2. In an action against sureties on an executor's bond, a complaint which alleges that the executor was appointed, that letters were directed to be issued to him on "executing a bond according to law," etc., and that he and defendants "duly made and executed the bond required by said order," is good, as against a general demurrer.

3. In an action against sureties on an executor's bond, in which the breach alleged is the failure of the executor to pay plaintiffs the sums directed to be paid them by the order of distribution, it is no defense that the money the executor failed to pay over was no part of the personal estate, but was derived from the sale of realty, which the court and plaintiffs had permitted him to sell without giving the additional bond required by law, and that defendants did not consent to such sale without additional bond.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Thomas Evans and others against George P. Gerken, Henry P. Gallagher, and William Offerman, on the bond of defendant Gerken as executor, on which the other defendants are sureties. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Gallagher and Offerman appeal. Affirmed.

Jones & O'Donnell, for appellants. Pierson & Mitchell, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action to recover from the principal and sureties on an executor's bond a balance unpaid by the executor upon distributive shares of an estate awarded to plaintiffs upon distribution. The action was not pressed as to defendant Gerken, the principal on the bond, but the judgment went against the defendants Gallagher and Offerman, the sureties, and they appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

1. Appellants claim their demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained. To this respondents object that appellants should not be heard to press their demurrer in this court, because it appears by the order of the court below overruling the demurrer that it was done by the express consent of the parties. This objection should undoubtedly be good as to any special ground of demurrer, since obviously consent to the overruling of a demurrer is tantamount to a withdrawal of it and a waiver of the objections thereby raised. It is quite distinguishable from an instance where the demurrer is overruled merely from failure to argue it, or, as is sometimes expressed, "for want of prosecution." In such case it has been properly held that it is the demurrer, and not the argument, which raises the issue of law, and that the party cannot be deprived of his right to be heard upon it in this court because he saw fit to submit the demurrer without argument in the court below. Richards v. Insurance Co., 80 Cal. 505, 22 Pac. 939. In this case, however, the demurrer is general, and, as this ground is one which is not waived even by failure to demur, it is obvious that it was not waived by consent that it be overruled. The objection urged is that the complaint does not allege that the bond sued on was approved by the judge, or was ever filed or recorded, or that any certificate of justification was attached thereto. It is alleged, however, that the executor was appointed; that letters testamentary were directed to be issued to him upon his "executing a bond according to law," etc.; and that the executor and the appellants "duly made and executed the bond required by said order." We regard this as a sufficient allegation of the requirements of the statute, certainly as against a general demurrer.

2. It is complained that the court erred in striking out portions of the answer. The portions struck out proceeded upon the theory that it would be a good defense for appellants to show that the money appropriated by the executor, and which he failed to pay over to the distributees, was not a part of the personal property or income of the estate, but was derived from the sale of realty belonging to the estate which he had been permitted, by the neglect and failure of the superior court and plaintiffs, to sell without giving the additional bond required by law, and without the consent of appellants that said realty should be sold without such additional bond being required. It is perfectly obvious that this matter did not tend to constitute a defense to the action, and was properly stricken out as irrelevant and redundant. The argument of appellants is, in effect, that, by reason of the failure of the executor to give a bond as required by law upon the sale of real estate, the title to the property never passed from the estate, and hence there could be no loss suffered therefrom. But there is nothing in this position, nor is any such question open for collateral inquiry here. The decree of distribution had fixed the liability of the executor, and was conclusive alike upon the sureties. Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594; Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 222-224. The fact that the executor failed to give such a bond could in no way affect the rights of appellants, except incidentally as to their right to contribution in a proper case. Primarily they were liable upon their undertaking to the full extent of the penalty, whether such additional bond had been given or not. Powell v. Powell, 48 Cal. 234; La Coste v. Splivalo, 64 Cal. 40, 30 Pac. 571. The findings are sufficient to cover the issues. Judgment affirmed.

ASSIGNMENT OF BUILDING CONTRACT—LIABILITIES OF ASSIGNEE.

One to whom a building contract is assigned as security for advances to the contractor, and who is authorized to draw all moneys as they become due to the contractor, but is to have nothing to do with the conduct of the work, is not—under Civ. Code, § 1589, providing that a voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it—liable for wages due persons employed on the work.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court of city and county of San Francisco; J. E. Murphy, Judge.

Action by Thomas Stone against F. J. Owens, J. M. Wood, and others for wages. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant Wood appeals. Reversed.

J. M. Wood and J. C. Bates, for appellant. Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In September, 1890, F. J. Owens and J. V. Owens, who were brothers and copartners, entered into a written contract with the state, through the harbor commissioners, to construct a section of the sea wall and wharf on the water front of the city of San Francisco. On February 11, 1891, the Owens Bros. assigned their said contract to defendant Wood as security for advances made and to be made by Wood to them, and constituted Wood their attorney in fact, with authority to demand and receive all warrants and moneys due or to become due them under said contract, by the following instrument: "For value received, we hereby assign and transfer to J. M. Wood all our right, title, and interest in, to, and under the contract to construct section B of the sea wall, thoroughfare, and wharf on the water front of the city and county of San Francisco, made by us with the proper authorities of the state of California, and dated September 22, 1890, at said city and county. This assignment is made by us to said Wood by way of security for advances made and to be made by said Wood to us; and we do hereby authorize and empower him, the said Wood, as our attorney in fact, to demand and receive and collect all certificates, warrants, and moneys due or to become due thereunder. Witness our hands, this 11th day of February, 1891, at said city and county. Owens Brothers. F. J. Owens. J. V. Owens." On March 18, 1891, the Owens Bros. entered into a contract with Reiley & Loane, whereby they agreed to excavate a cellar, which contract they also assigned to defendant Wood on March 19, 1891, by the following instrument: "State of California, City and County of San Francisco. For value received, we hereby sell, assign, transfer, and set over unto J. M. Wood, as security for moneys advanced by him to us, our certain contract and agreement made with Messrs. Reiley & Loane, made on, to wit, March 18, 1891, to excavate a cellar at the southeast corner of Filbert and Sansome streets, in said city and county, amounting to the sum of $3,150, on land belonging to Mrs. Robert C. Johnson. Dated March 19, 1891. F. J. & J. V. Owens." At the time of the assignment of the sea-wall contract, the Owens Bros. were indebted to the defendant Wood in the sum of about $3,000, for money theretofore loaned; and on that day he loaned them $1,500 more, to enable them to pay the men employed by them as laborers in performance of the sea-wall contract. During the following months of April and May, 1891, the Owens Bros. carried on the work on both contracts at the same time, and paid their laborers by orders or checks on defendant Wood, which he paid, and which were drawn in the following form: "$56. July 19, 1891, Pay to the order of C. Sheridan fifty-six dollars, value received, and charge the same to account of F. J. & J. V. Owens." In July, 1891, Wood refused to pay any more of such checks, and thereafter Owens Bros. failed. At the time of their failure they were indebted to the plaintiff and 33 others for labor on the sea wall and cellar, in sums ranging from $3 to $110, and each of the other 33 assigned his demand to the plaintiff, and thereupon plaintiff commenced this action to recover his own demand and that of the 33 others assigned to him; the complaint consisting of 34 counts, in each of which it is alleged that defendants are indebted to plaintiff in a sum therein named, "for work and labor performed for them at their special instance and request." The separate answer of the defendant Wood is a special denial of all material averments in each count, so far as they relate to him. Neither of the Owens brothers answered. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and that the answer is wholly false, and rendered judgment against the defendant Wood alone for the sum of $2,062.57 and costs, taxed at $97.50.

The parol evidence, without conflict, is positive to the effect that Wood had nothing to do with the work on the sea wall or on the cellar; that he neither directly nor indirectly employed or discharged any laborer, but, on the contrary, that all laborers on the cellar or sea wall, including the plaintiff and his assignors, were employed and wholly supervised by the Owens Bros. Nor did Wood pay for any part of such labor, though he paid orders or checks drawn on him by the Owens Bros. in favor of laborers, but charged the amount so paid to Owens Bros., as directed to do in such orders. If Wood was under any obligation to pay plaintiff or his assignors for labor performed on the cellar or sea wall, such obligation must be deduced from the written assignments of the cellar and sea-wall contracts, and the law applicable to such assignments. And accordingly counsel for respondent contend that Wood's obligation to pay for such labor is the product of their application of section 1589 of the Civil Code to those assignments, which section reads as follows: "A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known or ought to be known to the person accepting." But we think this section applies only to "a transaction" to which the person accepting the benefit is, or purports to be, or is claimed to be, a party, but who would not have been bound by the transaction if he had not accepted the benefit thereof. For example, an alleged principal is not bound by a transaction for him or in his name by an assumed agent, without authority, unless he accept the benefits of such transaction; and the application of this section of the Civil Code was thus exemplified by the code commissioners, in their annotated edition, by citing the case of Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 238, in which the defendant was held to be bound by an unauthorized transaction in his name, on the ground that he had accepted the benefits thereof.

Wood purported to be, and was, a party to the transactions by which Owens & Bro. assigned to him the sea-wall and cellar contracts as security for money advanced, and he received a part and claims all the benefits of those transactions; and it appears that he not only consented to all the obligations on his part arising from those transactions, but that he has fully performed and discharged them. But Wood was not, did not purport to be, and was not represented to be, an original party to the sea-wall and cellar contracts. Did he become a party to those contracts by the assignment of them to him as collateral security for money loaned? This seems to be the only remaining material question, and must be answered negatively. As it appears that the contracts were delivered to Wood at the time they were assigned, and also appears on the face of the written assignments, as well as by extrinsic evidence, that the assignments were intended to operate as collateral security for the payment of debts, the legal effect of the assignments, and the power of attorney to receive the warrants and the money to become due under those contracts, was merely a pledge of those contracts creating a lien thereon, subject to which the title to, and the general property in, the pledge, remained in the pledgor. Civ. Code, § 2888; Haber v. Brown, 101 Cal. 452, 35 Pac. 1035, and cases there cited. And such pledge and lien implied no obligation of the pledgee to perform or to pay for the work which the pledged contracts required to be performed by the pledgors,—the Owens Bros. And surely no such obligation is expressly imposed by those assignments. Nor is it true that Wood accepted or received any benefit from the transaction of executing the pledged contracts by the parties thereto, in the sense in which the word "benefit" is used in section 1589 of the Civil Code. True, he received part payment by Owens Bros. of their debt to him from proceeds of their work done under those contracts; but other creditors of Owens Bros. may have received payments from the proceeds of that work before the contracts were pledged to Wood, and creditors of contractors are often paid from the proceeds of work done under contract. But to say that all creditors who are thus paid accept or receive a benefit from the contract under which the work was done, in the sense of section 1589 of the Civil Code, and thereby obligate themselves to pay for such work, would be to give that section not only an absurd, but an outrageously unjust, effect. Yet Wood's relation to the pledged contracts differs from that of the general creditors only in that he had secured a lien upon the proceeds of the work. But this distinction does not remove absurdity, nor mitigate the injustice. Why should a creditor who is secured by a pledge be in a worse condition than those who have no collateral security? The case of Cutting Packing Co. v. Packers' Exchange, 86 Cal. 574, 25 Pac. 52, cited by respondent, is not in point. It differs from this case in several respects; but the most important difference, and that which makes it inapplicable, is this: that the assignment of the contract in that case was absolute, and was so intended by the parties. Neither party to it claimed or pretended that it was intended as security for a debt, or for the performance of any act.

Other points made by the appellant are deemed unimportant, in view of the construction which we have given to the assignments of the contracts, and to section 1589 of the Civil Code. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

BARNARD v. BOLLER. (No. 18,327.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

PUBLIC LANDS—HOMESTEAD ENTRY—EXEMPTIONS.

Under Rev. St. U. S. § 2296, providing that "no lands acquired under this chapter [on homesteads] shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor," land so acquired is not liable for a debt contracted after final proofs were made by the applicant and the receipt entitling him to a patent was issued, but before the issuance of the patent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by Joe Barnard against Luella M. Boller to quiet title to land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. Cospers, for appellant. Lamberson & Middlecoff, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to quiet the title of plaintiff to a quarter section of land, fully described in the complaint, and situate in the county of Tulare. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, written findings filed, upon which plaintiff had judgment, quieting his title as prayed for in his complaint. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and the case is presented upon the judgment roll without a statement or bill of exceptions.

The findings show that on the 26th day of September, 1884, plaintiff entered the land in question, under the homestead laws of the United States, at the United States land office at Visalia, Cal. On the 17th day of November, 1890, plaintiff made the proper proofs under his homestead entry, and received from the receiver a receipt in due form, entitling him to a patent for said land, which patent in due form issued to him from the government of the United States, February 23, 1892. After the issuing to plaintiff of said receipt, viz. after November 17, 1890, but before the patent issued, plaintiff became indebted to M. Schwartz & Son for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered by them to said plaintiff in the sum of $860.78, for which sum said firm of Schwartz & Son brought an action in due form, and obtained a judgment against plaintiff. On the 23d day of January, 1892, said Schwartz & Son caused an execution to issue upon their judgment against this plaintiff, which was levied upon the land in question, under which execution the land was sold, purchased by Schwartz & Son, who in due time received a sheriff's deed therefor, and thereafter conveyed the land to the defendant and appellant herein.

The only question presented by the appeal is: Was the land subject to levy and sale upon a debt contracted by respondent after he had made his final proofs and received his receipt, but before the patent actually issued? Section 2296 of the Revised Statutes of the United States provides that "no lands acquired under the provisions of this chapter [chapter on homesteads, and providing for acquiring title thereto] shall in any event become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor." The contention of appellant is that when respondent had made his final proofs and received his receipt the right to a patent vested in him; that he then had a perfect equitable title to the land, which he could convey; and that when the patent issues it relates back to the act upon which the equitable title depends; citing Morton v. Nebraska, 21 Wall. 660; Reichart v. Felps, 6 Wall. 160; Barney v. Dolph, 97 U. S. 652; Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. 402. Other cases are also referred to as illustrative of the principle that at the stage of proceedings indicated the equitable title is vested in the claimant, and that thereafter the government holds the legal title in trust until the patent issues. We agree in main with the position of the appellant, so far as dealing with the title is concerned, independent of statutory provisions; but his conclusion, in the face of the statute quoted above, cannot be maintained. Under that statute the condition or existence of the equitable title is not made the criterion of liability for antecedent debts. The land shall not, in any event, become liable to the satisfaction of any debt contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor. The date of issuing the patent is made the point of time which divides the liability and nonliability of the land. It is this event or act which determines the question of liability, and not the title or the question of relation as applicable to the holder thereof, which must be taken as the criterion. Congress has in plain and direct terms exempted the land from the debts of its owner or claimant contracted up to the happening of a specific event, viz. "to the issuing of the patent therefor." Had the statute provided that homesteads should not be liable for the debts of the patentees thereof contracted during their natural lives, or for 10 years after the issuance of the patent, its constitutionality being conceded, the end of the life of the patentee or the expiration of the 10 years would afford the test by which to measure the liability, and in such a case, it is believed, no just claim of liability could be maintained on account of debts contracted before the expiration of the time specified or event mentioned upon the ground that the patentee had previously held the title, legal or equitable. The provision of section 2296 is regarded as being equally explicit with the case supposed. In Jean v. Dee (Wash.) 32 Pac. 460, the supreme court of Washington, in a case involving this question, held that the provision was an absolute condition annexed to the grant, and applied as against liability for debts contracted prior to the issuance of the patent therefor, although the land had ceased to be occupied as a homestead after the issuance of the patent. Miller v. Little, 47 Cal. 348, is directly in point, and conclusive against the contention of appellant. The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

SCHAMMEL v. SCHAMMEL. (No. 15,636.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

DIVORCE—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN.

1. Under Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139, empowering the court in divorce to provide for the care and custody of the minor children, the court cannot require a defendant husband to pay money for the support of his child to its legal guardian other than its mother.

2. Upon the death of the parent to whom is awarded the custody of a minor child by the decree divorcing the parents, the other parent becomes entitled to the custody of the child.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Maria Schammel against Henry Schammel for divorce. There was a judgment for plaintiff granting the divorce, awarding her the custody of a minor child, and ordering the defendant to pay a certain sum monthly for the support of the child to the plaintiff or to the child's "legal guardian." Application by Ernestine Gallagher, guardian, against Henry Schammel, for an order directing the issuance of an execution. From an order granting the application, and an order refusing to vacate said order, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fisher Ames, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The parties to this action were husband and wife, and were divorced by a decree entered therein on December 9, 1887. The decree awarded to the plaintiff the custody of Etta Schammel, the minor child of the parties, and the defendant was "ordered and decreed to contribute to the support and education of said Etta the sum of fifteen dollars per month during the period of her minority," and "to pay said sum of money to the plaintiff, or to her order, or to the legal guardian of said minor, on the first day of every month for the time aforesaid." On May 5, 1890, on motion of the plaintiff, the allowance for the support of the minor was increased by order of the court to $25 per month. On March 27, 1891, the plaintiff died, owning two lots of land, with houses thereon, in the city and county of San Francisco, one of which she gave to her said minor daughter, and the other to Ernestine

Gallagher, a married daughter. The house and lot given to the minor daughter was worth about $3,500, and when rented yielded about $25 per month. On June 12, 1891, an order was duly made and entered in the matter of the estate of Maria Schammel, deceased, allowing said minor out of said estate the sum of $50 per month for her support, education, and maintenance, and on the same day Ernestine Gallagher was duly appointed guardian of her person and estate. The defendant paid the allowance for his daughter regularly every month, up to and including the month of March, 1891, but thereafter neglected and refused to make any further payments. About a month after her mother's death defendant saw his daughter, and requested her to go and live with him,—he had then married again,—but she refused to do so; and again in April, 1892, he saw her, and invited her to live with him and make his house her home, but she still refused to do so. In March, 1893, Ernestine Gallagher, as guardian of her sister Etta, applied to the court below for an order in the above-entitled action directing the clerk of the court to issue an execution against the property of the defendant for the aggregate of the sums ordered to be paid by him for the support of said Etta, but not paid. The application was heard, and in August following an order was made and entered directing the clerk of the court to issue an execution as asked for for the sum of $600. From this order, and an order subsequently made refusing to vacate or modify it, the defendant appeals.

Under sections 138 and 139 of the Civil Code, the court, in an action for divorce, is authorized to make any necessary or proper provision for the custody, care, and education of the minor children of the marriage; and, where a divorce is granted for an offense of the husband, it may compel him to provide for the maintenance of such children, and may from time to time modify its orders in these respects. But the power to make such orders must be held to be limited to the conditions and circumstances existing at the time they are made. The court cannot then anticipate what may possibly thereafter happen, and provide for future contingencies. For example, the court, in making its orders for the custody and support of the minor in this case, could not anticipate that the mother might possibly die during the minority of the child, and that a guardian of her person other than her father might thereafter be appointed, and then proceed to direct that the allowance made to the mother for the support of the child should be paid to such guardian. The order, as made, that the defendant pay said sum of money "to the legal guardian of said minor" was therefore beyond the power of the court, and without any legal effect. Upon the death of the mother, the father again became entitled to the custody of the child, and this right continued until a guardian of her person was appointed. After that he was under no obligation to furnish her support other than such as the law imposed upon him. It follows that the orders appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the proceeding.

We concur. SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the orders appealed from are reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the proceeding.

BLACK v. COUGHLIN et al. (No. 15,385.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1894.)
ISSUANCE OF EXECUTION—ORDER TO SHOW CAUSE —APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

1. Upon the plaintiff's motion for an order that execution issue it was proper for the court of its own motion to order the defendant to show why the motion should not be granted.

2. Where no appeal was taken from an order of the superior court that execution issue, the fact that counsel consent to the argument before the supreme court of objections to that order does not give the supreme court jurisdiction to review it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Action by John Black against Daniel Coughlin and others for the recovery of land. There was a judgment for plaintiff. Motion by John Black, for whom is substituted John O. McAuliffe, against Daniel Coughlin and others, for an order for execution. From an order citing defendants to show cause why execution should not issue they appeal. Affirmed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellants. Sullivan & Sullivan, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This appeal by the defendants is from an order of the superior court citing them to show cause why an execution should not issue on a judgment of said court in favor of the original plaintiff against the defendants for the recovery of the possession of a defined strip of land. The bill of exceptions shows that in an action of ejectment the original plaintiff recovered a judgment against defendants for the possession of said strip of land on January 14, 1882; that in August, 1890, McAuliffe, who had purchased said strip of land from the original plaintiff, and had been substituted for the latter, moved the court for an order that execution issue upon said judgment. The motion was based upon affidavits of Black and McAuliffe and the judgment roll in said action of ejectment, it appearing by the judgment roll, however, that the judgment had been fully satisfied by Black (the original plaintiff) on September 12, 1883. But it was stated in Black's affidavit that the judgment never had been satisfied, and that he was induced to enter satisfaction thereof by false and fraudulent statements of the defendants to the effect that they had vacated the land and delivered possession thereof to Black by removing their fence inclosing it so that it inclosed no part thereof. The affidavits further show that defendants never so removed their fence, but that it has always inclosed, and still incloses, a part of said strip of land, and that they refuse to deliver possession thereof to McAuliffe. Upon this showing the court made the order to show cause, from which this appeal was taken.

Conceding, merely for the purposes of this appeal, that this order to show cause is an appealable order (which I think questionable, at least), the court did not err in making that order on the showing made, since it had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the motion for an order to issue execution on the judgment, and incidentally to determine whether or not the apparent satisfaction of the judgment was void, as claimed by the plaintiff. It does not appear that plaintiff moved for the order to show cause, but upon his motion for an order that execution issue it was proper and regular practice for the court, of its own motion, to order the defendants to show cause why plaintiff's motion should not be granted; thus giving the defendants an opportunity to be heard in answer to that motion. The order to show cause was simply a notice of the motion, and a citation of the defendants to appear at a stated time and place and show cause why plaintiff's motion should not be granted. Such orders are frequently made, especially on applications for injunctions and writs of mandate. They are never prejudicial to the rights of the party cited, and I am not aware of any case of appeal from such an order, except this. Nor has counsel advanced any reason or authority for holding the order in this case erroneous. His argument is wholly directed against the subsequent and final order directing the issuance of the execution, made, after the appearance of the defendants, as the result of a hearing on the merits, and from which final order no appeal has been taken. It is true, however, that counsel for respondent have replied to these arguments against the final order, without objection, on the ground that no appeal from it has been taken; but this does not supply the want of jurisdiction of this court to review orders of the superior court from which no appeal has been taken, except such as are made in a pending action before final judgment. I think the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BRAY. (No. 21,062.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

SALE OF LIQUOR TO INDIANS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Pen. Code, § 397, making it a felony to sell intoxicating liquor to any Indian, applies to all Indians as a class, regardless of their citizenship or tribal relations.

2. Since Pen. Code, § 397, making it a felony to sell intoxicating liquors to Indians, is general and uniform in its operation as to all persons in the class designated, it is a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and not a violation of any constitutional rights or immunities to which such Indians as are citizens of the United States are entitled.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; R. F. Crawford, Judge.

One Bray was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor to an Indian, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Thompson & Son, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of selling intoxicating liquor to an Indian named Mary Smith, in violation of section 397 of the Penal Code, which, as amended in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 98), reads as follows: "Every person who sells or furnishes, or causes to be sold or furnished, any intoxicating liquors to any habitual or common drunkard is guilty of a misdemeanor; or who sells or furnishes, or causes to be sold or furnished, intoxicating liquors to any Indian, is guilty of a felony." It was admitted upon the trial that the defendant furnished intoxicating liquor to the said Mary Smith, named in the information, at the time and place stated therein, and that she "has no other than Indian blood in her veins." It was further shown that her father and mother lived in a house of their own; that they both dressed like white people, and have adopted the habits and customs of civilized life. Her father is a fisherman, and sells his fish in the neighboring city of Santa Rosa. He owns a horse, wagon, household goods, and other property, and their said daughter, Mary, resides with her parents, and none of them have ever lived upon a government reservation, "nor have they ever lived in tribal relations, or under or subject to the control of any chief or like authority." Upon this state of the evidence the defendant requested the court to give the following instructions: "(2) Section numbered 397 of the Penal Code, under which the information in this case was filed, is not violated by a sale of intoxicating liquor to an Indian who at the time of the sale was a citizen of this state." "(4) If you find from the evidence that the Indian in question was born in this state, and at the time of her birth her parents were living separate and apart from any tribe of Indians, and had no tribal relations, and did not live on any Indian reservation, or other land set apart for such purpose, then I charge you that the Indian in question is a citizen of the United States, and you cannot convict the defendant of the crime charged against him in the information, even if you should also find that he did sell or furnish the said Indian intoxicating liquors at the time alleged." "(12) All citizens of this state are entitled to equal protection under the law in person, property, and privileges; and a law which takes from one person, on account of color or race, any privilege which others are legally permitted and allowed to enjoy, is void as to such person." The court refused to so instruct the jury, and this refusal is assigned as error, and covers all the grounds upon which the defendant claims that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed; and the argument made in behalf of defendant for such reversal rests upon these three propositions: First, that under the facts shown the person named in the information as the one to whom defendant furnished the intoxicating liquor is a citizen of the United States; second, that section 397 of the Penal Code, in so far as it relates to Indians, applies only to those Indians who are under control of the general government as dependent communities, living in tribal relations, or upon government reservations, and as such deemed wards of the general government; third, that, if said section is not so limited by construction, it is void, because it discriminates between citizens of the United States, denying to the citizen of Indian birth the privilege of buying intoxicating liquors, which is accorded to citizens of the white race, and in making such distinction that it abridges the privileges and immunities of the former.

By an act of congress approved Feb. 8, 1887 (24 Stat. 390), it is provided that "every Indian born within the territorial limits of the United States who has voluntarily taken up within said limits his residence, separate and apart from any tribe of Indians therein, and has adopted the habits of civilized life, is hereby declared to be a citizen of the United States, and is entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities of such citizens, whether said Indian has been or not, by birth or otherwise, a member of any tribe of Indians within the territorial limits of the United States, without in any manner impairing or otherwise affecting the right of any such Indian to tribal or other property." It was undoubtedly competent for congress to thus confer upon Indians the privileges of citizenship (Elk v. Wilkins, 112 U. S. 94, 5 Sup. Ct. 41), and it may be conceded that the facts of this case show that the said Mary Smith, referred to in the information, is a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the act of congress from which the foregoing quotation is made, and as such is entitled to the privileges and immunities of such citizens; but we are not able to agree with the further contention of appellant's counsel in their construction of section 397 of the Penal Code. In our opinion that section forbids the sale or giving of liquors to Indians of full blood, without any reference to the question whether they have or have not adopted the habits of civilization, or separated themselves from tribal relations. It was intended to apply to Indians as a class, and was enacted in view of their well-known race peculiarities and their relations to society. There are thousands of California Indians to be found in this state, most of them civilized in a certain degree, perhaps none of them living under any well-defined tribal government. They live generally by themselves, in small villages or communities, and yet are in constant contact with the white race, some of them living in families as servants, and all of them at times engaged in fishing or employed as laborers in the harvest fields or otherwise. The statute applies to this people as a race, and in its enforcement all inquiry as to the habits or the degree of civilization attained by the individual of such race to whom the intoxicating liquor is furnished, or as to whether he is or is not a citizen of the United States under the act of congress before referred to, is irrelevant; and, as thus construed, this section of the Penal Code is not in conflict with any provision of the constitution of the United States or of this state. It is general and uniform in its operation, because it affects in the same manner all persons belonging to the class to which it refers (Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 710), and does not deprive any citizen of his privileges and immunities as such. The privileges and immunities which pertain to citizens in the several states are thus defined by Washington, J., in Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. 380, Fed. Cas. No. 3,230: "We feel no hesitation in confining these expressions to those privileges and immunities which are in their nature fundamental, which belong of right to the citizens of all free governments, and which have at all times been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose this Union from the time of their becoming free, independent, and sovereign. What these fundamental principles are it would perhaps be more tedious than difficult to enumerate. They may, however, be all comprehended under the following general heads: Protection by the government; the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; subject, nevertheless, to such restrictions as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole; the right of a citizen of one state to pass through or to reside in any other state for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of any kind in the courts of the state; to take, hold, and dispose of property, real and personal, and an exemption from higher taxes or impositions than are paid by the other citizens of the states,—may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental, to which may be added the elective franchise, as regulated and established by the laws or constitution of the state in which it is to be exercised." It will be seen that in the above extract the learned judge was careful to say that the right to acquire and possess property and to pursue and obtain happiness is not unlimited, but "subject, nevertheless, to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole." And it is well settled that in regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors the legislature may, in the exercise of its judgment as to what restrictions upon such sale the general good of the public requires, prescribe the conditions upon which the license to make such sale shall be granted. "Wherever the law allows the sale of liquor under licenses or other restrictions, there are statutes forbidding such sale to certain classes of persons who are peculiarly liable to be injured or demoralized by indulgence in alcoholic beverages; such as minors, persons already intoxicated, and habitual drunkards. The constitutionality of such laws has seldom been questioned, and, indeed, their validity could scarcely be assailed with any show of reason." Black, Intox. Liq. § 42. Whatever may be true in respect to particular individuals of that race, it is certainly true that Indians as a class are not refined, cultured,—civilized in the same degree as persons of the white race,—and doubtless, in the judgment of the legislature, they are less subject to moral restraint, and therefore more liable to be dangerous to themselves or others when under the influence of liquor, or less able to resist the desire for such liquors, and for that reason they, as well as the community in which they move, were thought entitled to the protecting influence of this statute. We have no doubt the law under consideration falls within the proper exercise of the police power of the state. It was so stated by Sanderson, J., in Ex parte Smith, 38 Cal. 708, and a statute in all respects similar to it was upheld by the supreme court of the territory of Montana as a valid exercise of the police power in the case of Territory v. Guyot, 22 Pac. 134, the court there saying: "The act under consideration is clearly within the police power of the territorial government as defined by the courts, and is not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States." These views dispose of all the questions arising upon this appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

BURKE v. GOULD. (No. 19,358.)

DURESS—EVIDENCE—MORTGAGOR AND MORTGAGEE.

In an action to recover money as paid under duress, it appeared that defendant held a mortgage on plaintiff's land, and that plaintiff, being unable to pay the interest, conveyed the land to defendant, under an agreement that defendant would, up to a certain date, reconvey the land on payment of a certain sum, exceeding the amount of the mortgage with interest to the date named. Plaintiff sold part of the land, and the purchaser paid to defendant such agreed sum, and received from defendant a deed of the land purchased, and the mortgage was canceled. The balance of the mortgaged land defendant conveyed to plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that when such agreed sum was fixed he supposed it was the principal of the mortgage, with interest to the date of the proposed reconveyance, but admitted that when the money was paid to defendant he knew that it exceeded the amount of such principal and interest. Held, that no duress was shown.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by M. F. Burke against G. H. Gould to recover money alleged to have been paid under duress. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. H. Gould and C. F. Carrier, for appellant. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover from defendant $679.78, alleged to have been paid to him by plaintiff, under duress of the property of said plaintiff. Plaintiff had a verdict for $652.48, upon which judgment was entered. The appeal is by defendant from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. On the 21st day of February, 1890, plaintiff executed to defendant and Mary M. Barnes a mortgage upon certain real property situate in the county of Santa Barbara, to secure the payment of two certain promissory notes aggregating $17,000, payable one year after date, with interest at 10½ per cent. per annum, interest payable semiannually, and, if not so paid, to be added to principal, and draw like interest. No interest was paid upon the notes, and at their maturity plaintiff was unable to pay, and defendant was about to foreclose, when, by an agreement, plaintiff on the 9th day of March, 1891, conveyed all the mortgaged property to defendant, whereupon the latter executed an agreement to one R. J. Broughton, a friend of the plaintiff, whereby he agreed and bound himself, upon the payment to him of $20,500 on or before September 1, 1891, to convey to said Broughton or his assigns all of said property so mortgaged and so conveyed to him, the said defendant. Plaintiff found a purchaser for the most of the property, who paid the defendant said sum of $20,500, whereupon, and on the 25th day of August, 1891, the latter conveyed the property so purchased to the purchaser, and the residue, consisting of 100 acres and certain town lots, to the plaintiff. The notes and mortgage were surrendered to plaintiff for cancellation upon his conveyance to the defendant. The sum of $20,500 mentioned in the agreement and paid to defendant was in excess of the sum which would have been due to him as principal and interest on the mortgage up to September 1, 1891, by at least the amount of the verdict, viz. $652.48, but was less by perhaps $1,000, more or less, than plaintiff would have been compelled to pay to redeem had a foreclosure and sale occurred, with the costs thereof, and a counsel fee of 5 per cent., as provided in the mortgage. The main question in dispute at the trial related to this sum of $20,500 mentioned in the agreement. Plaintiff testified that he was told by defendant, or his attorney, or by both, that it represented the principal and interest which would be due, at the rate prescribed in the notes, on the 1st of September, 1891, and that, being extremely busy as a public officer, viz. as tax-collector of the county, he had no time to compute the interest, and trusted to defendant and his counsel to do so. That a few days after the papers were executed he made the computation, and had others make it, and found it was wrong; and, in substance, that he thereafter refrained from protesting, and consented to the payment of the sum named to defendant, because he was pecuniarily involved, and feared defendant, should he raise objections, would defeat his attempts to sell the property, and he would thereby lose it all. The agreement as originally drawn is conceded to have mentioned the sum of $20,820 as the consideration to be paid to defendant, but, upon objection by plaintiff, that sum was stricken out, and $20,500 inserted. It is thought the weight of testimony was to the effect that $20,500 was an arbitrary sum at which defendant was willing to take the deed and agree to convey, and which was agreed to by the parties plaintiff and defendant; but, the jury having found in consonance with the theory of plaintiff, and there being a substantial conflict in the evidence, we are bound in favor of the verdict, to assume plaintiff's theory as proven.

Two propositions are presented in the case: (1) Can plaintiff recover upon the ground that the money was paid by mistake? (2) Do the facts presented establish such a case of duress as entitled plaintiff to recover?

The first proposition demands but brief notice. That money paid under mistake of a material fact and without consideration can be recovered back is well settled. In the present instance, however, it was not so paid. Whatever the belief of the plaintiff may have been when the agreement between defendant and Broughton was made, it is rendered certain, by his own uncontradicted testimony, that he became aware of the mistake in the sum mentioned in the agreement very shortly thereafter, and for nearly six months before payment was made was cognizant of all the facts bearing thereon; yet he permitted the money to be paid in his interest, and on the contract made for his benefit, without protest or objection. Against this voluntary payment with knowledge of the facts no recovery can be had. Keener, Quasi Cont. c. 2, and cases there cited.

The second proposition involves more serious considerations. Money paid to prevent the unlawful taking or detention of property may be recovered back. The doctrine is an equitable one, and is founded upon the theory of the moral duress not justified by law. "When such duress is exerted under circumstances sufficient to influence the apprehensions and conduct of a prudent business man, payment of money wrongfully induced thereby ought not to be regarded as voluntary. But the circumstances of the case are always to be taken into consideration." Bradley, J., in Robertson v. Frank, 132 U. S. 17, 10 Sup. Ct. 5. The case holds, in substance, that a plaintiff who added additional charges to the cost of goods, thereby involving a payment of increased duties, and paid the same, to avoid a penalty which the custom officials threatened to enforce if he did not add such additional charges, could recover the amount of the increased duties which had been paid under protest. So, in Hills v. Street, 5 Bing. 37, it was held that the plaintiff who paid to the defendant a sum of money to prevent a wrongful removal and sale of his goods under a distraint could recover the money so paid. Hooper v. Mayor, etc., 56 Law J. Q. B. 457; Chamberlain v. Reed, 13 Me. 357; Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 915; Briggs v. Boyd, 56 N. Y. 289; Buford v. Lonergan, 6 Utah, 301, 22 Pac. 164; Scholey v. Mumford, 60 N. Y. 498. In Close v. Phipps, 7 Man. & G. 586, a mortgagee, who had caused the mortgaged property to be advertised for sale under a power in the mortgage, refused to stop the sale, or deliver up the deeds, upon tender of the amount due on the mortgage, unless some $451 illegally added was paid. Payment was made under protest, and the court held that a recovery could be had in an action for money had and received. Cases might be multiplied indefinitely to the same effect, but the foregoing are deemed sufficient. The underlying principle of them all is that by the performance or threat to perform some unlawful act, whereby plaintiff will suffer loss, the defendant has induced the plaintiff, under circumstances sufficient to control the action of a reasonable man, to pay money which he would not otherwise have paid. Keeping in mind this principle, which is applicable alike to cases where money or other valuable thing is extorted as in cases (1) to prevent the wrongful taking or detention of property; (2) to avoid injury to business; (3) in performance of a usurious contract; (4) to induce a defendant (as in case of a public officer) to discharge a duty; (5) to avoid arrest, or to be released therefrom,—and it will be seen that the unlawful act of the defendant is the keynote to the whole doctrine. See Keener, Quasi Cont. c. 11. This being so beyond a peradventure, it is not perceived how plaintiff can be entitled to recover in the present case. All that defendant threatened or was about to do was to foreclose, in the usual way, his mortgage which plaintiff had executed, and which was overdue. This was not an unlawful act. It was the exercise of a right which the law conferred upon him, and was neither in law nor morals reprehensible. In Buck v. Axt, 85 Ind. 512, which was an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by Buck and wife to secure an antecedent debt owing by the husband, the wife pleaded duress, and averred she executed the mortgage under a threat that if she refused "they would sell her out of house and home, and Frazier would prosecute her at once." The court, in holding the allegation of duress insufficient, said: "The threats alleged were not such as to constitute duress. The evident meaning of the threats used was that Frazier would at once seek his legal remedies against her and her husband, and so sell them out of house and home; and if more than this was meant the facts should have been alleged to show it." See, also, Kohler v. Wells, 26 Cal. 606. The whole question is in a nutshell. To pursue or threaten to pursue the usual legal steps for the collection of a debt in the manner provided by law does not constitute duress of property. According to plaintiff's own testimony, this was all that was proposed or hinted at here. Thereupon, according to his testimony, he proposed to convey all the mortgaged property to defendant, and take back an agreement to repurchase, upon paying the principal and interest by September 1st. In such agreement, by mistake, as he understood it (but, as he admits, defendant did not so understand it), an amount larger than the aggregate of principal and interest was included as the price at which it was to be repurchased. He afterwards, with full knowledge of all the facts, caused the full amount to be paid without protest. By so doing he ratified the agreement, and, as before stated, the payment became voluntary, and cannot be recovered. Kohler v. Wells, supra. The excuse that plaintiff thought defendant was about to leave the state to avoid the conveyance is without merit. He had agreed to convey the property, and, had he in fact sought to evade the agreement, plaintiff had only to tender performance to conserve all his legal rights. It follows that the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted, and that the verdict is not supported by evidence, and the judgment is against law. The judgment and order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed, and a new trial granted.

HINCKLEY v. AYRES et al. (No. 15,788.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan 2, 1895.)

MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE.

On an issue as to whether defendant was the wife of deceased, she testified that they had verbally agreed to be husband and wife, and that, after living apart for two years thereafter, during which time there was occasional sexual intercourse, she lived with deceased for three years, till his death. Friends of deceased who frequently called at his house testified that she was introduced by him as "Miss D., my niece," and that they had always known her as Miss D., and that she so signed her name, and was so called by deceased in his letters to them. The business agent of deceased testified that he had been on close terms with deceased and defendant, and always knew her as Miss D., and heard her variously spoken of by deceased as "Miss D.," "my niece," "Cousin Alice," etc., and that after the death of deceased she said to witness "I am Mrs. B.," and on his questioning her as to when she became such she replied, "You know how I have been living with Mr. B., and I expect you to help me prove my claim." There was also evidence of numerous letters by her to deceased, in which she addressed him as "Dear Uncle," and signed herself "Your Niece," and evidence that deceased intended to adopt her legally as his niece. Held, that the evidence sustained a finding that defendant was not the wife of deceased.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Action by Florence Blythe Hinckley against Abbie Ayres, Alice Edith Blythe, and others to establish plaintiff's right to the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Alice Edith Blythe appeals. Affirmed.

Henry E. Highton and E. D. Wheeler, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop, T. I. Bergin, W. H. H. Hart, W. W. Foote, and H. I. Kowalsky, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This case is a branch of the litigation which arose out of the settlement of the estate of Thomas H. Blythe, deceased. The general history of that litigation and the leading facts upon which it was founded are sufficiently stated in the opinions of the court in Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915, and Id., 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522; and they need not be here repeated. The present appeal is taken by defendant "Alice Edith Blythe" (so called in the transcript by order of the lower court) from an order denying her motion for a new trial. She claims to have been the lawful wife of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased, at the time of his death, and to be now his widow. The court found against this claim. She also contends that the respondent, Florence Blythe, is not the daughter of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased; and the court found against this contention. The elaborate brief of her counsel, covering 438 pages, has two main divisions. In "Division 1" it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that respondent is the daughter of said Blythe, deceased; and in "Division 2" that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that appellant was not the lawful wife of said deceased.

1. With respect to the contention made in said division 1 of the brief, it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the evidence presented in the transcript on this appeal, or in the argument of counsel, that changes or affects the conclusion reached on the former appeals on the subject of the paternity of the respondent. There was evidence sufficient to support the finding of the lower court that she is the daughter of the deceased; and we do not care to say anything more on the subject than was said in the opinions delivered in the said cases of Blythe v. Ayres, 96 Cal. 532, 31 Pac. 915, and Id., 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522.

2. It is not to be wondered at that counsel contend strenuously for their second proposition, viz. that appellant was the wife of the deceased. For if she was not his wife, then, notwithstanding the fact that she gave to him the best years of her life, and appears to have contributed more to his comfort and happiness than any other person mentioned in the record, she will be left without a dollar of his vast estate. If he had made a will and left her a large share of his ample fortune he would thereby have done an act as commendable, at least, as any other act of his life which the evidence shows. But courts cannot control the disposition of property, otherwise than as the law directs. They cannot take property from its lawful owners, and give it to others according to their own notions about its proper distribution. The trial court found that "said Thomas H. Blythe was never married to the defendant styling herself, in her answer herein, as and by the name of Alice Edith Blythe, widow of said Thomas H. Blythe, deceased"; but that for a certain period before his death she did cohabit with him as his mistress, and in no other character or capacity. And, putting the case in the most favorable light for appellant, the pivotal question is really one of fact, and presents itself in this form: Was there sufficient evidence to warrant the court in finding that from about April 1, 1880, until the death of the deceased on April 4, 1883, the appellant and deceased did not live together and cohabit as husband and wife? Of course the court may not have believed that any contract of marriage had ever been made between said persons. It may be, also, that their living together as husband and wife during said period would not have constituted marriage, because it is not pretended that there was any contract of marriage later than two years prior to the commencement of said period; and in the meantime they had meretricious intercourse. But we are passing over these questions, and putting the case most favorably to appellant. The appellant testified that on or about May 19, 1878, in a certain cottage at the corner of Dupont and Geary streets in the city of San Francisco, which she had procured from the deceased, she and said deceased, no other person being present, joined hands and used certain language to each other, the substance of which was that he promised to be her husband, and she promised to be his wife. She, before that, had been a married woman, and had been divorced. He lived in his house, or apartments, at No. 6 O'Farrell street in said city. From that time on they had sexual relations; but there can be no pretense that for the next two years there was between them any "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations." He continued to live at No. 6 O'Farrell, and during the two years she lived at a half-dozen or more different places. She testified that during said time she frequently went to No. 6 O'Farrell, when she had the opportunity, and stayed there over night with the deceased. Counsel for appellant do not contend that there was an assumption of the marriage relation at or near the time of said alleged consent and agreement to be married; but they seem to suggest that during the next two years there was a sort of gradual, unfolding, evolutionary, progress towards assumption. We dismiss this part of the case by saying that there is nothing to show anything like an assumption of the marriage relation prior to the spring of 1880, when appellant went to live with the deceased at said No. 6 O'Farrell. About April 1, 1880, the appellant commenced to live with deceased at his said house at 6 O'Farrell, and lived there with him until October, 1882, when they removed to No. 27 Geary street, where they lived until the death of the deceased on April 4, 1883. There is no need here of discussing the law of marriage without solemnization, or the question, what constitutes a "mutual assumption of marital rights, duties, or obligations," within the meaning of section 55 of the Civil Code? The law on that subject is sufficiently settled for the purposes of the case at bar in Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 26, 131; White v. White, 82 Cal. 427, 23 Pac. 276; Kilburn v. Kilburn, 89 Cal. 46, 26 Pac. 636; People v. Beevers, 99 Cal. 286, 33 Pac. 844; and other cases. There is no such assumption unless the parties live together as husband and wife, treat each other "in the usual way with married people," and so conduct themselves as to have full repute among their intimate friends and associates to be husband and wife. And, applying the law as declared in the cases above cited, the question in the case at bar is whether the court was justified by the evidence in finding that the deceased and appellant did not so live together as husband and wife. And we are satisfied that the evidence was sufficient to warrant the conclusion reached by the court below, and that under the well-established rule as to conflict of evidence we cannot here disturb that conclusion. The evidence upon the subject covers a great many hundred pages of the four large volumes of the transcript, and it is impracticable to notice any considerable part of it in this opinion. But, as the case is an important one,—both as to personal and property rights,—we will refer to some of the evidence and facts in proof which tend to support the finding of the court below.

At the outset one is struck with the wonderful dearth of lady visitors at the residence of the deceased and appellant. A married woman living in the usual way with a man who beyond any doubt or suspicion is her husband, no matter how humble her surroundings, has almost invariably some friends and visitors of her own sex. Entire isolation from such visitors is exceptional in the highest degree. The appellant in the case at bar appears to have been an agreeable and attractive woman, well educated, and having considerable musical and artistic tastes and capabilities. She was living with a man of wealth; and, if the relations between them had been reputed to be that of marriage, it is difficult to imagine why she did not have a number of respectable women among her associates and visitors. But, practically, she had none after she commenced to live openly with the deceased at his house.

When determining whether a man and woman were living together as husband and wife, we look mainly to those who knew most about the situation, who were the most intimate with them, who had the best opportunity to observe their conduct towards each other, and who knew best what their relation was reputed to be. And, naturally, they are those who have been social visitors to, and inmates of, the house where the persons in question lived. The visitors to the house were gentlemen, and there were not very many of them. As counsel for appellant say: "There was but little company at 3 O'Farrell. Mr. Blythe's visitors there were gentlemen who called to see him about his Mexican property." But some of them were, or became, quite intimate social acquaintances, and quite familiar with the house and its occupants. The most intimate of these was the witness Gen. Andrade. He had visited the house in question very often, and finally, at the request of the deceased, took up his quarters there, and lived there permanently for three months at one time in 1882. He slept and took his lunch and dinner there. Appellant ate at the table with him and deceased, and sang and played for them in the evening. Sometimes Mr. Yberri, another friend and visitor, was also there. Andrade therefore had the most ample opportunity of observing and knowing the relations of the parties; and he testifies that he always knew her as Miss Dickason, and not as Mrs. Blythe; that Blythe called her "Alice," or "dear Alice," or "my child," and that he heard him introduce her as "Miss Dickason, my niece." In a letter written by him to Blythe a short time before the latter's death, he speaks of the appellant as "Miss Dickason." The appellant herself, when testifying, was asked: "Did he [Blythe] ever introduce you to General Andrade as his wife?" and answered, "Mr. Andrade thought I was his niece." The witness Jeffers was also an old and intimate acquaintance of the deceased "in business and social affairs." He first met appellant at lunch at No. 6 O'Farrell. He said she "was addressed as Miss Dickason, and that is the name I have since known her by." He says that in July or August, 1882, he went to see Blythe when the latter was sick, at said No. 6. When he first entered the room the appellant was there, but shortly afterwards went out. The witness testified that: "Then I said to Mr. Blythe, 'Do you intend to marry Alice?' He said, 'No, but I shall make her my legal niece.'" Appellant admitted that Jeffers always called her Miss Dickason or Alice. Mr. Yberri was a visitor at the house. Appellant testified that he stopped there at one time for a couple of weeks, taking his dinner and lunch there, and she being at the table. But Yberri thought she was Miss Dickason. As late as February, 1883, he wrote to the deceased as follows: "I beg you to give my respects to Miss Dickason. I am very much obliged to her kindness, notwithstanding I have been informed what poor idea she has of my heart." George S. Irish, who had business connections with the deceased, visited the house a number of times in 1881 and 1882. He knew appellant as Miss Dickason. He took her once to the theater. Appellant admitted going to the theater with him, and testified that "Mr. Irish thought I was his [Blythe's] niece." In a letter of October 26, 1882, Irish says: "Kindly thank Miss Dickason for writing, and tell her," etc. George Eggleton visited a number of times both at No. 6 O'Farrell and 27 Geary, and took lunch and dinner there. He testified that Blythe introduced him to appellant, saying: "Mr. Eggleton, Alice, my niece." L. H. Varney was Blythe's business agent at San Francisco, and had been for many years before and down to his death, and was on a social standing with both the parties. He was at the house very often, at least two or three times a week, looking after repairs, supplies, etc. He had the greatest opportunity of knowing the relations existing between Blythe and appellant. He testified that: "From 1879 up to the middle of June, 1882, I always knew her as Miss Alice Edith Dickason, and as Mrs. A. P. Vilette in May, 1878. From 1879 up to the middle of June, 1882, I knew her as Miss Dickason; from that time until the death of Mr. Blythe I knew her as Cousin Alice or Miss Dickason. Never knew her during that time by any other name." He testified that in May or June, 1882, appellant requested him to take a walk with her; that they went into a store in which rugs, skins, etc., were kept; that she told him Blythe was going to build a house in Mexico, in which he wanted such things instead of carpets; and that Mr. Blythe was going to adopt her as his niece. He further testified that a day or two after Blythe's death he saw appellant, when the following occurred: "She came to my room on Market street, and said: 'I am Mrs. Blythe.' I said: 'Alice, since when have you been Mrs. Blythe? This is the first time I ever heard you called Mrs. Blythe.' She said: 'You know how I have been living with Mr. Blythe, and I expect you to help me prove my claim.' And I told her I knew nothing about it." Jerome Deasy, a private detective, testified that he was employed by Blythe as a bodyguard for three years; that he once asked Blythe why he discharged a certain colored girl, and he said that he was going to have Miss Dickason take charge of the house; and that up to the death of Blythe he knew the appellant as Miss Dickason. The persons named above are about the only ones who had opportunities of observing the parties closely, and intimately knowing their relations. No person having such opportunities has known the appellant as Mrs. Blythe.

A few more facts and circumstances may be here stated. On January 1, 1883, appellant wrote a note to the witness Varney, asking him to call and have a glass of eggnog, and signed it "Cordially, yours, A. Dickason." A large number of letters were introduced in evidence, written by appellant to Blythe,—mostly when he was in Mexico,—in which she addressed him as "Dear Uncle," and signed herself "Your Niece" or "Devotedly, your Niece." No letter was produced from him to her. She kept an artist's studio, on which was always the name "Miss Dickason," and went to an art school under that name. She had no calling cards with the name "Mrs. Blythe." In 1881 there was issued to her a certificate of mining stock which she indorsed "Alice Dickason." In addition to the occasions above mentioned, she was at other times introduced by Blythe as "Miss Dickason, my niece," "My housekeeper," etc., without protest by her. On the day of Blythe's death, the witness McDonald called at the house to offer his services, and saw the appellant. He asked to whom he was speaking, and she replied "Alice Dickason." He took out a card to write the name, and asked her how to spell it, when she took the card and wrote on it "Dickason." As to Blythe himself, he usually referred to her as "Miss Dickason," "My niece, Alice," "housekeeper," or "cousin." In letters to Andrade and other friends, he always referred to her as "Miss Dickason." In 1882 and 1883 he wrote numerous letters to his daughter in England, and in them always referred to appellant as "Cousin Alice," and in the daughter's replies she was referred to as "Cousin Alice"; and in appellant's testimony she says that Mr. Blythe read her these letters. Shortly before his death he told the witness Luttrell, who had jested him about getting married, that he was too old; that no one would marry him except for his money; that he had never been married, and never would be; and that he had no one but his housekeeper. When he asked the witness Irish to take appellant to the theater, Irish asked him why he didn't go along, and he replied: "O, no; I never go out. When Miss Dickason wants to go I usually send Varney with her." On one occasion he exacted of the witness Jeffers the promise that, if he (Blythe) should die first, Jeffers would care for his daughter "and be faithful to my friend, Miss Dickason." In the summer of 1881 the witness De Grost had a conversation with him about his mode of living, and on the subject of marriage, and Blythe said that "he had met a comely young person, a Miss Dickason, whom he had taken into his service as housekeeper." Upon another occasion, in 1882, he said to the same witness that he desired to bring his daughter out from England, "but his domestic arrangements seemed to present a difficulty about bringing out the girl." The witness told him that he thought that "a moneyed consideration—a few thousand dollars—might cause a good-looking young woman to prefer her freedom, and take the chances of marrying a young man instead of keeping house for an old one. He seemed hurt, and said, impatiently, that he had thought of that, but did not want to terminate those relations abruptly, and an expedient had occurred to him of adopting her as his niece, and he said he had done so."

We think that the foregoing is sufficient to indicate the general character of the evidence for respondent—although it forms but a part of the great mass of evidence. Counsel for appellant would no doubt consider it a one-sided statement; and, to a great extent, it is so. We are not here weighing conflicting evidence and finding facts. We are merely noticing some of the evidence which supports the finding of the court; and, in view of the evidence already noticed, it is difficult to conceive how any contrary evidence could possibly do more than raise a conflict which would leave the case entirely within the province of the trial court. Appellant, no doubt, produced evidence more or less favorable to her side. She introduced a number of witnesses—mostly tradespeople who had dealt with appellant or delivered packages at the house—who thought she was Mrs. Blythe. But other witnesses of the same character—that is, merchants and mechanics who furnished goods or labor—did not think that she was Mrs. Blythe. There was also some testimony of casual acquaintances that on a few occasions Blythe recognized or introduced her as his wife. What credence the court gave to this testimony we do not know; but they were matters about which witnesses might easily have been mistaken, and, at least when considered in connection with the evidence above noticed, this testimony raised but a slight conflict. Appellant explained why she wrote to Blythe as "uncle," and signed the letters as "niece," by saying that he did not want it to be known in Mexico that he was married. But why did he wish to deny his marriage in Mexico? Of this there is no plausible explanation. It was shown that Blythe, about the time he first became intimate with appellant, had some trouble with a woman named Firman, and this is set up as some excuse for secrecy; but all trouble with her was settled and ended in the fall of 1879. It was shown, also, that in the presence of the gentlemen who visited the house the conduct of appellant was proper and ladylike. Other things favorable to appellant were, no doubt, shown. But the position to be maintained by appellant is this: That the evidence so overwhelmingly preponderates to the point that appellant and deceased lived and cohabited together as man and wife that there was no substantial conflict on the point, and that the court below abused its discretion in finding otherwise. Such position is utterly untenable. The transcript contains a number of exceptions to rulings upon the admissibility of evidence and other questions of law; but they have not been much pressed in the argument. It is sufficient to say that we see no errors—if any there are—of sufficient importance to at all affect the decision of the case. Neither do we see any ground for a new trial on the score of newly-discovered evidence.

Under the foregoing views we deem it unnecessary to notice the many positions taken by counsel for respondent as to the requisite proof of an unsolemnized marriage, nor to review the many authorities cited by counsel for both sides. Those views lead us clearly to the conclusion that the findings of the superior court should not be disturbed. The order appealed from is affirmed.

RANDALL v. DUFF et al. (No. 15,718.)
PRACTICE ON APPEAL—MOTION TO AFFIRM.

Where, prior to a hearing of an appeal in its regular order, respondent moved to affirm the judgment upon the ground that the appeal was taken for delay, and in his notice of motion stated that in support thereof he relied upon the transcript, the points and authorities of the parties already filed, and oral argument, the motion, being in substance one to advance the cause on the calendar for hearing before its time, will be denied.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by one Randall against one Duff and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. On motion to affirm the judgment and dismiss the appeal. Denied.

S. M. Buck and W. C. Belcher, for appellant. W. L. Duff, H. S. Foote, and I. D. McKisick, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Motion to affirm the judgment upon the ground that the appeal is without merit, and merely for delay. A motion heretofore made herein to dismiss the appeal was urged upon the same grounds as are now urged in support of the present motion, and was denied. 37 Pac. 803. In the opinion then given, reference was made to Howell v. Howell, 101 Cal. 115, 35 Pac. 443, in which it was said: "When an appeal has been regularly taken from an order of the superior court, the lack of a bill of exceptions embodying and authenticating its proceedings is not a ground for dismissing the appeal, but rather for a judgment of affirmance, if, as is usually the case, there is, in the absence of such bill of exceptions, nothing in the record upon which the action of the superior court can be properly reviewed;" and the respondent presents that case as authority for his present motion. The opinion in that case does not authorize a motion for the affirmance of a judgment immediately upon the filing of a transcript, or prior to a hearing upon the appeal in its regular order, but holds that upon such hearing a judgment of affirmance would necessarily be given. The additional ground for the motion—that, as the judgment appealed from was entered in conformity with the directions of this court on the former appeal, the present appeal is a contempt of this court—does not appear upon the face of the judgment, and cannot be determined without an examination of the record in the two cases. Whether the judgment so entered is according to the directions upon the former appeal is the real question to be determined on this appeal, and counsel on each side has filed a brief in support of his position. The respondent states in his notice of the present motion that on the hearing of said motion, and in support thereof, he will rely "upon the transcript, upon the points and authorities of the appellant and respondent now on file in said action, and upon oral argument." This is, in substance, only a motion to advance the cause for hearing prior to being reached in its order upon the calendar; and it can be readily seen that, if such procedure is permitted, the number of respondents who will urge an early hearing of their causes on account of the lack of merit in the appeal will be increased to such a degree as to practically dispense with the regular calendars of causes. If, upon the hearing, it shall be made to appear that the appeal is without merit, and has been taken merely for delay, the statute furnishes an appropriate remedy. Code Civ. Proc. § 957. The motion is denied.

PERRY et al. v. QUACKENBUSH. (No. 14.-497.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

FINDINGS OF FACT — EFFECT OF DISCREPANCIES — BUILDING CONTRACT — BREACH BY CONTRACTOR — DEFECTIVE WORK — CANCELLATION OF NOTE.

1. The finding by the trial court of the ultimate fact controls its findings as to the probable facts.

2. In an action to cancel a note and mortgage given for the construction of a house, the court found that the quality of material contracted for was not used; that the building was not properly constructed; that the foundation was not as large as contracted for; that second-hand brick, of poor quality, instead of good, hard brick, were used; that the piers were only a fourth part as large as called for, were of inferior brick, and were only half as many as were called for; and that second-hand and refuse lumber was used. Held, that there was not a substantial performance, and hence plaintiff was entitled to have the note canceled, though the court also found that there was only a difference of $350 between the value of the house as constructed and as it should have been constructed, the contract price having been $3,000.

3. Where the amount of costs claimed is less than $500, an order made, after final judgment, striking out the cost bill, is not appealable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by Edward H. Perry and another against Thomas M. Quackenbush to cancel a note and mortgage. From a judgment merely adjudging that a certain amount be deducted from the note, plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellants. E. J. Pringle, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from the judgment, and upon the judgment roll. The complaint shows: That plaintiffs own a described tract of land. That on the 21st of January, 1887, they entered into a contract with the defendant, whereby defendant agreed, in consideration of the sum of $3,000, to construct and build a house on said lot. As part of said contract, plaintiffs executed and delivered to defendant their promissory note for the sum of $3,000, and a mortgage to secure the same on the described real estate. The note and mortgage are recited at length in the complaint. Thereupon, the defendant commenced the construction of the house, but in building the same did not furnish the quantity and quality of materials provided for in the contract. That he did not construct said building in a good and workmanlike manner, and did not construct the building according to the contract, and has not performed his agreement. Plaintiffs specify as defects: He agreed, in the construction of the foundations, to use good, hard brick, and lay seven courses, and to construct twelve piers of brick, laid in six courses. In violation of the agreement, he used old, second-hand brick, of poor quality, that had been used in other buildings, and laid the same in courses in five and six, instead of seven, and constructed only six piers, of brick of the same kind, laid in three courses. (2) He agreed to use in the construction of the frame of said building the best kind of lumber. Contrary to his agreement, he used only second-class lumber, and second-hand and refuse lumber that had been used in other buildings. (3) He agreed to use in the construction of the roof the best quality of shingles. Contrary to his agreement, he used second-hand lumber and second-class shingles. (4) He agreed to paint the building with two coats of metallic paint, but used no metallic paint at all, but cheap and inferior paint. (5) In divers other respects, he disregarded and failed to carry out the agreement. That there is $1,000 difference in the value of the house as constructed and as called for under the agreement.

The answer denies all the allegations of the complaint in respect to the failure to perform the contract, and avers that the building was accepted by plaintiffs after a careful examination.

The action was brought to have the note canceled. Upon the issues made by the pleading, the court found that the construction of the building was completed before the commencement of this action; that, in constructing said building, defendant did not furnish the quantity and quality of materials provided for in said contract; that defendant did not construct said building in a good and workmanlike manner; that defendant did not perform said contract, nor construct said building according to said agreement. There are then findings specifying defects as in the complaint, and finding all in favor of plaintiffs as alleged, except that, as to the roof, it finds that the shingles were of the quality agreed upon, and, as to the painting, that defendant did not agree to use metallic paint, but in painting the building he used cheap and inferior material, contrary to his agreement. After these specific findings is the following finding: "That, in divers other respects, defendant disregarded his said specifications, and failed to carry out his agreement." It was then found that "there is $350 difference in value of said building, as actually constructed, and as it should have been constructed under said agreement, pursuant to said specifications." It was found that the note and mortgage, if left outstanding, may cause serious injury to plaintiffs; that the building was never accepted or received by the plaintiffs in full or part satisfaction of the contract, but plaintiffs took possession of the building under protest, and with notice to defendant that they were dissatisfied with it, and would not accept it, and offered "to deliver up to defendant said building, if defendant would cancel said note and mortgage." As conclusion of law from these facts, the court found that plaintiffs were entitled to judgment; that $350 be deducted from the amount secured by the note and mortgage; and that, as to the residue, the note and mortgage were adjudged valid. A judgment was entered in accordance with the conclusion of law. From this judgment, plaintiffs have appealed, claiming that it is not supported by the findings of fact.

This contention must be sustained. The issues were whether the building had been constructed according to contract, and, if it had not been so constructed, whether it had been accepted by the plaintiffs as performed. On both these issues the court found for the plaintiffs. Respondent contends that what he calls the "old rule" upon the subject of performance has been relaxed, and now a more liberal rule, which only requires a substantial performance, instead of a literal compliance with all the provisions of the contract, prevails. But, conceding this, the rule still is that the contract must be substantially performed. The court here did not find that what was done, though not a literal compliance, amounted to substantial performance, or that the failure was only in trivial matters. Upon every material issue the facts are found for the plaintiffs, and unless their complaint was demurrable, which is not claimed, they are entitled to the judgment demanded.

Respondents' counsel claims that the ultimate fact found, of nonperformance, is a conclusion from the probative facts found, and that the finding of probative facts, being more specific, must control. This point cannot be maintained for several reasons:

1. Findings of probative facts will not, in general, control, limit, or modify the finding of the ultimate fact. The province of the trial court is to find the ultimate facts, and not probative facts. If, from a consideration of the probative facts, this court should determine that they did not justify the finding of the ultimate fact, it would determine that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision. This, it has been repeatedly held, cannot be done in this mode. In Smith v. Ackner, 52 Cal. 217, the court said: "It has been held that where facts are found, from which the existence of the ultimate fact must be conclusively inferred, the finding is sufficient as a finding of the ultimate fact. But, when the ultimate fact is found, no finding of probative facts, which may tend to establish that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence, can overcome the principal finding." And it is said, "This point could only have been made on motion for a new trial, or on appeal on a statement or bill of exceptions specifically pointing out the deficiencies in the evidence." In other words, the opposing party must be allowed to show what the evidence was, and is not concluded by the finding of probative facts. This decision was expressly affirmed by this court in Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 Pac. 64. See, also, Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174; Barrante v. Garratt, 50 Cal. 112; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Mathews v. Kinsell, 41 Cal. 512; Downing v. Graves, 55 Cal. 544.

2. The probative facts found are not inconsistent with the ultimate fact found. On the contrary, they tend to support it. It is found, for instance, that defendant did not furnish the quantity or quality of materials called for, and did not construct the building in a good and workmanlike manner; that the foundation was not as large as contracted for, and, instead of good, hard brick, he used old, second-hand brick, of poor quality. The piers were only one-fourth part as large as called for, and of inferior, old brick, and only half as many of them. There was no first-class lumber in the framework, and some of it was old, refuse lumber from other buildings. The paint used was inferior to that called for in the agreement. And then, to prevent the conclusion that the ultimate fact of nonperformance was a deduction from the specific facts stated, it is added that in divers other respects the contract had not been performed.

3. If there were no other findings save the specific findings, I think it a case where the ultimate fact that the contract has not been substantially performed would be necessarily inferred. The findings may be, in fact, unjust to defendant, but we cannot go behind them. If true, they show an intentional departure from the contract,—in fact, an attempted fraud. Under such circumstances, the court would not have been justified in finding that there had been a substantial performance.

Nor does the finding that the difference between the value of the house as actually constructed and as it should have been was only $350, tend to show that the contract had been substantially performed. That might have been true, though the structure were totally unlike the house contracted for. The owner has a right to have built the structure he contracted for, and not another. Even his caprices, if expressed in the contract, must be complied with, even though they would not have added to the value of the structure, or may have lessened its value. It is only when this plan has been substantially embodied in the work that the court can have an occasion to estimate the deficiencies. The authorities are very clear upon this point. There are a variety of cases to which the so-called modern equitable rule has been applied. One is where the contractor fails to complete the structure. In such case it is said, if the contractor has done or furnished anything of which the owner avails himself, such owner may be made to pay the value of it, after deducting all damages resulting from the failure of the contractor. In such case it has been sometimes said that it does not matter why the contractor failed to perform. Another case is where there is a defect which can be remedied. Here the contractor may recover the contract price, less damages caused by the failure, including costs of supplying the deficiency. Another case is where the contractor has endeavored, in good faith, to perform his contract, and has substantially performed, but there are some unimportant defects, arising through accident or inadvertence. Here, the defects not being such as defeat or materially change the design embodied in the contract, the contractor may recover, less damages occasioned by the failure. In such case there must be a substantial performance of every material covenant in the contract, and the failure must not have resulted from design or bad faith; and whether these facts exist is a matter to be determined by the jury, or the court sitting as a jury. Substantial performance must be found. The rule is laid down in Kelly v. Bradford, 33 Vt. 35. The court says: "The party must have intended, in good faith, to comply with the terms of the contract. The spirit of the contract must be faithfully observed, though the very letter of it fail. Hence, a voluntary abandonment of the agreement, or a willful departure from its stipulations, are not allowed. Still, if the contract is substantially kept, a failure in minor particulars—though plainly ascertainable, and patent to observation, if consistent with good faith, if not wanton or willful—will not prevent a recovery upon the quantum meruit." In Hayward v. Leonard, 7 Pick. 180, it is said: "When we speak of the law allowing the party to recover on a quantum meruit or quantum valebant, where there is a special contract, we mean to confine ourselves to cases in which there is an honest intention to go by the contract, and a substantive execution of it." In Elliott v. Caldwell, 43 Minn. 357, 45 N. W. 845, it is said: "The omissions and deviations were not slight and easily remedied, but substantial and remediless, except by tearing down and rebuilding the structure. Neither were they the result of mistake or oversight, but intentional, and even fraudulent. And we may remark here, in passing, that the very nature of the deviations, as in using inferior and defective material all through the building, is intrinsic evidence strongly supporting the finding that defendant acted fraudulently. No case, we think, can be found where the doctrine of substantial performance was applied to such a state of facts. To justify a recovery upon the contract, as substantially performed, the omissions or deviations must be the result of a mistake or inadvertence, and not intentional,—much less, fraudulent; and they must be slight, or susceptible of remedy, so that an allowance out of the contract price will give the other party substantially what he contracted for. They must not be substantial, and running through the whole work, so as to be remediless, and defeat the object of having the work done in a particular manner. And these are questions of fact, for the jury or trial court." In Crouch v. Gutmann, 134 N. Y. 45, 31 N. E. 271, the rule is stated in these words: "Since the rule of exact or literal performance has been relaxed, and recovery may be founded upon 'substantial performance,' that term, in its practical application to building contracts, has, perhaps necessarily, become somewhat indefinite, otherwise than that the builder must have in good faith intended to comply with the contract, and shall substantially have done so, in the sense that the defects are not pervasive, do not constitute a deviation from the general plan contemplated for the work, and are not so essential that the object of the parties in making the contract, and its purpose, cannot, without difficulty, be accomplished by remedying them." There is no necessity for multiplying citations upon this point. So far as I have extended my investigations, there is no conflict in the cases. Since the rule as to what shall constitute performance has become so indefinite, it is an important consideration, in determining whether there has been a substantial performance, that the deviations are so slight that they might have been made by one who was honestly endeavoring to comply with his contract. Good faith, however, on the part of the contractor, is not enough. The owner has a right to a structure in all essential particulars such as he has contracted for; and, to authorize a court or jury to find that there has been a substantial performance, it must be found that he has such a structure. The court cannot say that anything is immaterial which the parties have made material by their contract. One has the right to determine for himself what he deems a good foundation, or what materials he desires to be used; and, if he contracts for them, neither the contractor nor the court has the right to compel him to accept something else, which may be shown by the witnesses to be just as good, or even better. No precise rule can or ought to be laid down upon this subject; but, whenever such a case arises, courts and juries should see to it that the design of the owner shall not be defeated in any important respect. I think the judgment should be modified by giving plaintiffs a decree in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

There is another appeal contained in the same transcript,—an appeal from an order, made after judgment, striking out plaintiffs' cost bill. The amount of the costs claimed was less than $300. This court, therefore, has no jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Fairbanks v. Lampkin (Cal.) 34 Pac. 101.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is modified by giving plaintiffs a decree in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and that the appeal from the order made after judgment, striking out plaintiffs' cost bill, be dismissed.

PEOPLE v. McSWEENEY. (No. 21,112.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

PROSECUTION FOR MURDER — CHARACTER OF DEFENDANT—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

1. Where the question as to what the witness in a murder case had heard against the defendant was not limited to a period prior to the homicide, it was properly ruled out.

2. Where a witness in a murder case on his direct examination did not testify that he knew the defendant's reputation at any time, and on cross-examination his testimony tended to show that his knowledge of such reputation prior to the homicide was insufficient to qualify him to testify regarding it, it was not error to refuse to allow him to further testify on the subject on his redirect examination.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; Campbell, Judge.

U. B. McSweeney was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Byron Waters and A. B. Paris, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment for life in the state prison, and appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only question presented for decision is whether or not the trial court erred in sustaining the objections of the district attorney to certain questions asked John McFee, a witness for defendant, on his re-examination by defendant's attorney. The record does not show what questions were asked by defendant's attorney on the direct examination, but shows that the witness testified that he was acquainted with the defendant; that he had known defendant for the last four or five years at Holcomb Valley, in San Bernardino county, where the homicide occurred; and that defendant's "general reputation during the past four years, in the vicinity where he has resided, for peace and quietude, has been fair." Upon cross-examination as to his means of knowledge of defendant's character, he said he had not resided at Holcomb Valley prior to the homicide, but resided six or seven miles from there, and went up there only occasionally, and was "somewhat acquainted with the reputation of McSweeney in Holcomb Valley," but that he did not remember whether he had heard defendant's "reputation for peace and quietude discussed in Holcomb Valley at all prior to the shooting." He further said: "I think I have talked about it,—about some of his actions, and that sort of thing." The following re-examination of this witness by defendant's attorney shows the action of the court assigned as error: "Mr. Paris: Q. State whether or not you have heard of his being in any difficulties there, or of a turbulent nature. Have you ever heard anything against him as a man of peace and quiet? Mr. Oster: We object to the question as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The Court: Sustained. (Defendant then and there duly excepts.) Q. State whether or not you have ever heard, in the neighborhood where you and McSweeney resided for four years, anything against the general peace and quietude of this man McSweeney's character. Mr. Oster: We object to the question as incompetent. The Court: You can answer the question 'Yes' or 'No,' if you can,—just whether or not you have heard it. A. Well, yes; I have heard about it somewhat. Q. Well, what have you heard? Mr. Oster: We object to the question on the ground that it is incompetent. The Court: Sustained. (To which ruling the defendant then and there duly excepts.) Q. Have you, in that neighborhood, for the last four years, in which you and McSweeney have resided, have you ever heard anything against the peace and quiet of that man's character? Mr. Oster: We object to the question as incompetent, on the ground that no proper foundation has been laid for it. The Court: Objection sustained. (To which ruling the defendant then and there duly excepts.)" Inasmuch as the witness was permitted to answer, and did answer affirmatively, the twice-repeated question as to whether he had heard anything said against the character of the defendant, the defendant could not have been injured by the temporary rulings against that question, even if they were erroneous, which, however, is not conceded.

The only remaining question is whether it was error to exclude an answer to the question: "Well, what have you heard?"—that is, what have you heard said against the character of the defendant? As the only answer called for by this question was what the witness had heard said against the character of the defendant, it is difficult to conceive how the defendant could have been benefited by the answer or injured by its exclusion, since the witness had already answered, in effect, that he had heard somewhat against defendant's character. But, however this may be, the question was objectionable on the ground that it was not limited to a period prior to the homicide, especially in view of the testimony of the witness on the cross-examination, in which he said he did not remember having heard defendant's reputation discussed in the community (Holcomb Valley) where he resided, prior to the homicide. People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 169, 20 Pac. 396. Furthermore, since the witness did not, on his direct examination, testify that he knew the general reputation of the defendant at any time, and his testimony on cross-examination strongly tended to show that his knowledge of such reputation in the community where defendant resided prior to the homicide was not sufficient to qualify him to testify in regard to it, the court may have properly sustained the objection to his proffered further testimony on this ground. People v. Moan, 65 Cal. 534, 4 Pac. 545; People v. Rodrigo, 69 Cal. 601, 11 Pac. 481. I think the record fails to show any error which could have been prejudicial to the defendant, and that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

HARRISON, J. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; VAN FLEET, J.

McFARLAND and GAROUTTE, JJ. We concur in the judgment. We think that some of the questions asked the witness McFee which were ruled out should have been allowed, but think that, taking the examination of that witness as a whole, appellant was not prejudiced thereby.

BOLTON v. GILLERAN et al. (No. 15,397.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS—CONTROL BY COUNCIL —DELEGATION OF POWERS—INVALID AS-SESSMENT—SUIT TO SET ASIDE.

1. The exclusive power over street improvements conferred by the legislature on the legislative department of the various city governments cannot be delegated to any officer or committee, but must be exercised by that department itself as a body.

2. Under Laws 1889, p. 157, § 2, giving authority to the city council to direct street improvements, such council must direct the manner and extent of the improvement, the items of material and work, ascertain the total expense, and definitely fix the price in the contract of construction.

3. Laws 1889, p. 157, § 3, requires the city legislative body, which in San Francisco is the board of supervisors, before contracting for street improvements, to pass a resolution of intention, "describing the work" proposed, and requires "plans and specifications and careful estimates of the cost and expense" to be furnished said board. A resolution of intention passed by said board described the work as the construction of certain sewers according to plans and specifications furnished by the city engineer. One of such specifications provided that, if the soil was unfit for a foundation, planking and concrete must be used. The bid accepted, and on which the contract was made, gave different prices per lineal foot, depending on whether such materials were necessary, the price being about one-third greater in such case. The specifications did not fix the amount of sewer work requiring such material, but the matter was left to the superintendent of streets, with whom the contract was made; he thus having the power to determine the amount of tax to be levied, to the extent of one-third the cost of construction. Held, that an assessment levied for work done under such contract was invalid.

4. An abutting owner may sue to set aside an invalid contract for sewer construction, and the assessment levied thereunder, when there is nothing on the face of the assessment to show its invalidity, since such assessment would constitute a cloud on his title.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Ellen Bolton against James Gilleran and others to set aside a contract for sewer construction made by defendants with the superintendent of streets for the city and county of San Francisco. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Ash & Mathews, F. E. Spencer, C. T. Bird, and D. W. Burchard, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed a resolution of intention, June 1, 1891, to construct sewers in Fell street, and certain connecting streets, "according to plans and specifications prepared by Charles S. Tilton, city engineer." After an order for said improvement of the streets had been passed, the board of supervisors caused notice for sealed proposals to do the work to be given, and upon receiving bids therefor awarded the contract to the respondents, Conklin & Co. After the completion of their contract the superintendent of streets made an assessment therefor, which, after being recorded, was delivered to the said respondents. A portion of the expense for doing the work was assessed against certain lands of the plaintiff, and this action was brought by her to obtain a judgment declaring that the contract made with said respondents for the work be declared null and void, and that the assessment be declared not to be a lien upon any of her said property. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The legislature of the state has conferred upon the "legislative department of the government of any city," which in San Francisco is the board of supervisors, the exclusive authority for the improvement of its streets. This legislative department of the city has no power to delegate to any other officer or body the authority to determine upon the necessity of making such improvement, or the character or extent of any improvement which it may itself direct to be made. In the language of Mr. Dillon (Mun. Corp. § 96): "It is not competent for the council to pass an ordinance delegating or leaving to any officer or committee of the corporation the power to determine the mode, manner, or plan of the improvement." Accordingly, it has been held that no valid assessment upon property can be made under an order directing the improvement "where necessary" (Richardson v. Heydenfeldt, 46 Cal. 68); or "excepting such portions of the above-described work which have been already done in a suitable manner" (Foss v. Chicago, 56 Ill. 354); or for constructing curbs "where the same are not now in good and sound condition" (Bryan v. Chicago, 60 Ill. 507); or where in constructing a drain, certain pieces of lumber were to be set "at equidistant points of not more than four feet" (Village of Hyde Park v. Carton, 132 Ill. 103, 23 N. E. 590); or improving "such portions of the sidewalks as the city engineer may direct" (Hydes v. Joyes, 4 Bush, 464); or "in such manner as the city superintendent shall direct" (Thompson v. Schemerhorn, 6 N. Y. 92). See, also, Phelps v. Mayor, 112 N. Y. 221, 19 N. E. 408; City of Kankakee v. Potter, 119 Ill. 324, 10 N. E. 212; McCrowell v. City of Bristol, 89 Va. 652, 16 S. E. 867. The legislative body must determine, not only the character and extent of the improvement which it will delegate, but also the amount of the burden which is to be imposed therefor by the assessment upon the adjacent property to defray the expense of the improvement. This power of assessment is referable to the power of taxation, and is itself a legislative power, which must not only find express authority for its exercise, but which can be neither exercised by an executive officer, or delegated to such officer by the legislative body of the municipality. The clerical or ministerial act of apportioning the assessment upon the lands to be charged therewith may be performed by another official, but whether the assessment shall be imposed upon the lands and the amount of such assessment must be determined by the legislative body. A prominent consideration before this body, in determining whether an improvement shall be made upon a street, is the amount of its expense, and the advantage that will accrue therefrom to the property which is to be charged with that expense; and, unless it can know to a reasonable degree of certainty what the expense will be, it will be unable to exercise any intelligent discretion in determining whether the improvement should be made. Hence it becomes necessary for the legislative body to know the probable expense of the improvement before it will order it to be made, and, after the improvement has been ordered, the actual expense must be approved by this body, and fixed in the contract for doing the work, as the data upon which the assessment is to be calculated. This includes, not only the price at which the work is to be done, but also the items of the material and work which enter into its construction, so that the official who is to apportion the expense shall have no other function than to compute the amounts that have been previously approved by the legislative body.

This power, and the exercise of this discretion, in the city and county of San Francisco, has been conferred upon the board of supervisors, and must be exercised by that body, and cannot be delegated by it to the superintendent of streets. By section 2 of the street improvement act of this state (St. 1889, p. 157), the authority to direct improvements is given to the city council of any municipality, which in section 34 of the act is declared to include "any body or board which under the law is the legislative department of the government of any city"; and section 3 requires, as the initiatory or jurisdictional step, that the board of supervisors shall pass a resolution of intention, "describing the work" which they propose to order done; and that "before passing any resolution for the construction of said improvements, plans and specifications and careful estimates of the cost and expenses thereof shall be furnished to said city council, if required by it, by the city engineer of said city, and for the work of constructing sewers specifications shall always be furnished by him." Section 5 provides that, before awarding any contract, a notice, with "specifications," shall be given, inviting proposals for doing the work ordered; and the city council is authorized to reject all proposals, if it deem it for the public good, and can award a contract only to the lowest responsible bidder. This contract is to be entered into by the superintendent of streets with the bidder to whom it has been awarded, and after its completion the superintendent is to apportion the expense of the work, as fixed by the contract, upon the lands liable to be assessed therefor.

The proceedings in the present case show a wide departure from these provisions. The work which was "described" in the resolution of intention was the construction of sewers upon certain designated streets, "of the materials and dimensions hereinafter described," and "according to plans and specifications prepared by C. S. Tilton, city engineer." One of these specifications was in the following terms: "If the soil be of improper nature for a foundation, it shall be removed to a sufficient depth, and two tiers of three-inch planks be laid, one tier transversely and the other tier longitudinally, to be securely spiked with six-inch cut spikes where the foundation is not sufficiently secure, and upon these planks will rest a bed of concrete, which must be laid to conform to the invert, and to be to a depth below the center of the invert, as shown on plans." In the notice for proposals calling for bids these specifications were referred to, and bidders were required to estimate for the entire work, and state for how much they would construct the sewers per lineal foot "if on stable foundation," and for how much per lineal foot "if planking and concrete should be required," "correctly computing and carrying out the aggregate amount for the entire work." Under this notice Conklin & Co. presented a bid in which they offered to take the entire work at the following prices: "Per lineal foot, for the five-foot circular brick sewer, if on stable foundation, $9.83; per lineal foot, for the five-foot circular brick sewer, if planking and concrete should be required, $12.78; per lineal foot, for the 4x5-foot elliptical-shaped brick sewer, if on stable foundation, $8.50; per lineal foot, for the 4x5-foot elliptical-shaped brick sewer, if planking and concrete should be required, $11.45; per lineal foot, for the 3x5-foot egg-shaped brick sewer, if on stable foundation, $7.20; per lineal foot, for the 3x5-foot egg-shaped brick sewer, if planking and concrete should be required, $10.24"; and the contract therefor was awarded to them at those prices, and was afterwards entered into between them and the superintendent of streets.

A mere glance at these proceedings shows that the amount of tax which is to be imposed upon the lands for the expense of the improvement was not determined by the supervisors in their award of the contract, but that they gave to the superintendent of streets the discretion to determine that amount to the extent of fully one-third thereof. For the 5-foot circular sewer which was to be constructed for $9.83 per lineal foot, the superintendent was allowed to add $2.95 for each foot, according as he should determine whether the foundation was stable or whether there should be a foundation of plank and concrete; and he was given the same discretion to determine whether the cost of the 4x5-foot elliptical brick sewer should be $8.50 or $10.45, while the cost of the 3x5 egg-shaped sewer could be increased by him from $7.20 to $10.24, an increase of nearly 50 per cent. This discretion was not controlled by any fixed rules, but its exercise was entrusted solely to his own judgment or volition. The specifications gave no indication of the amount of "stable foundation" on which the sewers were to be laid, or what character of ground should be regarded as "stable foundation," or the extent of the ground for which "planking and concrete" would be required. These matters were to be determined by the superintendent of streets alone, nor were the conditions for his determination fixed. What constituted an "improper" nature for a foundation, or what would be a "sufficient depth" to which it was to be removed, or the place in which the foundation was not "sufficiently secure," were elements of uncertainty, which prevented any previous determination of the cost. It is not sufficient to say that the character of the ground in which the sewers were to be constructed was not known to the board of supervisors. It was their duty to cause its character to be examined before ordering the improvement, and not to leave the character of the improvement to depend upon the subsequent examination by some other officer. The statute requires that, before they shall pass any resolution for the construction of the improvements, they shall cause "careful estimates of the costs and expenses thereof" to be furnished them by the city engineer. This necessarily includes an examination of the character of the ground in which the sewer is to be constructed, and is to be a guide for their deliberation. It might be that upon such an examination, and in view of the extraordinary expense that would result therefrom, they would deem it best not to order the improvement, or would cause the construction of a different kind of sewer, or would enlarge the district upon which the expense should be laid. In any event, they were not justified in divesting themselves of the responsibility that the statute has imposed upon them. A contract in terms like the present gives to the superintendent of streets the opportunity to make the cost of the improvement greater or less, according to his desire to favor or injure the contractor, vests him with an illegal discretion, tends to prepare the way for an unfair assessment, and opens wide the door to fraud and favoritism. If there is any profit in doing the work at the higher figure, the natural effect of such a contract is to induce the contractor to put planking and concrete upon the whole line of work, while, if it is without profit, he would be disposed to consider the entire foundation stable. Under such a notice for proposals, bidders can have no intelligent basis upon which to calculate the cost of the work, and all competition for doing the work is practically destroyed. The statute gives to the owners of the land to be assessed the right to take the contract at the price at which it was awarded to the successful bidder. This implies that the owners shall be definitely informed of the work which is to be done, and of the amount for which the assessment is to be made, in order that they may intelligently consider whether it will be to their advantage to take the contract; but if there are no data from which to determine the amount of material that will be required in doing the work, or if the cost thereof, to the extent of at least one-third, is to depend upon the volition of an officer who may or may not be friendly to them, they would naturally hesitate to place themselves in the position of depending upon his friendship or antagonism, and would thus fail to receive the advantage which the statute intended to confer upon them. We cannot better express the result of upholding such a proceeding than in the words of the supreme court of Illinois in Foss v. Chicago, 56 Ill. 358: "Every such covert, irresponsible, discretionary power as here assumed is wholly inconsistent with a proper exercise of the high and sovereign power of taxation or eminent domain. It might be used, and it does not affect the principle whether it was so used or not, as a cover to an unfair estimate or assessment. It might be used as the instrument of favoritism in letting the contracts for the work. Some of the parties might be made to understand that the portions of the work already done were not done in a suitable manner, and that it would all have to be removed, while others might be informed that if they got the contract the portions already done would be considered as done in a suitable manner, and be so much clear gain."

The right of the plaintiff to maintain the action is clearly established. The statute makes the assessment a lien upon her lands, and there is nothing upon the face of the assessment to show that the lien is not in all respects valid. If, by reason of matters outside of the assessment as it is recorded, this apparent lien may be shown not to be a valid incumbrance, the assessment constitutes a cloud upon her title which she is entitled to have removed; and, although she can assert the same matters as a defense to any action for the enforcement of the assessment, she is not required to wait until such action may be brought, and, in the meantime, suffer the injury of having the title to her lands impaired by this apparent lien, but may herself invoke the equitable aid of the court to remove the cloud, and to enjoin the holder of the assessment from asserting any claim upon her lands by virtue thereof. The judgment is reversed.

In re PHILBROOK. (No. 21,188.)

ATTORNEY—SUSPENSION FROM PRACTICE—ABUSE OF SUPREME COURT.

An attorney who, in his brief in the supreme court, without ground, characterizes an associate justice thereof as a corrupt person, and threatens that, if the supreme court decides adversely to his client, the general public will see that it is corrupt, should be suspended from practice.

In bank.

The supreme court, on its own motion, issued an order requiring Horace W. Philbrook to show cause why he should not be removed from his office as attorney and counselor at law. Ordered that he be suspended for three years, and thereafter until the further order of the court removing the suspension.

R. Y. Hayne, for prosecution. Horace W. Philbrook, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. Horace W. Philbrook, a licensed attorney, having filed in this court a certain brief in which he appeared to have violated his duty as an attorney, was cited to appear before the court on the 17th day of December, A. D. 1894, at 10 o'clock a. m., to show cause why he should not be removed from his office as an attorney at law, and debarred from further practicing law before the courts of this state. The citation was served on him 10 days previous to said December 17th. On said day he appeared, and, as he did not ask any continuance, but announced himself ready, the matter was proceeded with. A committee from the bar association of San Francisco requested to be allowed to appear "for the purpose of seeing that said matter is properly presented," and their request was granted. The respondent, Philbrook, filed a written answer to the citation, and he was allowed to make an oral argument in his own defense without restriction of time, his argument occupying the greater part of two days. The committee of the bar association argued that he should be disbarred. In the citation attention was called to certain pages of the brief which contained the objectionable matter, and a part of it was quoted. The respondent did not offer any apology or make any excuse; but in his written answer, and in his oral argument, he boldly contended that his brief was unobjectionable, and contained nothing which he had not the right to put there. His argument was, for the most part, a reiteration of the assertions and language of the brief.

The brief in question was filed by said Philbrook as attorney for the appellant in a certain action now pending here on appeal (No. 15,857), entitled: "Rankin, Special Administrator of the Estate of John Levinson, Deceased, Plaintiff and Appellant, vs. Wm. J. Newman and Benjamin Newman, Defendants and Respondents." Levinson, deceased, had, in his lifetime, been a copartner with the said Newmans, under the firm name of Newman & Levinson; and said action grew out of a difference about the settlement of the business and affairs of the partnership, and was decided by the trial court in favor of the Newmans. A motion for a new trial had been made by Philbrook's client in the trial court, and had been there denied; and the appeal was taken from the order denying the motion for a new trial. This appeal has not yet been argued or submitted in this court, and its merits are not before us, although the transcript in the case and also the transcripts in two other appeals between the same parties, in which the Newmans were also successful in the trial court, are made parts of the said Philbrook's answer in this present proceeding.

The objectionable parts of the said brief for which respondent, Philbrook, was cited as aforesaid, consist mainly (1) of offensive, scandalous, and contemptuous language concerning Hon. Ralph C. Harrison, one of the justices of this court; and (2) of language contemptuous of all the other justices of the court, in that it broadly intimates that they may be improperly influenced in deciding said appeal, and boldly threatens them with evil consequences to themselves if they should decide the appeal adversely to the appellant. It also contains language highly reprehensible concerning the learned judge of the superior court who heard and determined the said action at nisi prius; and his answer contains such language concerning another learned judge of the superior court, who decided the other cases mentioned in said Philbrook's answer.

During the year A. D. 1890, the Honorable Ralph C. Harrison, now a justice of this court, was, and for many years prior thereto had been, a practicing lawyer at the San Francisco bar; and during nearly all of that year he was the attorney of one Raveley, executor of said John Levinson, deceased, above mentioned. On the 6th day of September of that year (1890) a settlement was made by and between the said executor, Raveley, and the surviving partners, the said Newmans, at which two certain paper writings were executed, which were in the handwriting of Justice Harrison, and signed by him as a witness. There were articles of copartnership of the said firm of Newman & Levinson, existing and in force at the time of the death of Levinson, which provided, or at least purported to provide, for the disposition of the interest in the firm property and business of either partner upon his death. At that time, and prior thereto, the respondent here, Philbrook, was the attorney for certain legatees of said Levinson; and it appears that Philbrook thought that the estate was entitled to a share of the "good will" of the said firm, while Justice Harrison was of the opinion that, under the said articles of copartnership, the estate of Levinson had no interest in the good will, but was entitled only to its share of the partnership property, to be ascertained as provided in said articles. It is clear that this was the only point of difference existing at the time of said settlement. It was a pure question of law, as to which it was the duty of Justice Harrison to advise his client (the executor) according to his best judgment. But it happened that, a few weeks before the said 6th of September, Justice Harrison had been nominated by one of the two leading and nearly equally powerful political parties of the state as a candidate for the office of associate justice of the supreme court; and upon this circumstance respondent, Philbrook, has built up in his imagination a gigantic conspiracy which, he contends, gives him the right, under the claim of free argument, to assail Justice Harrison while a member of this court by every offensive epithet which his somewhat wide vocabulary supplies, and to ascribe to him the vilest motives and conduct. He assumes and asserts that Justice Harrison, his client Raveley, the Newmans, and their attorneys, Reinstein & Eisner, entered into a conspiracy to do a wrong, which conspiracy was founded upon the considerations that the former had been nominated as a candidate for justice of this court; that he was practically sure of election; and that, if he should draw up said paper writings and witness them, any superior judge before whom any litigation concerning the matter might come would be deterred from doing right by the knowledge that one of the conspirators was a justice of the supreme court, and that upon appeal the other justices of this court would be swerved from their duty because one of the alleged conspirators would be associated with them on the bench. And it is contended that on account of this imaginary state of facts, founded on no evidence, and without any probable cause, respondent had free rein to indulge in whatever insulting and contemptuous language his fancy might conjure up concerning a justice of this court.

It is impracticable to here reproduce any considerable amount of the language used in the brief; but a few specimens will be quoted. Having characterized Justice Harrison as one of the chief conspirators, he denounces what he calls the "secret transaction of September 6th" as "this most impudent and unspeakably wicked scheme." Having said, "There they all were, Ralph C. Harrison, Milton S. Eisner, Wm. J. Newman, Benjamin Newman, and Executor Raveley, secretly assembled, solely by reason of the fact that Ralph C. Harrison was about to become a justice of the supreme court," etc., he asks: "Could a more villainous deed than that be conceived?" He speaks of Justice Harrison and the others as "corrupt, depraved, and wicked persons," and of the former as "particeps criminis." And again he says: "It was done criminally; and it was necessary to the scheme that Ralph C. Harrison should become a justice of the supreme court." Again, he says that "every man present at that secret transaction of Saturday, September 6, 1890, knew what they were all about; knew that he was a participant in one of the foulest and blackest of crimes; that he was helping plant a dagger for the breast of justice." Again, speaking of that transaction, he asks: "Can it be that we shall find in it a clew to the secret of supreme success, the very crown of success, in the practice of the law?" And, again: "Why expect men to wear themselves out with the intemperate study of law books, as they have hitherto been written, when there is open the easier, surer, and more profitable field of low cunning by which helpless women and fatherless children may be betrayed, robbed, and made outlaws by one single stroke?" Again, he asks how far matters have gone "when so vile a scheme is contrived to pervert the courts, when it raises its head openly, plants its vile body openly in the very temple of justice, wears no other disguise than unblushing audacity and brazen impudence." The foregoing quotations give a fair idea of the character of the brief, and of the temper and animus which inspired it; and in all that respondent has presented, in his answer, in his argument, and in the several transcripts which he made parts of his answer, he has been unable to show any ground—any decent pretext—for the outrageous verbal assaults which he has made upon a member of this court. Nothing appears in connection with the transaction so often alluded to in the brief which places Justice Harrison in any other light than that of an upright and honorable lawyer, faithfully attending to the interests of his client, and advising him according to his best judgment. He also gave some testimony at the trial; but section 282, Code Civ. Proc., enjoins upon an attorney "to abstain from all offensive personality, and to advance no fact prejudicial to the honor or reputation of a party or witness unless required by the justice of the cause with which he is charged." The parts of the brief to which we have alluded are therefore contemptuous and unbearable, and entirely unwarranted under any claim of free speech. We appreciate the right of counsel to fully argue their cases, to comment on witnesses, whoever they may be, and to present views and press arguments within any reasonable bounds of propriety. There need be no difficulty in this court on that subject. It would be hard, no doubt, to designate a line that would in all cases properly divide free speech from license. But there is no trouble in the case at bar on that score, for the conduct of the respondent is, beyond doubt, entirely on the side of unbridled license. Of course, the fact that an attorney has been elected a justice of this court does not shield him from any fair criticism of his conduct when an attorney; but, when there is such unwarrantable language as that used by respondent, it is manifest that it was used because the person assailed is a justice of this court, and with intent to commit a contempt of this court. As respondent has, in the same connection, assailed, not only all the members of this court and the two superior judges above referred to, but also certain reputable lawyers, who were at one time associated with him in the litigation, and a special administrator, who was appointed at his own instance and out of his own office, charity might possibly suggest that he is the victim of abnormal suspicion and distrust. But no such defense is made; and, moreover, his brief and argument show a bright intellect and a clear mind. His conduct, therefore, exhibits only a sheer intent to be maliciously contemptuous.

With respect to the other members of the court, the language of the brief is not only generally contemptuous, but contains a direct attempt to influence them by threats of injury unless they shall adopt his views of the case. He says in his brief: "And let this be borne in mind by every justice who takes part in the decision: You were not, any more than I, either directly or indirectly a party to the secret transaction of September 6, 1890; 'and we that have free souls, it touches us not.' It will never be in any, even the slightest, degree, your act, your child, nor will you even in the slightest degree be responsible for it, unless you adopt it as your own. Though it is a lure, prepared to be held out to you as a lure, it touches you not unless you accept it." And again, having said that it is not enough for courts to be pure, but that there must be "the fullest confidence in their purity," he says: "But if this recent transaction of September 6, 1890, is not declared illegal and void, upon the rules and principles declared in Egerton v. Earl Brownlow,¹ then all to whom knowledge of the case may come will no longer merely suspect or even think that the courts may be corrupted; they will know it; they may point to the decision here as full proof of it; for it will be established that such practices are permissible, and, if permissible, they are sure to have their effect." This is a palpable attempt to influence a decision of this court by base appeals to the supposed timidity of its justices, and made, too, by an officer of the court. It is intolerable. It cannot be suffered by any occupant of the bench who has a just sense of his duty to the people to preserve the due dignity of their courts and the free course of justice. An attempt to influence a judge through fear of physical injury is no graver offense than such an attempt against his reputation. A high-spirited man might have perfect physical courage, and yet might possibly, despite all his efforts against it, be, to some extent, insensibly affected by dread of the loss of his reputation and good name. Neither attempt can be for a moment countenanced without a manifest injury to the cause of justice. When people come into courts as litigants, they have the right to expect the best judgments of their judges, uninfluenced except by legitimate arguments made openly before them by counsel. They must expect those errors which will sometimes inevitably be committed by minds which are not infallible; but they should be able to feel sure that the impartiality of the court will not be disturbed by any influence of fear or favor. And clearly nothing tends more to disturb that impartiality than a menace that the decision of a cause a certain way will destroy or greatly injure the good name of the judge who shall make it. And when the punishment of such an offense is clearly within the jurisdiction of the court, as in the case of one of its own officers, it must impose the penalty or neglect its imperative duty.

We exceedingly regret the necessity of this proceeding. It would have been much more agreeable for us to have devoted the time given to its hearing to other business. But to have overlooked it would have been to violate our duty, invite future disrespect and indignities, and establish a precedent which would have embarrassed the court if offenses of a similar character should be called to its attention in the future. It may be not out of place to say that we have been lenient to the respondent for past offenses of a character similar to the one now before us, though not so flagrant; and that his attention has heretofore been directly called to his disregard of his duties as an attorney in this respect. In a petition for rehearing, he used disrespectful language towards a commissioner of the court who had prepared the opinion in the case, for which, perhaps, he should have been called to account at the time; and more recently we were compelled to strike out his brief in another case for disrespectful language; and even now we regret that we cannot see some escape from the necessity of imposing the penalty which seems to be imperatively demanded.

Our conclusion is that by filing said brief the respondent, Philbrook, has violated his duty as an attorney "to maintain the respect due to the courts of justice and judicial officers," and "to abstain from offensive personality, and to advance no fact prejudicial to the honor or reputation of a party or witness, unless required by the justice of the cause with which he is charged," as declared in section 282 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and that for such reason he should be suspended from his office of attorney at law.

It is ordered and adjudged that the said respondent, Horace W. Philbrook, be, and he hereby is, suspended from his office as attorney and counselor at law, and prohibited from practicing as an attorney and counselor at law in any and all of the courts of this state, for the period of three years from this date, and thereafter until the further order of this court removing such suspension.

BEATTY, C. J. (concurring). My views of this case differ in some particulars from those of my associates. It was not because of Mr. Philbrook's assault upon a member of this court—gross and unjustifiable as I deemed it to be—that I joined in the order citing him to show cause. So far as that part of his offense was concerned, I should have waited until the final determination of the appeal in Rankin vs. Newman before deciding what, if any, action it was necessary or proper to take. But, as is clearly shown in the opinion of the court, Mr. Philbrook did not confine himself to an assault upon Justice Harrison in his character of attorney for Levinson's executor, and as advisor and participant in the settlement of the executor with the surviving partners. He went much further. He distinctly threatened the other members of the court with public infamy and disgrace if they did not decide the cause of Rankin vs. Newman in his favor. This he did, not only in the express terms of that part of his brief set forth in the citation, but indirectly, and by every sort of implication, through page after page of that portion of his brief to which his attention was directed by the reference to the said pages. In his long and carefully prepared answer in writing Mr. Philbrook makes no retraction or qualification of this objectionable language, but, on the contrary, distinctly reavows everything he has said. He claims—and I fully concede the claim—that if a justice of this court has been a party, or attorney, or witness, or in any other manner so connected with a cause which is on appeal here as justly to subject him to criticism, counsel charged with the presentation of such cause must be allowed the same freedom of criticism as in the case of any other person. But the logic of this proposition is that the fact that such party or witness is a member of this court is wholly irrelevant; it has nothing to do with the case. Mr. Philbrook, however, does not hold himself bound by the logic of his proposition. He does not criticise Justice Harrison's conduct as attorney for Levinson's executor the same as if he were not a member of this court, but apparently because he is a member of the court he assails him with the bitterest invective, for the purpose of giving point and force to the proposition to which his whole argument tends,—that we cannot affirm the order of the superior court without making ourselves participants of the fraud which he charges, and thereby giving all men reason to know that the courts of the country are corrupt. In this consists the offense of which, in my opinion, the court was compelled to take cognizance on its own motion,—a step to which, I may say, we resorted with great reluctance. The law which is such cases makes us the judges of offenses against the court places us in an extremely delicate and invidious position, but it leaves us no alternative except to allow the court and the people of the state, in whose name and by whose authority it acts, to be insulted with impunity, or to exercise the authority conferred by law for the purpose of compelling attorneys to "maintain the respect due to courts and justice and judicial officers."

If an attorney were to approach a court or judge with the offer of a bribe to decide a cause in his favor, or if he were to menace a judge with personal violence or pecuniary loss if he decided against him, it cannot be doubted that all men would concede the propriety of depriving him of his privileges as an attorney; and, if this is so, it cannot be denied that some penalty is incurred by an attorney who reinforces his argument by announcing to the court with endless repetition that an adverse decision will make the judges participants of a fraud, and sharers in the infamy of its perpetrators. It is not necessary, however, to elaborate this proposition here. It is plainly enough set forth in the opinion of the court, and does not even need exposition, for it must be obvious to the meanest apprehension that threats or menaces of any character addressed to a court as a part of, or in aid of, the argument upon the law and facts of a case, is an obstruction to the free and unbiased consideration which every cause should receive, and that, if such means of influencing the action of the court should become common, as they might if allowed to pass unrebuked, no rights would remain secure. Mr. Philbrook himself, by his tardy disclaimer, made in the course of his oral argument, seems to admit the justice of these views. But, as above stated, he makes no disclaimer or retraction in his written answer to the citation, which remains a public record of the court. On the contrary, he therein deliberately reaffirms and insists upon the propriety of every word contained in his brief. He claims, of course, never to have understood, until his attention was called to it by a brother attorney during a recess of the court taken just before the close of his argument, that he was charged with having menaced the judges with any disagreeable consequences to themselves in case of an adverse decision. He asks us to believe that, with one of the most offensive passages of his brief set before his eyes in the terms of the citation; and with 10 days for the careful reconsideration, which he says in his answer he has given to the matter, he never saw what is patent to the observation of every one else. It is difficult to credit Mr. Philbrook with such simplicity of understanding, but it may be true that he has become so blinded by his animosity against Justice Harrison, and so dominated by the belief that the "secret transaction of September 6, 1890," as he terms it, was a gross and wicked fraud, that he has lost the capacity of regarding any other aspect of the case. Indeed, his conduct during the hearing of the citation would seem to indicate that this is so, for, after devoting the greater part of two days to a vindication and renewal of his assault upon Justice Harrison, he interrupted the course of his argument for a few moments to inform the court that during the recess a brother attorney, in whom he had confidence, had informed him that to some minds the language of his brief might convey the idea of a threat. He, however, professed not to see it, even after his attention had been so directed to the matter, but offered, if the court differed with him, to cancel the offensive passages in the briefs on file, and in those which he had distributed among his friends. In my opinion, this retraction was wholly insufficient. Mr. Philbrook had not only been informed by a brother attorney of the offensive construction which might be put upon his brief; but he had been notified at the opening of the proceedings, by the argument of Mr. Hayne, that such was the construction placed upon it by the committee of the bar association, and he was plainly informed from the bench that it was understood in the same way by the court. If, in spite of these plain intimations, he was still unable to see what was so clearly apparent to others, it ought to have occurred to him that he would do well to take further advice of those in whom he had confidence as to the propriety of modifying his written answer, and of introducing into that permanent record a plain and unequivocal retraction or disavowal of the intention to threaten the court. That he has never done so, nor offered to do so, leaves his offense entirely unmitigated in my eyes, and imposes upon the court the necessity of inflicting the due penalty. As to the character of the penalty, I concur in the view of the court that it should be suspension of his privileges as an attorney.

Upon the other branch of the case I should have had nothing to say if Mr. Philbrook had not, by devoting himself to that exclusively, and ignoring everything else, challenged the judgment and opinion of the court. Under the circumstances I cannot pass it over in silence without seeming to dissent from the views of my associates, and therefore I feel bound to add that, while I fully concede the right of Mr. Philbrook to attack the settlement between Levinson's executor and the Newmans, and to argue the propositions of fact and of law upon which he arraigns the conduct of Justice Harrison, I see nothing in the case to justify the conclusion that the advice given to the executor as to the construction of the partnership agreement and his duty to settle according to such construction was not entirely proper. The proposition of law for which Mr. Philbrook contends, viz. that, notwithstanding such settlement may have been entirely free from fraud, in fact it must be held fraudulent in law,—a constructive fraud,—because advised and witnessed by a gentleman who was then a candidate for the supreme bench, is one which it is open for him to argue; and since it is involved in the appeal of Rankin vs. Newman I express no opinion concerning it. It appears from Mr. Philbrook's own showing that at the time of the settlement neither he nor his clients, the mother and sisters of Levinson, were claiming, or had ever suggested, that the articles of partnership were invalid. On the contrary, they were then and afterwards asserting their validity, and claiming under them. Nor did they then claim or suggest that the inventory made in pursuance of the said articles was false or incorrect in any particular, except in the omission of the item of the "good will," the whole controversy being merely as to the proper construction of an agreement, then conceded to be valid and binding, with reference to the single question whether or not it embraced or excluded the "good will." As to this matter the difference between them was open, express, and well understood, and there is not the slightest reason to suppose that Judge Harrison's opinion was less honest or less sound than that of Mr. Philbrook. Mr. Philbrook, indeed, is not entirely consistent with himself in this matter, for, unless I have misapprehended his position, he is now claiming that the Newmans, by the exercise of undue influence, induced their dying and partially demented partner to execute an agreement which sacrificed his interest in the good will; and, if this is so, it is scarcely consistent to claim that Judge Harrison misconstrued it, or that he can be blamed for the advice given to the executor at a time when neither Mr. Philbrook nor any one else had ever suggested fraud or undue influence in the procurement of the agreement. I concur in the judgment.

ADLARD v. RODGERS. (No. 19,484.)

CHATTEL MORTGAGE — VALIDITY AS AGAINST ATTACHING CREDITOR—DELIVERY OF POSSESSION—ACTION AGAINST CONSTABLE—WRONGFUL LEVY.

1. As between a mortgagee, under an unacknowledged and unrecorded mortgage, and an attaching creditor of the mortgagor, the delivery to the mortgagee, by the mortgagor's assignee for creditors, of the key of the building in which the property is located, and the posting on the door of such building, by the mortgagee, of a notice that he is in possession of the property, constitute possession by the mortgagee, when the property consists of the boiler, engine, and other machinery of a steam laundry, though the mortgagee does not go into the building after the key is delivered to him.

2. It is no defense to an action by a mortgagee against a constable, to recover the possession of goods seized under an attachment against the mortgagor, that the assignee for the benefit of the mortgagor's creditors, from whom the mortgagee, who claimed under an unrecorded mortgage, obtained possession, had no right to give such possession.

Cal. Rep. 38-40 P.—16

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Thomas K. Adlard against Lester D. Rodgers, as constable, to recover the possession of goods seized under an attachment. Judgment was rendered for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. A. Redman and Henry P. Wilson, for appellant. Marble & Phibbs, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action for the specific recovery of certain personal property, to wit, a steam boiler, engine, washing machine, and other articles used in a steam laundry, by plaintiff, as a mortgagee under a chattel mortgage, against the defendant, who justified his seizure and taking thereof, as a constable, under a writ of attachment issued in an action against the mortgagors and their assigns. Defendant had judgment. Plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On the 15th day of August, 1893, John W. Musselman, Ed. M. Doyle, Charles A. Croman, and Marvin P. Elmore were copartners in conducting the laundry business in the city of Los Angeles, under the firm name of the Peerless Steam Laundry. On the day last mentioned they executed and delivered to Thomas K. Adlard, the plaintiff herein, a chattel mortgage upon the boiler, engine, washing machine, and other machines and appliances in the laundry, to secure the payment of three promissory notes of even date with the mortgage, aggregating $500 (and being given in part payment of the purchase price of said laundry), and payable at three, six, and nine months, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum. The mortgage was executed by the mortgagors in their individual names, and not in the firm name; was accompanied by an affidavit in due form by the mortgagors and mortgagee, as required by the first subdivision of section 2957 of the Civil Code; but was not acknowledged, proved, or certified as required by the second subdivision of said section or otherwise. It was recorded. The first of said notes, being for $150, fell due November 15, 1893, and was not paid. The mortgage provided that, upon failure to make any payment as in said promissory note provided, "the mortgagee may take possession of the said property, using all necessary force to do so, and may immediately proceed to sell," etc. The mortgagors continued in possession of the property until October 3, 1893, when Musselman and Elmore sold their interests therein to one R. Breese, who, to the extent of the interest by him purchased, assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage. Thereafter, Breese, Doyle, and Croman conducted the business under the firm name of the Peerless Steam Laundry until October 19, 1893, when Breese purchased the interests of Doyle and Croman in the property, and assumed the payment of the mortgage. Breese did not pay Doyle and Croman, and they remained in possession, and the business was continued as before, until November 13, 1893, when Breese, Doyle, and Croman made an assignment of the property, for the benefit of their creditors, to one J. B. Watkins, under and by virtue of the provisions of division 4, pt. 2, tit. 3, of the Civil Code of California, etc. Watkins, as assignee, entered into possession of the property. On the 11th of January, 1894, plaintiff herein, through his agent, Henry P. Wilson, demanded possession of the mortgaged property, as per the condition mentioned therein; said property being at the time in the laundry building in which business had been previously conducted. There was at the time no one upon the premises; the building being locked, and the key thereof in the possession of Watkins. The court finds that, upon demand being made, Watkins delivered the key to Wilson, who thereupon posted a notice on the building to the effect that plaintiff was in possession of the property therein contained. The court further finds as follows: "That neither said Watkins or Wilson, at the time of the delivery of said key as aforesaid, were at or near the place where said property was located, nor did they, or either of them, ever go on said premises and examine the same, nor was any one ever put in possession thereof, nor was any other possession thereof ever taken, by said Adlard or Wilson, than by said Wilson, as hereinbefore found." This finding is assailed by the appellant as not being supported by the testimony, and as being against the testimony, and is the foundation of the principal contention in the cause.

On the following day, viz. January 12, 1894, the defendant, as constable, attached the property, except the engine and boiler, in due form, in an action against the laundry firm, in favor of the Los Angeles Oil Burning & Supply Company. No question is made as to the regularity of the attachment. Plaintiff demanded possession, etc., which was refused, whereupon this action was brought.

By section 2957 of the Civil Code, "a mortgage of personal property is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value unless" accompanied by the affidavit provided for in the same section, and acknowledged, proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property. The mortgage here was defective, as a chattel mortgage, in not being acknowledged or proved and certified as in the section provided. It has been held that the mortgage is good between the parties and those having notice, though it does not strictly conform to the statute. Hackett v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 85; Harms v. Silva, 91 Cal. 636, 27 Pac. 1088. We shall assume that, as against the attaching creditor of the mortgagors, the mortgage was void, unless plaintiff had reduced the property to possession. This brings us to a consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence to support finding No. 11, hereinbefore quoted. The eleventh finding, coupled with those preceding it, embodies substantially the facts as stated by the witnesses, with the exception of the statement in said finding that "nor did they, or either of them, ever go on said premises and examine the same, nor was any one ever put in possession thereof." The uncontradicted evidence shows that Wilson, upon receiving the key, went to the premises, locked the door, and posted the notice as found by the court. He states that he thinks he went into the building, but of that he was not certain. We may presume that the court below found against this statement, in which event the finding that the parties did not "go on said premises and examine the same" may be supported. So, too, the expression, "nor was any one ever put in possession thereof," in view of the previous finding, was no doubt meant to indicate that no keeper or other person was left in charge of the property. This view is strengthened by what follows, viz.: "Nor was any other possession thereof ever taken, by said Adlard or Wilson, than by said Wilson, as hereinbefore found." After all is said, however, the fact remains that the findings are as to evidentiary facts, rather than as to the ultimate fact, unless, indeed, the eleventh finding is to be treated as one of an ultimate fact. If so treated, it is not warranted by the evidence. That the parties intended the acts to constitute a delivery of possession is apparent. When Wilson demanded a delivery, Watkins asked for time to consult his attorney; and upon being advised that he should make delivery he consented so to do, and delivered the key to the building to Wilson, who locked it up, and posted the notice as aforesaid. This was a sufficient delivery. Parsons says: "The delivery may be symbolical, or of a part for the whole; and a delivery of the key, the property being locked up, is so far a delivery of the goods that it will support an action of trespass against a subsequent purchaser who gets possession of them." 1 Pars. Cont. p. 531. This doctrine is elementary. The articles were—some of them, at least—ponderous articles, incapable of manual delivery, and as to such a symbolical delivery has always been regarded as sufficient. We think the finding indicated is erroneous, and not in consonance with the uncontradicted evidence in the case.

The fifth conclusion of law is erroneous. It is as follows: "That the possession of the property in said chattel mortgage described by said Watkins was in trust for the benefit of all the creditors of said assignors, and, without the assent of such creditors, he had no authority to transfer the same, or any portion thereof, either to the payment of, or as security for the payment of, the debt owing plaintiff herein, and that, therefore, the delivery of said key to said Wilson, and the subsequent action of said Wilson, did not vest the possession of said property in the plaintiff herein." The error in this conclusion is in supposing that any question arises in the case as between plaintiff and the creditors under the assignment, who were represented by Watkins, their assignee. They are not parties to this action. Defendant does not justify under them, but under the plaintiff in the attachment suit, who is apparently pursuing its remedy, not under the assignment, but in opposition to it. Plaintiff's mortgage was valid, as between himself and the mortgagors. It provided for possession by the former upon nonpayment. Default was made, and he took possession. As against attaching creditors, such possession was valid. Defendant is here justifying by virtue of an attachment sued out by a creditor, and has no rights in the matter, unless he acquired them by virtue of such attachment. See Harms v. Silva, 91 Cal., at page 640, 27 Pac. 1088. It will be time enough to vindicate the rights of the creditors under the assignment, as against the plaintiff,—if any rights they have,—when they become parties to an action involving such rights. The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

HOLT v. THOMAS et al. (No. 15,585.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1894.)

PAYMENT UNDER MISTAKE—RECOVERY—ASSESSMENT ON BANK STOCK.

1. One in whose name stock of an insolvent national bank stood, paid an assessment thereon under a threat by the receiver to sue therefor, though he claimed that he had sold the stock. More funds were collected than were required to pay the creditors of the bank. Held, that such payment could not be recovered as having been made under a mistaken belief by the payor that the whole amount would be required to pay the creditors of the bank.

2. Since, in such a case, plaintiff was prima facie liable for payment of the assessment, the avoidance of litigation with the receiver was a sufficient consideration for the payment.

3. Payment by a person prima facie liable for a debt, under a threat by the debtor to sue therefor unless it is paid, is not a payment under duress.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by C. H. Holt against R. P. Thomas and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Aylett R. Cotton, for appellants. John Chetwood, Jr., for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is, in substance, an action to recover the sum of $750, upon the ground that the same was paid under a mistake of fact. Plaintiff had judgment, and from this, and an order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal.

In December, 1888, the California National Bank became insolvent, and closed its doors, and thereupon the defendant Young was, by the comptroller of the currency of the United States, appointed a receiver to take charge of the affairs of said bank, and pay the creditors thereof, in accordance with the provisions of the national banking act. In order to procure funds with which to pay the creditors, there was levied an assessment upon the capital stock of the said bank, which it became the duty of the receiver to collect. The plaintiff was a director of said bank, and his name, among others, appeared upon the books of the bank as the owner of 60 shares of the stock, and in due course he was notified by the receiver to come in and pay the assessment thereon. In response to this demand he claimed and represented to the receiver that he was the owner in fact of but 10 shares of said stock; that he had sold 50 of the shares standing in his name to R. P. Thomas, the other defendant herein, but that said shares had never been transferred to said Thomas upon the books of the bank. Plaintiff was informed by the receiver, in effect, that the latter had nothing but the books to go by, and that, if the assessment was not paid, it would be his duty to commence suit for its recovery. Thereupon plaintiff concluded to pay the assessment, and by an amicable arrangement between him and the receiver he was permitted to and did pay over to the receiver 50 per cent. of the assessment on the 60 shares, amounting to $1,125, and was given time to pay the balance, but never did so. Immediately after receipt of said payment the receiver remitted the money to the comptroller of the currency, and the same was used and disbursed by the latter in payment of the creditors of said bank. At the date of this payment by plaintiff the fund collected by the receiver lacked something upwards of $60,000 of being sufficient to meet the demands of the creditors. Subsequently other stockholders paid their assessments, some partially, and others in full, and as a result the creditors of said bank have been paid off, and there now remains a surplus of some $5,000, which, under the law, will be returned to the stockholders of the bank. Upon ascertaining that a surplus remained, the plaintiff instituted this action, the substantive averment in his complaint, as we regard it, being that he made the payment "for the special purpose of providing a fund to pay the creditors of said bank; that since making said deposit of $750 the plaintiff has learned, and he alleges the fact to be, that said $750 was not necessary to pay the creditors of said bank, and that a considerable surplus now remains in the hands of said receiver, amounting to the sum of several thousand dollars, and that said fund is being constantly increased." There are averments in the complaint as to a sale of 50 shares of the stock to the defendant Thomas, and other facts relative thereto, but we deem them wholly immaterial. The determinative question presented by the appeal is whether the facts disclosed entitle plaintiff to recover as for money paid by mistake. We do not think they do. There is no question of the right to recover money paid under mistake of a material fact and without consideration, but we do not think this such a case. The payment, in this instance, cannot be said to have been made under a misapprehension or mistake as to the facts. The circumstances calling for the payment were well known to and perfectly understood by the plaintiff. He knew that the assessment was levied and was being collected to procure funds to pay the creditors of the bank, and he made the payment voluntarily with that understanding; and it appears that the money was needed, and was in fact used, for that purpose. The fact that subsequently more funds were collected than were required to pay the creditors in full, and that a surplus now remains, does not disclose such a mistake of fact on the part of plaintiff as entitles him to recover. The stock standing in his name was primarily as liable for the assessment as that of any other stockholder, and, having paid voluntarily, he is no more entitled to recover his money than would be any other one of such stockholders. Nor was there a want of consideration for the payment. Assuming that he did not own the stock, if he saw fit to pay, in order to avoid litigation with the receiver, that was sufficient consideration. A payment thus voluntarily made with knowledge of the facts affords no ground for an action to recover it back. Keener, Quasi Cont. c. 2, and cases there cited; Brummagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 271. The lower court seems to have proceeded upon the theory that plaintiff made his payment under duress, as it finds that "plaintiff was required, under threat of suit, to pay the same to the receiver for the benefit of the creditors of said bank." But that fact did not constitute duress. It is not legal duress to threaten to or actually take advantage of the usual remedy for the enforcement of a debt or obligation. Brummagim v. Tillinghast, supra; Kohler v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 26 Cal. 606; Bucknall v. Story, 46 Cal. 589; Mayor, etc., v. Lefferman, 4 Gill. 425. And this is true even if the claim be an illegal one. Preston v. City of Boston, 12 Pick. 12. Under the facts disclosed, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover against either of the defendants. If there are any rights or equities as between plaintiff and the defendant Thomas, growing out of the sale of plaintiff's stock, which would entitle the latter to relief against Thomas, they must be litigated in another form of action. The judgment and order denying new trial are reversed.

LIBEL—PLEADING.

A complaint which, construed liberally under Code Civ. Proc. § 452, alleges a libelous publication by defendants; that such publication conveyed to others a libelous meaning and charge against plaintiff; and that it was made without cause,—states a cause of action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. Henshaw, Judge.

Action by George Ingraham against J. L. Lyon and William P. Lyon. From an order denying his motion for vacation of judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sawyer & Ayer, for appellant. John C. Hughes, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Section 452 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "In the construction of a pleading, for the purpose of determining its effect, its allegations must be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice between the parties." The complaint in this action is certainly very loosely drawn, but, applying to it this rule of construction, it may be held to allege, in substance, that defendants intended by the written publication complained of to charge and have it understood and believed "that plaintiff was a person engaged in making accounts which he never paid or intended to pay, and was dishonest and wholly unfit and unworthy of credit"; that said publication was understood by those to whom it was made as conveying such meaning and charge against the plaintiff; and that such publication was made without cause, "and out of pure malice." Thus construed, the complaint states a cause of action. Maynard v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 207. See, also, Edwards v. Society, 99 Cal. 435, 34 Pac. 128. Appeal from order denying plaintiff's motion to vacate and set aside the judgment dismissed, and judgment reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

CHAPELL v. SCHMIDT. (No. 15,786.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1894.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—ACTION BY NON COMPOS MENTIS—INSTRUCTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the guardian of a person non compos mentis to recover for an assault upon his ward, in which defendant answered that such person had entered his garden, and was picking his flowers, it was not misleading to charge that, if plaintiff's ward was weak in mind, "he should not," as a matter of law, "be held to the same strictness" in doing what he did "as a person mentally sound would be"; the jury having also been charged that he had no right to enter the garden, and that defendant could have used reasonably necessary force in putting him out.

2. Where the defense to an action for assault was that plaintiff had unlawfully entered defendant's garden, and was picking his flowers, at the time the assault was committed, it was not error to exclude evidence of prior commissions of the same trespass.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Henry Y. Chapell, a non compos mentis, by his guardian, against John A. Schmidt, to recover for an assault and battery. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed, but pending the appeal plaintiff's ward died, and his administratrix, Edith A. Chapell, was substituted as plaintiff. Judgment affirmed.

Lloyd & Wood and Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellant. Wm. T. Baggett and Walter H. Linforth, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by Henry Y. Chapell, an incompetent person, by his guardian, to recover damages for an assault and battery committed on his person by defendant. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Some time after the judgment was rendered, the said Chapell died, and his administratrix was substituted as plaintiff.

There is no doubt from the evidence that the verdict was eminently just and proper. The jury were fully warranted in finding these facts: Chapell was an infirm old man, with a passion for flowers. On August 9, 1893, he was passing the garden of appellant, in which, about four feet from the gate, there was a fuchsia bush in bloom; and, the gate being open, he went in, and commenced to pick some fuchsias. The appellant, who was in the vicinity, observed Chapell plucking the flowers, and, rushing into the garden, he beat him very severely with a heavy cane over the head, neck, shoulders, and back, without any request to leave, or any warning whatever. Chapell, who was stooping over the bush at the time, made no resistance whatever, and appellant continued to beat him with great force until a lady who witnessed the occurrence sprang in between them, and induced him to desist. Chapell was severely injured by the beating, and never recovered therefrom.

Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed on account of three rulings which respondent's counsel induced the court to make.

1. The court, at request of respondent, gave the following instruction to the jury: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was weak in mind at the time the alleged assault and beating is claimed to have taken place, then, as matter of law, I charge you that he should not be held to the same strictness in entering the garden of defendant and picking flowers therein as a person mentally sound would be." It is difficult to determine whether or not, as applied to the case at bar, this instruction has any definite meaning. But conceding that it does mean something, and that it was erroneous, we do not see how it could have prejudiced the rights of appellant. There was no question about the right of respondent to enter the garden, and it was not claimed that he had such right. The court instructed the jury in various forms that respondent had no right to go into the garden, and told them, among other things, "that when a person enters within the inclosure of another without the consent of the other, and against his will, that is what is usually known as and called an 'unlawful breaking and entering'"; and that if respondent entered the garden, "and was then and there engaged in breaking flowers or branches of his (defendant's) fuchsia, then I charge you that he was doing an unlawful act, and the defendant had a right to order him out of his premises, and use such reasonable force as might be necessary to put him out." It is not reasonable, therefore, to suppose that an intelligent jury was led astray by the obscure and totally irrelevant instruction about "strictness" above quoted. The question was, did the appellant use unnecessary force in ejecting the respondent? and we are satisfied that the jury so understood it.

2. Appellant contends for a reversal because the court instructed the jury as follows: "I further charge you that, if you find from the evidence in the case that, at the time and place mentioned in the complaint, the plaintiff was in or on the premises of the defendant without his permission, taking flowers therefrom, yet, notwithstanding this fact, I charge you that if you find that the appellant assaulted and beat the plaintiff as alleged in the complaint, without first requesting him to depart from said premises, and warning him to desist from taking the said flowers, then, as a matter of law, I charge you that the defendant was guilty of an unlawful act," etc. We think that, under the facts of this case, the instruction was proper. The respondent was not using such force and violence as would have justified the appellant to assault and beat respondent "as alleged in the complaint" without any warning whatever.

3. Appellant contends for a reversal because the court sustained respondent's objection to the following question asked appellant when testifying as a witness: "What had you seen him [plaintiff] do on your premises prior to the 9th day of August last?" We do not think that the question was relevant. The defense set up in the answer on this point was that "on the 9th day of August, 1893," the respondent unlawfully entered his premises, and was "then and there" engaged in despoiling, etc., and that appellant "gently laid his hands upon" him, and used no more force than was reasonably necessary to remove him. Moreover, appellant, as stated in his points and authorities, did introduce evidence to show "that plaintiff had previously committed similar trespasses on the same premises."

There are no other points made by appellant, although there is an allusion made to the amount of the verdict as excessive. If the point were expressly made, we could not hold that $2,500 was an excessive verdict. The judgment and order denying a new trial appealed from are affirmed.

HALL v. COLE et al. (No. 19,495.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

REMOVAL OF BUILDINGS — SUIT FOR RECOVERY — CROSS COMPLAINT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, providing that, when a defendant seeks affirmative relief relating to the transaction upon which the action is brought, he may file a cross complaint, a cross complaint in an action to recover buildings removed from plaintiff's land, which alleged that plaintiff purchased the land and erected the buildings for defendants, agreeing to convey the premises to them when they could purchase the same; that defendants tendered him the purchase price therefor, but that he refused to give them a deed thereto,—and which prayed judgment that plaintiff deed the property to defendants, was improperly stricken out.

2. In an action to recover buildings removed from plaintiff's land, wherein defendants admitted that plaintiff purchased the land and erected the buildings, but claimed to own the premises by reason of plaintiff's agreement to sell the same to them, and their tender to him of the purchase price, plaintiff testified that he agreed to sell the premises to defendants, and that they advanced him money to apply in purchasing the land and erecting the buildings, but that they withdrew all of the same soon after; that he let defendants go into possession of the premises without any further transaction; that thereafter defendants tendered him the purchase price of the land, only, and he told them merely that he could not give them a deed, but would have to see the man who then held the title to the property to secure a loan to plaintiff. Held that, ownership of the buildings not appearing in defendants, a nonsuit was improperly granted.

Action by M. Hall against A. R. Cole and another for the possession of buildings. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Humphrey, for appellant. D. C. Collier, D. L. Murdock, and F. W. Goodbody, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the possession or value of a dwelling house and barn, alleged to have been wrongfully moved by the defendant Isabell Cole from a lot of land described as "Lot 34 of La Mesa Colony," in the county of San Diego. The complaint sets up facts showing that the plaintiff purchased and paid for the said lot, and erected the house and barn thereon, and that, without his consent or knowledge, the defendant Isabell Cole moved the same to an adjoining lot owned by defendants, who were husband and wife. The answer denied that the plaintiff was the owner of the said house and barn, or either of them, or entitled to the possession thereof, and alleged that, at all times since the erection of said house and barn, the defendant Isabell Cole had been, and still was, the owner thereof. The answer then proceeded to state, in effect, that the plaintiff purchased the said lot for and on account of the defendant Isabell Cole, for the sum of $900, less $25 allowed him by the owner for making the sale, and that she advanced to him, in part payment therefor, the sum of $550; "that within a few days thereafter the plaintiff stated to the defendants that he had purchased said land for the defendant Isabell Cole, and that there would be a few days' delay in preparing the title to her, but he advised them to take immediate possession of it, and to grub and plow and improve it, and stated to defendant Isabell Cole that he would immediately build for her a house on said land, which would be hers, and a home for her as long as she lived, and that she could pay for it when she got ready, and could have as much time in which to do so as she desired"; that the plaintiff built on the said lot the house mentioned in his complaint, for the defendant Isabell Cole, "and that after the completion thereof, at the request of plaintiff, the defendants moved into, took possession of, and occupied, said house, as their own, and not as the property of the plaintiff, and that said house and said barn were from the first commencement of the erection thereof, and ever since have been, the property of the defendant Isabell Cole, and that said house, at the time of its erection, set upon blocks on the surface of the ground on said lot 34"; that, at the time of making the payment of $550, it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant Isabell Cole that he would, as soon as it could be done, cause a deed to be made to her for said premises, and that she should execute a mortgage for the balance of the purchase money therefor, and that she thereafter repeatedly requested plaintiff to perform and carry out his agreement, but he failed to do so, giving various excuses therefor; that afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, she tendered to plaintiff "the entire balance of said purchase money for said lot 34, and its appurtenant water rights, as agreed upon between them, with all accrued interest thereon, and demanded from plaintiff a deed therefor, whereupon the plaintiff refused to comply with said agreement and refused to make a deed to said defendant for said lot." The defendants also filed a cross complaint, in which they set out the facts, and prayed for judgment against the plaintiff, that he make a good and sufficient deed to the defendant Isabell Cole, conveying to her the said lot, free and clear from all incumbrances. The cross complaint was, on motion of plaintiff, stricken out, and the defendants excepted to the ruling. The case subsequently came on regularly for trial before a jury, and at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendants moved for a judgment of nonsuit, "because the plaintiff's evidence does not contain anything tending to show that at the time this suit was commenced the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the house and barn, for the recovery of the possession or value of which this action is brought, but it does appear from said evidenced that at the time this suit was commenced the plaintiff was not entitled to the possession of said house and barn." The court granted the motion, and entered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendants recover from him their costs. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

We think the court erred in striking out the defendants' cross complaint, and also in granting their motion for nonsuit. The complaint and the cross complaint related to alleged rights growing out of the same transaction; that is, the purchase of the lot and payment therefor, and the erection of the house and barn thereon. And the rule is that, whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief relating to the transaction upon which the action is brought, he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

At the commencement of the trial, defendants admitted in open court that the plaintiff purchased the land, from which the house and barn were moved, of one Hamilton, on December 12, 1890, and that Hamilton was then the owner thereof, and also that defendant Isabell Cole took and moved the house and barn in question from the said land, to land owned by her, on February 27, 1892. The plaintiff, then, as a witness for himself, testified that he had Mr. Hamilton make the deed of the land to a Mr. Wilson to secure payment of $400, money borrowed by him of Wilson, and that he paid Hamilton the whole of the purchase price for the land, which was $900; that he built the house and barn on the land between the months of January and March, 1891, and paid for them himself, the house costing $1,250, and the barn $50; that the house and barn were taken away by Mrs. Cole without his consent or knowledge; and that on March 19, 1892, he paid Wilson the loan, for the payment of which the land was security, and Wilson then conveyed the land to him, and assigned to him all his interest in the house and barn. The deeds and assignment were offered and received in evidence. The witness further testified that he built the house to assist Mr. Cole, because he was a man of large family and small means; that at the time he bought the land he told Mr. Cole he would build the house, and sell the land and improvements to him for just what they had cost; "that he and Mr. Cole talked about it several times, and, before he bought the land, Mr. Cole, at his request, advanced him $550 to apply in the purchase of the land and the building of the house," and that, within a few days after Mr. Cole advanced the $550, he came to plaintiff's house, and "stated that he had no money or means to keep his family, and asked to draw against the $550 from time to time, which he assented to, and Mr. Cole withdrew all of the money advanced, and more (about $600 in all), within a few months thereafter"; "that he let Mr. Cole into possession of the premises in April, 1891, without any further transaction between them." On cross-examination, the witness testified that Mr. Collier, the lawyer, made a tender to him for Mrs. Cole, and that he simply remarked he could not give a deed, but would have to see Mr. Wilson, and also that: "I was buying the land for Mr. Cole. I told Mr. Kretsinger that I was building the house for Mr. Cole, when I hired him. I first told Mr. Cole and his wife that I owned the property when I was building the house. * * * The $550 was paid to me on December 2, 1890. * * * I might have said to them, after buying the land, 'Well, I have got the land for you.'" On redirect examination the witness was asked, in reference to the tender made by Mr. Collier, "State what was tendered," and answered: "Mr. Collier met me in the California National Bank, and said he wanted to make a tender to me, and stated the amount. It was between five and six hundred dollars. I forget the exact amount. I think he said, '$550 and interest due you from Mrs. Cole on lot 34, La Mesa.' He had some money in his hand. I did not see how much. This was a few days before the house was moved by defendant Mrs. Cole." The above was, in substance, all the evidence on which the motion for nonsuit was made and granted; and, in our opinion, entirely fails to show that either of the defendants was the owner or entitled to the possession of the said house and barn at the time of the commencement of the action, or of the trial. It appears that the lot was purchased and the buildings constructed by the plaintiff to accommodate and assist the defendants, but they were to be paid for by defendants before they would become the owners thereof. There is no pretense that any part of the cost of the buildings had been paid, or offered to be paid; and when Mrs. Cole moved them from the lot, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, she did so wrongfully, and the plaintiff at once became entitled to their possession or value. Whether Mrs. Cole had become entitled to a deed of the lot is a question not now involved in this case, and upon it we express no opinion. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with directions to the court below to permit the defendants to file anew their cross complaint, if so advised.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial, with directions to the court below to permit the defendants to file anew their cross complaint, if so advised.

IRVINE v. TARBOT. (No. 18,236.)

PUBLIC LANDS—VALIDITY OF PATENT—RIGHT TO QUESTION.

The issuance by the United States of a patent of government land is conclusive evidence in the state courts that the land was subject to patent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Calaveras county; John F. Davis, Acting Judge.

Action by William Irvine against Mrs. J. C. Tarbot to recover a tract of land. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Budd and Paul C. Morf, for appellant. Reddick & Solinsky, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is what would formerly have been termed an "action of ejectment" to recover a small tract of land, parcel of 143.23 acres, patented to the plaintiff, October 13, 1890, by the government of the United States, situate at or near Carson Hill, county of Calaveras, state of California. The defense set up was that the locus in quo was and is a part of the town site of Carson Hill, and as such was not subject to patent by plaintiff. The statute of limitations was also pleaded in bar of the action, but as such action was instituted April 13, 1891, within six months next after the issuance of patent, the plea cannot prevail, if plaintiff's patent was valid to convey title. Plaintiff had judgment, from which and from an order denying her motion for a new trial defendant appeals. Plaintiff introduced his patent to the land, proved that the land in dispute was included therein, and rested. Defendant, among other testimony introduced for the purpose of proving a town site, offered in evidence, and against the objection of plaintiff was permitted to introduce, the proceedings had in the United States land office, from which it appeared that in September, 1879, plaintiff, Irvine, settled upon the land, which had been surveyed in 1871. On May 22, 1883, he made homestead entry of said land, and in December, 1885, he made final proof. Against the allowance of the final entry, sundry parties, among whom was appellant, protested upon various grounds, among which were "that the town site of Carson is situate on portions of the lands last aforesaid." Thereupon and thereafter such proceedings were had in the case that, upon an appeal from the local land office to the commissioner of the general land office, it was held, among other things, "that the claim of a town site is not supported by the facts in the case," and reversing the finding of the local land officer that "Carson was a valid and legal town site," which decision was on an appeal affirmed by the secretary of the interior department. Respondent was thereupon permitted to make final proofs, and the patent in evidence issued to him. There was no showing that Carson was ever an incorporated town or village. It was admitted at the trial by counsel for the respective parties that at the time of plaintiff's application, and during the contest, "testimony was taken by the land department as to the existence of a town or town site settlement, or a place of trade or business, upon the land embraced within the boundaries of the patent. It is further stipulated that the land department passed upon these questions prior to the issuance of a patent to plaintiff."

Appellant contends that the town site of 11 acres was reserved from pre-emption or homestead entry, and cites various sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States in support of this theory. Section 2257 provides that "all lands belonging to the United States, to which the Indian title has been or may hereafter be extinguished, shall be subject to the right of pre-emption, under the conditions, restrictions and stipulations provided by law." Section 2258 provides that "the following classes of lands, unless otherwise specially provided for by law, shall not be subject to the rights of pre-emption, to wit: First, lands included in any reservation by any treaty, law, or proclamation of the president, for any purpose. Second, lands included within the limits of any incorporated town, or selected as the site of any city or town. Third, lands actually settled and occupied for purposes of trade and business, and not for agriculture. Fourth, lands on which are situated any known salines or mines." Section 2382 provides that persons who have founded, or may hereafter found, a city or town upon the public lands may file with the recorder of the county a plat thereof, etc., giving name of city or town, showing streets, squares, etc., to be verified under oath, and in one month a verified transcript must be forwarded to the general land office, etc. The subsequent sections of the same chapter provide the modes by which the authorities of incorporated towns, and the county judge in cases of unincorporated towns, may enter and purchase from the government for the use of the inhabitants the lands included within the town sites. The question whether or not the public lands are subject to pre-emption or homestead depends upon the existence or nonexistence of certain facts, among which are, is it more valuable for mining or agricultural purposes? does it include any incorporated town or has it been selected as a town site? is it actually settled upon and occupied for purposes of trade and business? or does it include any known salines or mines? These are all questions of fact to be determined by the land department preliminary to granting a patent to such lands, and, as was said in Smelting Co. v. Kemp, 104 U. S., at page 645: "When the authority depends upon the existence of particular facts, or upon the performance of certain antecedent acts, and it is the duty of the land department to ascertain whether the facts exist or the acts have been performed, its determination is as conclusive of the existence of the authority against any collateral attack as is its determination upon any other matter properly submitted to its decision." To discuss this case at length would involve the restatement of a doctrine which has been enunciated so frequently by this court, and by the supreme court of the United States, that it has come to be regarded as elementary. The rule alluded to is this: "A patent duly signed, countersigned, and sealed for public lands which, at the time it was issued, the land department had, under the statute, authority to convey, cannot be collaterally impeached in an action at law; and the finding of the department touching the existence of certain facts, or the performance of certain antecedent acts, upon which the lawful exercise of that authority may in a particular case depend, cannot, in a court of law, be questioned." The above is quoted, for the sake of brevity, from the syllabus in Smelting Co. v. Kemp, supra, as fairly exemplifying the conclusion reached in that case and many others. Green v. Hayes, 70 Cal. 276, 11 Pac. 716; Quinby v. Conlan, 104 U. S. 420; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 295; Sparks v. Pierce, 115 U. S. 408, 6 Sup. Ct. 102; Stewart v. Sutherland, 93 Cal. 270, 28 Pac. 947; Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550. It follows from all the cases, of which the foregoing are but a fraction, that plaintiff's patent, which is not shown to contain any reservations, was conclusive evidence that the land in question was open to pre-emption and homestead, and that there was no town site thereon or settlement for the purposes of trade and business. The evidence offered by the defendant to reopen the question as to the character of the land in this action at law was not admissible. Its introduction, however, only tended to substantiate the presumption of the patent by showing that the land department did in fact pass upon and decide adversely to the appellant the very question sought to be again litigated here. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BUTTERWORTH et al. v. LEVY et al. (No 15,573.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1894.)

MECHANICS' LIENS — STATUTORY REQUIREMENTS — SUFFICIENCY OF MEMORANDUM FILED.

The memorandum of a building contract, filed in the recorder's office under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, which recites that the contract is for the erection of a two-story building, giving its dimensions, "in a workmanlike manner, in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same" made by a certain architect, which "are to be kept and remain in the office of said architect," subject to inspection, does not sufficiently state "the general character of the work to be done."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Eugene R. Garber, Judge.

Actions by J. B. Butterworth and others against M. B. Levy, as the owner of certain property, one Meyers, as mortgagee thereof, and one Dunning, as the original contractor for the erection of a building thereon, to foreclose separate mechanics' liens held by plaintiffs. Judgment was entered against defendant Dunning by default. From a decree ordering the foreclosure of the liens, and from an order denying them a new trial, defendants Levy and Meyers appeal. Affirmed.

John J. Roche, for appellants. Boyd, Field & Hoburg, Parker & Eells, Wm. H. Jordan, and H. C. Wakeman, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff and several other parties commenced separate actions to foreclose mechanics' liens on the same property, and all the actions were consolidated and tried together. The defendant Levy was the owner of the property, the defendant Meyers was a mortgagee thereof, and the defendant Dunning was the original contractor. Levy and Meyers answered, and Dunning suffered his default to be entered. The case was tried, and a decree entered foreclosing all the liens, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, Levy and Meyers appeal.

The contract was to erect a two-story building on a lot in the city of San Francisco, and the contract price was more than $1,000. The contract was not filed in the recorder's office, and the only question is whether the memorandum thereof, which was filed, was sufficient to meet the requirements of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides as follows: "All such contracts shall be in writing when the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds one thousand dollars, and shall be subscribed by the parties thereto, and the said contract, or a memorandum thereof, setting forth the names of all the parties to the contract, a description of the property to be affected thereby, together with a statement of the general character of the work to be done, the total amount to be paid thereunder, and the amounts of all partial payments, together with the times when such payments shall be due and payable, shall, before the work is commenced, be filed in the office of the county recorder * * * otherwise they shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and in such case the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof." The only objection to the memorandum in question is that it did not contain a sufficient "statement of the general character of the work to be done." That statement was in these words: "Third. The general character of the work to be done under said contract is as follows, to wit: The said W. R. Dunning, as contractor, agrees with the said M. B. Levy, as owner, to furnish the necessary labor and materials, including tools, implements, and appliances, required in the erection of a two-story building 51.0 by 25.0, and in a workmanlike manner, in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same made by John Gash, the authorized architect employed by the owner, and which are signed by the parties hereto, and are to be kept and remain in the office of said architect, subject to the inspection of the parties hereto, and others concerned in said erection."

"The plans, drawings, and specifications" for the building were not filed with the memorandum, nor did the statute expressly require that they should be. But without them, or their equivalent, who can tell what was the general character of the work to be done? Of what materials was the building to be constructed? Was it to be wood, brick, stone, or iron? In Willamette Steam Mills Lumbering & Manuf'g Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., 94 Cal. 235, 29 Pac. 629, it is said: "Whether the document which was filed in the recorder's office is to be regarded as the original contract, or as a memorandum thereof, is immaterial. A memorandum of the contract can have no higher force than the contract itself; and, if the contract fails to comply with the requirements of the statute, the memorandum itself must be equally insufficient. As a memorandum, merely, the document so filed was insufficient, by reason of its failure to set forth 'a statement of the general character of the work to be done'; the only statement in that regard being that it is to be 'conformable to the drawings and specifications made by R. B. Young, architect, and signed by the parties, and hereto annexed,' and that it is to be 'three stories high.' It does not set forth the materials of which the building was to be constructed, or any item from which its 'general character can be ascertained'; and the reference to the drawings and specifications, * * * without having the specifications and drawings filed, renders the document as ineffective for a memorandum as for the contract itself." And in Greig v. Riordan, 99 Cal. 320, 33 Pac. 913, it is said: "'The plans, drawings, and specifications,' in conformity with which the work was to be done, were not filed with the contract. They constituted, so far as the 'general character of the work to be done' was concerned, the very soul and essence of the agreement. Without them, the dimensions and character of the work cannot be determined. Whether it was to be composed of iron, stone, brick, or wood, we cannot tell. A contract to construct a church, build a house, or sink a shaft would be just as definite as the one in question. * * * If we view the contract in the light of a memorandum, the same objections are apparent, and equally fatal."

It is urged for appellants that "the object of the statute, in requiring the contract or a memorandum to be filed, is evidently to afford notice to all concerned of the nature, etc., of the work." And counsel say: "All the parties had notice of the particular fact that the plans and specifications were at the office of John Gash, the architect of the building, open and subject to their inspection. Plainly, by prosecuting the inquiry, and going to the architect's office, the full nature and contents of the plans and specifications would have been disclosed. No one can be heard to complain of lack of knowledge, which could only be the result of his own remissness, willful neglect, and intentional blindness." The obvious answer to this position is that the rights of the parties are entirely statutory, and the statute declares that, if a proper contract or memorandum is not filed, the contract is void. In Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 179, 22 Pac. 509, a similar point was raised, and the court said: "As to the contention that the fact that respondents had actual notice of the existence of a contract was equivalent to the filing of the same in the recorder's office, this would be so, if the question were one of notice. But it is not. The express provision of the statute is that, if the contract is not filed, it shall be void. This being so, there is in fact no contract, of which the subcontractor is bound to take notice; and his knowledge that a contract was attempted to be made, but was not, cannot affect his rights." In view of the foregoing decisions, we think it must be held that the court below rightly found that no sufficient memorandum was filed, and that the claims of the plaintiffs were therefore valid liens on the property sought to be charged therewith. We advise that the decree and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the decree and order appealed from are affirmed.

REA v. WOOD. (No. 15,263.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

TRIAL — RECALLING WITNESS — DISCRETION OF COURT — ACTION FOR SLANDER — CHARGES AGAINST PUBLIC OFFICER — MATTER NOT AFFECTING QUALIFICATIONS.

1. Whether a witness may be recalled for examination being, under provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2050, within the discretion of the court, a refusal to allow a witness to be recalled will not be ground for reversal, unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion.

2. A statement made as to a state railroad commissioner, that he robbed his father and mother in certain business transactions, did not impute to him a general disqualification for office, within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 46, which includes in its definition of "slander," "a false and unprivileged communication other than libel," which tends directly to injure one in respect to his office, profession or business, "by imputing to him general disqualification in those respects which the office or other occupation peculiarly requires."

3. Charging a person with a single act of dishonesty does not amount to an imputation that he has a general reputation for dishonesty.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by James W. Rea against Uriah Wood. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Richards & Welch and Geo. A. Knight, for appellant. D. M. Delmas, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for slander, and the complaint contains three counts. In the second count, it is alleged that the plaintiff had been a member of the state board of railroad commissioners of the state of California for more than four years, and that at the general election held in the year 1890 he was the regular nominee of the Republican party for re-election to the said office of railroad commissioner, and on the 4th day of November of that year was duly re-elected to that office. It is then alleged that on October 10, 1890, while the plaintiff was holding the said office, and was such candidate for re-election, the defendant, in the county of Santa Clara, spoke to one Milo Conklin, of and concerning the plaintiff, these words: "James W. Rea has robbed his father and mother in certain business transactions connected with the Light & Power Company of the city of San Jose,"—and that in uttering said language the defendant meant, and was understood, to impute to plaintiff such dishonesty, untrustworthiness, and turpitude as would render him unfit to occupy the office or perform the duties of railroad commissioner. The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint.

At the trial the plaintiff called Milo Conklin as a witness, and proved by him that in a conversation had between the witness and defendant on or about October 10, 1890, the latter said, "Mr. Rea had robbed his father and mother out of money in this transaction between the electric light works." And the witness further said that this statement was a portion of a general conversation which referred to Mr. Rea, and his fitness for the office of railroad commissioner. The plaintiff next called George Eustice as a witness, and asked him to state certain conversation relating to Mr. Rea, which he had with the defendant in July, 1890, and again after the commencement of this action; but, on objection of defendant, the answers were excluded. The plaintiff then recalled Milo Conklin as a witness, and asked him to "state the whole of the conversation had between Mr. Rea and yourself upon the 10th of October, so far as it related to the qualifications of Mr. Rea for the office of railroad commissioner." The defendant objected to the question upon the ground that the witness had already been examined upon the same matter, and the court sustained the objection, the plaintiff reserving an exception. At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant moved for a nonsuit as to the whole case; and the court granted the motion, as to the first and third counts, with the consent of the plaintiff, and denied it as to the second count. The plaintiff then presented, and asked the court to give to the jury, a large number of instructions; but after argument the court refused to give them, and instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant. A verdict was accordingly so returned, and judgment was entered that the plaintiff take nothing, from which he appeals.

1. The first point made for reversal is that the court erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to recall the witness Conklin, and to further examine him as to his conversation with the defendant on October 10th, in regard to the qualifications of the plaintiff for the office of railroad commissioner. The answer to this point is that, under our statute, the question whether a witness may be recalled and re-examined as to matters about which he has already been examined is one left to the sound discretion of the court (section 2050, Code Civ. Proc.), and its action will not be disturbed unless a clear abuse of discretion is shown. Here no such abuse is shown, and error cannot be predicated upon the ruling complained of.

2. It is next urged that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the instructions asked by the plaintiff, and in instructing them to find a verdict for the defendant. It is not claimed that the words spoken by the defendant were actionable per se, but it is insisted that they constituted an actionable slander because they were spoken of the plaintiff in a conversation in which his fitness for the office of railroad commissioner was the subject of discussion. The Civil Code defines "slander" as follows: "Sec. 46. Slander is a false and unprivileged publication other than libel, which, * * * (3) tends directly to injure him in respect to his office, profession, trade or business—by imputing to him general disqualification in those respects which the office or other occupation peculiarly requires." Assuming that the words proved to have been spoken were substantially the same as those charged to have been spoken, the question is, did they directly tend to injure the plaintiff in respect to his office of railroad commissioner, by imputing to him a general disqualification to perform the duties of the office, in those respects which it peculiarly required? The powers and duties of a railroad commissioner are prescribed in section 22 of article 12 of the constitution, and in an act of the legislature passed in 1880 (St. 1880, p. 45). In performing the duties of the office, there is no transaction involving pecuniary gain to the officer. Of course, to perform them properly, the officer should be a man of integrity and good moral character, who cannot be influenced by bribery, or the promise of unlawful gains. But honesty and good character are required in all offices and in all callings and business pursuits of life, and not peculiarly required in the office of railroad commissioner. The words spoken charge the plaintiff, at most, with only a single act of dishonesty; and that cannot, in our opinion, amount to an imputation of general disqualification. The rule is uniform that general character cannot be proved by a single act. Again, the complaint shows that the term of office which the plaintiff held when the words complained of were spoken expired before this action was commenced. It also shows that he continued in the performance of the duties of the office, without molestation, until the close of his then term, and so much to the satisfaction of the people that they re-elected him, and he had entered upon his second term. Did the words, then, tend directly to injure the plaintiff in respect to his office? We fail to see how it can be said that they did. The gist of the action was pecuniary loss, and it does not appear that the plaintiff sustained any loss, or was in any way prejudiced. The court did not err, therefore, in charging the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment must be affirmed. So ordered.

E. M. DERBY & CO. v. CITY OF MODESTO et al. (No. 18,379.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—VALIDITY OF BONDS—INDEBTEDNESS FOR SEWERS AND WATERWORKS—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. St. 1889, p. 399, § 2, as amended by St. 1891, p. 94, provides that when the legislative branch of a municipal corporation shall, by ordinance, determine that the public interests demand waterworks, sewers, and other public improvements, the cost of which cannot be paid out of the ordinary revenue, it may, "after the publication of such ordinance for at least two weeks in some newspaper," etc., and at its "next regular meeting after such publication or at an adjourned meeting," by ordinance specifying the amount required, the amount of the bonds, the rate of interest, etc., call a special election to pass upon the question of incurring such indebtedness. Held, that either of the ordinances specified in such statute can be passed on the same day it is introduced.

2. Ordinances authorized by such statute, and passed by the board, as proper steps in carrying out the will of the voters, expressed at such special election, are not affected by Act March 13, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 209), § 861, which provides that no ordinance or resolution granting a franchise shall be passed "on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter."

3. The publication of an ordinance for 14 consecutive days is a compliance with St. 1889, p. 399, § 2, as amended by St. 1891, p. 94, requiring an ordinance to be published "at least two weeks" in some newspaper.

4. Act 1889 (St. 1889, p. 400), § 3, provides that the ordinance authorizing the publication of a notice of a special election to determine whether a municipal corporation shall issue bonds for public improvements shall state "the number and character of the bonds to be issued." Held that, where such ordinance stated the number of bonds to be 50, of $500 each, the fact that by subsequent ordinance the number was changed to 40 bonds, of $500 each, and 20 bonds, of $250 each, did not render the bonds void.

5. Act 1889 (St. 1889, p. 399), § 2, as amended by St. 1891, p. 94, relating to the issuance of bonds for public improvements, provides that the trustees shall determine the rate of interest, provided the rate does not exceed 7 per cent. Held, that the trustees have power to determine whether the interest shall be paid annually or semiannually.

6. The provision of the statute that the notice of special election shall state the amount of the tax levy to be made for the payment of the bonds is satisfied by provisions in the ordinance calling such election that the bonds shall be "serials"; that one-twentieth of the whole indebtedness shall be paid each year, including interest at 6 per cent., payable semiannually; and that "the tax levy for the payment thereof amounts during the full period of 20 years to $97,800" for waterworks bonds, and to $40,750 for the sewer bonds.

7. Municipal bonds, in the hands of a bona fide purchaser, are not affected by mere irregularities in the proceedings pursuant to which they were issued.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; W. O. Minor, Judge.

Amicable action, on an agreed statement of facts, by E. M. Derby & Co., a corporation, against the city of Modesto and others, to determine the validity of certain bonds issued by such city for the purpose of constructing sewers and waterworks. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Fitzgerald and Carl H. Abbott, for appellant. C. C. Wright and John Yule, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. E. M. Derby & Co., a corporation and taxpayer of the city of Modesto, claiming that certain bonds issued by said city, to the aggregate amount of $85,000, to be used for the construction of a system of waterworks and sewers, are illegal and void, and, because thereof, that no tax can be lawfully levied or collected to pay the same, agreed with the city of Modesto, the board of trustees of said city, the members of said board, the treasurer of said city, and the Oakland Bank of Savings (a corporation, which was the original purchaser and holder of said bonds), to submit the question of the validity of said bonds to the superior court of Stanislaus county, upon an agreed case, under the provisions of section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was given in said court against appellant, from which it appeals upon said agreed statement.

Before considering the points specially made by appellant, it should be observed that this contention was not made by appellant prior to the sale and delivery of the bonds to the Oakland Bank of Savings; but these questions are now presented as between the taxpayers of the city of Modesto and the holder of the bonds after their purchase, and after the city has received the full purchase price. The power of the city to issue the bonds, the proper steps being first taken, is not, and cannot be, questioned; and, if the bonds are valid in the hands of the purchaser, the duty of the city to levy the tax required for the payment of the interest, and each installment of the principal sum, cannot be questioned, and the obligation of the taxpayer to pay the tax levied therefor is perfect.

The bid of the Oakland Bank of Savings for the purchase of said bonds was accepted January 19, 1893, and the full purchase price thereof was, by said bank, paid into the city treasury, and the notice and protest of appellant was not served until March 15, 1894, the first installment of the principal and the interest having been paid by the city in the preceding December. Nor is it asserted by appellant in its said notice, nor does it appear from the statement, that the purchaser of the said bonds had any notice of the alleged defects in the proceedings upon which the issue of said bonds was based.

"The following doctrines are too well settled to be any longer open to question. A bona fide purchaser of negotiable paper, for value, before maturity, takes it freed from all infirmities in its origin, unless it is absolutely void, for want of power in the maker to issue it, or its circulation is by law prohibited. Municipal bonds payable to bearer are subject to the same rules as other negotiable paper." Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 513, and cases cited in notes. The same learned author, in succeeding sections, referring to the course of decisions in the supreme court of the United States, says: "It has rejected, when necessary to protect the bona fide holders of such securities, narrow and rigid constructions of statutes authorizing the creation of such debts. Against such holders, it has given no favor for defenses based upon mere irregularities in the issue of the bonds, or upon noncompliance with preliminary requirements, not going to the question of power to issue them." Id. § 515. See, also, St. Joseph Tp. v. Rogers, 16 Wall. 644. In the light of the principles enunciated by the foregoing authorities, we will now notice the particular defects in the proceedings leading up to the issue of the bonds, in the order in which they are stated by counsel for appellant.

1. It is claimed that the several ordinances set out in the statement were each passed by the board of trustees of the city of Modesto on the day they were introduced, while it is contended that section 861 of the act of March 13, 1883 (St. 1883, p. 269), requires that no ordinance shall be passed on the day of its introduction, or within five days thereafter. So much of said section as is pertinent reads as follows: "No ordinance and no resolution granting any franchise for any purpose shall be passed by the board of trustees on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, nor at any other than a regular meeting." That the several ordinances above mentioned were passed on the day upon which they were severally introduced, is not controverted; and appellant contends that this fact renders the ordinance absolutely void, so that it constitutes no step in the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the bonds. His contention is that the restriction as to time applies to all ordinances, and also to those resolutions granting a franchise, while respondent contends that the restriction applies only to ordinances and resolutions granting a franchise. We think, however, it is not necessary to decide between these two constructions. The city of Modesto is a city of the sixth class, to which said section 861 of the municipal government act applies. It is claimed by respondent, however, that the proceedings had with reference to the issue of the bonds in question were taken under the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 399), entitled "An act authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by cities, towns and municipal corporations incorporated under the laws of this state for the construction of water works, sewers and all necessary public improvements." Section 2 of said act was amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 94). That portion of section 2, as amended, which is pertinent to the question under consideration is as follows: "Whenever the legislative branch of any city, town or municipal corporation shall, by ordinance passed by a vote of two-thirds of all its members, and approved by the executive of said city, town or municipal corporation, determine that the public interests or necessity demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any municipal buildings, bridges, water works, water rights, sewers or other municipal improvements, the cost of which will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality, they may, after the publication of such ordinance for at least two weeks in some newspaper published in said municipality, and at their next regular meeting after such publication or at an adjourned meeting, by ordinance passed by a vote of two-thirds of all its members, and also approved by the said executive, call a special election and submit to the qualified voters of said city, town or municipal corporation the proposition for the purpose set forth in the ordinance, and no question other than the incurring of indebtedness for said purpose shall be submitted." It will be seen that this statute requires the preliminary ordinance to be passed by a vote of two-thirds of all the members of the board of trustees, and to be approved by the executive,—requirements which are not found in section 861 of the municipal government act. The initial ordinance, No. 104, merely declares that the public interest and necessity demand the improvements therein mentioned, and directs that the ordinance shall be published as required by the statute. There could be no object in requiring that such an ordinance should be introduced five days, or any other time, before its passage. It is itself a mere preliminary ordinance, under which no action can be taken towards the accomplishment of the purpose indicated in it, until it has been notified to the people for a period of two weeks. After such publication, the board of trustees are authorized to pass another ordinance, "at their next regular meeting, or at an adjourned meeting," calling a special election, and submitting to the qualified voters of the municipality the proposition set forth in the ordinance. This ordinance "shall recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvement, the necessity for such improvement, and that the bonds of the municipality shall issue for the payment of the cost of such improvement as in such ordinance set forth." As to the second ordinance provided for in the amendment of 1891, it is obvious that no such restriction as that contended for by appellant is imposed, since it is expressly provided that such ordinance may be passed at the next regular meeting after the publication of the first ordinance is completed. This second ordinance, calling the election, and specifying the amount required to be raised, the amount of the bonds, rate of interest, etc., is the important one; and if it may be passed on the day of its introduction, as is clearly the case, no reason can be conjectured why the preliminary ordinance could not be. Ordinance No. 111, providing for the issue, sale, and redemption of the bonds, Ordinance No. 113, amending No. 111, and No. 115, approving and confirming the execution of the bonds and the sale thereof to the respondent, the Oakland Bank of Savings, were all proper steps taken by the board in carrying out the expressed will of the voters, and authorized under the act of 1891, and were not affected by the supposed restriction in section 861 of the act of 1883. The purpose of said section 861, so far as it requires ordinances to be introduced at least five days before their passage, is to give time for consideration, with a view to prevent hasty and ill-considered legislation; but the act of 1891 goes far beyond this requirement, by providing that the first ordinance, which has no effect whatever, unless followed by the other steps required by the statute, must be published for two weeks. The whole machinery of the act is framed with a special view to the intelligent action of the voters of the municipality, in whose hands rests the power to authorize or refuse to authorize the incurring of the proposed indebtedness. The whole proceeding, from beginning to end, is a single, special proceeding, for the accomplishment of a single, special purpose, though consisting of a series of acts, while section 861 of the municipal government act relates to the ordinary and general legislation passed for the government of the municipality, if it be true, as appellant contends, that it applies to ordinances other than those granting franchises.

2. Appellant's second point is that Ordinance No. 104, determining that the public interest and necessity demanded the construction of a system of waterworks and sewers, was published only from October 6 to October 19, 1892, both days included, in a daily newspaper, and that such publication was not a compliance with the statute. St. 1891, p. 94, requires the publication of such ordinance "for at least two weeks in some newspaper published in such municipality," and requires the second ordinance, calling a special election, to be passed "after the publication" of the first ordinance, "for at least two weeks," and this ordinance was passed at a regular meeting held October 20th. A "week" is defined by the Codes to be a period of 7 consecutive days. This ordinance was published on 14 consecutive days prior to October 20th, the date of the second ordinance. We think this complied with the statute. Society v. Thompson, 32 Cal. 347, 351; Misch v. Mayhew, 51 Cal. 516; Hagenmeyer v. Board, 82 Cal. 217, 23 Pac. 14. "A day is the period of time between any midnight and the midnight following." Pol. Code, § 3259. Fractions of a day are not regarded in law, unless justice requires it, or where the order of successive events is to be ascertained. In Bemis v. Leonard, 118 Mass. 502, it was held that "in computing time from the date, or from the day of the date, or from a certain act or event, the day of the date is to be excluded, unless a different intention is manifested." But here there is no date or event suggesting the exclusion of the first day's publication from the computation, and the cases above cited take this case out of the rule stated in section 12, Code Civ. Proc., which excludes the first day and includes the last; but, even under that theory, if the statute required 14 days' notice, and the notice had been served on the 6th, the performance of the act on the 20th would have been regular. The words, "at least," in the statute, do not restrict the meaning of the expression "published two weeks." They are intended to fix two weeks as the minimum, leaving it in the discretion of the trustees to make a longer publication.

3. Appellant contends that the board had no power to change the number and denomination of the sewer bonds. The ordinance authorizing the publication of notice of special election stated the number of bonds proposed to be issued for that purpose to be 50, of the denomination of $500 each. After it was voted to issue the bonds, the number was changed by a subsequent ordinance to 40 bonds, of $500 each, and 20 bonds, of $250 each. Section 3 of the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 400), provides that the ordinance shall state "the number and character of the bonds to be issued." The amount of the bonds, or of the indebtedness to be incurred for the specific purpose, was not changed. Those directions which are not of the essence of the thing to be done, and by the failure to obey which the rights of those interested will not be prejudiced, are not to be regarded as mandatory. Suth. St. Const. § 447. The change did not affect the validity of the bonds, and, as no greater burden is imposed upon the taxpayers, the appellant cannot complain.

4. Appellant also urges that said bonds are void, for the reason that they provide for the semiannual payment of interest. The statute provides that the trustees shall have the right to determine the rate of interest such bonds shall bear, provided that in no case shall it exceed 7 per cent. per annum. The time at which the interest is to be paid, whether annually or semiannually, affects the rate of interest, and is within the power conferred upon the board by the statute; and, the rate being within the statutory limit, the bonds are valid, as against this objection.

5. Appellant further contends that the notice of special election does not contain a sufficient statement of the amount of the tax levy to be made annually. The ordinance calling the election provides that the bonds should be of the character known as "serials"; that one-twentieth part of the whole indebtedness for each purpose should be paid each year, including interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually; that "the tax levy for the payment thereof amounts during the full period of twenty years to $97,800" for the waterworks bonds, and to $40,750 for the sewer bonds. The only provision of the statute touching what the notice of election shall contain in this regard is that it shall state "the amount of tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." It would be difficult to make the notice more specific in this regard. It contains all the data required for the purpose of calculating the precise amount of the levy for each year, and that is certain which is capable of being rendered certain. Besides, there were two propositions to be separately voted for, and as was said in City of San Luis Obispo

v. Haskin, 91 Cal. 551, 27 Pac. 929, "the best it could do was to fix the proportion of the indebtedness which should be paid each year."

At the most, these several objections urged by appellant are matters of mere irregularity, which do not affect the validity of the bonds in the hands of the purchaser, and therefore constitute no ground for assailing the levy of a tax to meet the annual installments of principal and interest due thereon. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CHILDERS v. SAN JOSE MERCURY
PRINTING & PUBLISHING CO.
(No. 15,614.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

LIBEL — WORDS ACTIONABLE PER SE — PRESUMPTIONS OF MALICE — IN FACT AND IN LAW — DAMAGES — COMPENSATORY — PUNITIVE.

1. The fact that defendant published an article charging plaintiff with the commission of a felony conclusively establishes a cause of action for actual or compensatory damages.

2. The publication of an article libelous per se is conclusively presumed to have been made intentionally, and without just cause.

3. Malice in fact in the making of a publication libelous per se is only prima facie established by evidence of the publication.

4. Upon the establishment of malice in fact in the making of a libelous publication, exemplary damages may be recovered.

5. In an action for libel the existence of malice in fact is for the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

Action by William Childers against the San Jose Mercury Printing & Publishing Company to recover for libel. From judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying it a new trial, defendant appeals.

D. M. Delmas, H. V. Morehouse, and John E. Richards, for appellant. Parker & Nougues, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Monterey, in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant herein, for the sum of $2,000, damages for an alleged libel, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The defendant published in a daily issue of the San Jose Mercury, a newspaper printed and published in the city of San Jose, an article to the effect that the plaintiff, William Childers, had committed the offense of burglary upon the previous night, in said city of San Jose, by breaking and entering a business house of said city. Plaintiff, by his complaint, charged said publication to be a libel upon him, and brought this action for damages.

It is now insisted that the court misunderstood the law bearing upon the questions here involved, and that the following instructions, which were given to the jury, are unsound as declarations of legal principles: (1) "All libels and slanders are conclusively presumed to be in some degree malicious." (2) "Said publication was a libel upon the plaintiff, and entitles him to a verdict in his favor." (3) "Damages in such a case as this are given—First, to compensate the plaintiff for his injuries, if he has suffered any; and, second, as an example to others similarly situated, and as a punishment for a wrongful act done." (4) "In this action, if you find for the plaintiff, and if you find that the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or presumed, in addition to the actual damages sustained by the plaintiff, you may give him damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant. As I have already charged you, the law presumes the existence of malice from the fact of the publication of the false, unprivileged, and defamatory article in a newspaper regarding the person so charged." (5) "The plaintiff in this case has not alleged or attempted to prove any special damages, but simply claims a verdict for exemplary or punitive damages. Such damages are given for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant." The foregoing instructions are taken from various portions of the body of law given by the court to the jury, and are collected and numbered for our convenience. There is no question in this case but that the publication was not a privileged one, and the court was justified in so stating to the jury.

Malice, as pertaining to actions of libel and slander, is a question both intricate and important, and especially so when it, in its various classifications, is considered in connection with the legal principles bearing upon the question of exemplary or punitive damages. Malice may be divided into two distinct classes, to wit, malice in law and malice in fact. Malice in law may be defined as a wrongful act, done intentionally, without just cause or excuse. Bell v. Fernald, 71 Mich. 267, 38 N. W. 910; King v. Patterson, 49 N. J. Law, 417, 9 Atl. 705. Such malice is necessary to the life of every cause of action for libel, and is conclusively presumed in publications of the character here involved. In King v. Patterson, supra, it is said: "On the other hand, where the publication imputes a crime so as to be actionable per se or is actionable only on averment and proof of special damages, if the publication is not justified by proof of its truth, or by the privileged occasion of publication, the law in such cases presumes malice such as is essential to the action. In such cases good faith and an honest belief in the truth of the publication will be no defense. The absence of a malicious motive may protect against exemplary damages, but will not bar the action." Actual malice, or malice in fact, is only material in libel as establishing a right to recover exemplary damages, or to defeat defendant's plea that a publication is privileged. Malice in fact may be defined as a spiteful or rancorous disposition which causes an act to be done for mischief. Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 252. As will be observed hereafter, malice in fact may be established by evidence aliunde, or it may appear from the face of the publication itself.

Two classes of damages may be recovered in actions of libel, to wit, actual or compensatory damages and exemplary damages. Special damages, as a branch of actual damages, may be recovered when actual pecuniary loss has been sustained, and is specially pleaded. The remaining branch of actual damages embraces recovery for loss of reputation, shame, mortification, injury to feelings, etc.; and, while special damages must be alleged and proven, general damages for outrage to feelings and loss of reputation need not be alleged in detail, and may be recovered in the absence of actual proof, and to the amount that the jury estimates will fairly compensate plaintiff for the injury done. Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 386. Exemplary damages may be recovered when malice on the part of the defendant is established as a fact; and, by the express provisions of section 3294 of the Civil Code, this malice may be "actual or presumed." We assume that the word "actual," as used in this section of the Code means "express." In criminal law, malice is an element of murder, and this malice may be either express or implied. It is implied when no considerable provocation for the killing appears, or when the circumstances of the killing show an abandoned and malignant heart. We are inclined to believe that the "presumed malice" of section 3294 closely assimilates to the implied malice of the criminal law. It is an inference of fact to be drawn from the libelous character of the publication; and, if the article is libelous per se, we see no reason why the law should not declare that, upon its introduction in evidence, a prima facie case of malice in fact is established; for, even though it be presumed malice, it is malice in fact, and has all the dignity and gravity of express or actual malice, proven aliunde. We conclude that presumed malice is equally a question of fact with actual malice, and, upon being established equally, forms the foundation for the recovery of exemplary damages.

This publication charged plaintiff with the commission of a felony. It was false, not privileged, and libelous per se. Upon such a state of facts the cause of action for actual damages is conclusively established (Wilson v. Fitch, supra; Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. 179; Mowry v. Raabe, 89 Cal. 609, 27 Pac. 157); and the amount and measure of damages are the only questions left for litigation. In this publication malice in law is not only conclusively presumed, but such malice in fact is implied or presumed as to establish prima facie the right of plaintiff to exemplary damages. In other words, the existence of malice in fact is sufficiently shown by the publication to make the question an issue before the jury. That exemplary damages may be based alone upon a publication libelous per se, we have many authorities from many states. Samuels v. Association, 75 N. Y. 604; Bergmann v. Jones, 94 N. Y. 51; Warner v. Publishing Co., 132 N. Y. 181, 30 N. E. 393; Association v. Tryon, 42 Mich. 549, 4 N. W. 267; Buckley v. Knapp, 48 Mo. 152; Clements v. Maloney, 55 Mo. 352; Schmisseur v. Krelich, 92 Ill. 347; Snyder v. Fulton, 34 Md. 128; Nolan v. Traber, 49 Md. 460. In Warner v. Publishing Co., supra, the principle is thus declared: "The plaintiff gave evidence of malice when she proved the falsity of the libelous publication; and, in the absence of evidence on the part of the defendant tending to show that it had neither the desire nor the intention to wrong her, it would have been the duty of the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff might be awarded exemplary damages in their discretion; but testimony was adduced on the part of the defendant tending to prove the absence of actual malice on his part towards the plaintiff, which, taken in connection with the evidence of malice which the law imputed when the falsity of the libel was established, presented a question of fact whether malice existed in the publication. If found to exist, then, in their discretion, the jury could award exemplary damages." While there may be authority in some states opposed to the principle declared in the foregoing citation, yet in this state, in view of section 3294 of the Civil Code, to which we have adverted, there would seem to be no question as to the true rule.

Do the instructions of the court stand the test when gauged by the legal principles we have declared? As to those instructions numbers 1 and 2 are correct. No. 3 is correct if malice in fact is assumed to have been established by the evidence; but the court was not justified in making such an assumption. Malice in fact was an issue before the jury, and, if found by the jury to be an element of the case, then, and then only, was the instruction correct and the case one for exemplary damages. Instruction No. 4 is correct in all save the last clause. The court first tells the jury that if malice, actual or presumed, has been proven, exemplary damages may be recovered, and then commits the error by saying that the publication is such that malice is presumed; in other words, conclusively presumed. This is true of malice in law, but the court, in this instruction, was dealing with malice in fact as bearing upon exemplary damages; and the presumption of malice in fact from the libelous character of the publication is not conclusive but disputable. The defendant had the right to rebut this presumption by any proper evidence. He attempted so to do in this case, and, if he was successful in that regard to the satisfaction of the jury, malice in fact was no longer an element in the case. The fifth instruction is not entirely correct, but probably too favorable to the defendant; for, while the plaintiff did not claim special damages, he did claim compensatory damages to the extent of the injury to his feelings, etc.; and, in the absence of malice in fact under his pleading, these compensatory damages were all that he was entitled to recover.

For foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO. (No. 15,600.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1894.)

TAXATION OF RAILROAD—SPECIAL LAW—UNITED STATES FRANCHISE—INCLUSION IN ASSESSMENT—PRESUMPTION—SUIT FOR TAXES—INTEREST—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. Pol. Code, § 3668 et seq., providing for the collection of delinquent taxes assessed on the "franchise, roadbed, rails and rolling stock" of a railroad which passes through more than one county, is not unconstitutional as being a "special law" for the collection of taxes (Const. art. 4, § 25), as the general laws for the general collection of taxes are not applicable to such railways.

2. When a railroad, which has secured a state franchise to operate its road, afterwards receives a federal franchise, the state franchise is not merged in the federal franchise, so as to prevent the taxation of the state franchise, the roadbed, etc., of the railroad.

3. In an action to collect the tax levied against such a railroad, it appeared that the assessment was against the "franchise, roadbed," etc. Held, that the decision of the lower court, on conflicting evidence, that the federal franchise was not included in the assessment, was conclusive, though the court erroneously stated that, if the evidence had been otherwise, it would, as matter of law, have held the same way.

4. In such a case, statements by the board of equalization made during the session at which the assessment was made are not admissible to show what was intended to be included by it in the word "franchise."

5. Pol. Code, § 3716, providing that every tax has the "effect" of a judgment against the person, does not, because a judgment bears interest, make taxes bear interest also.

6. In a judgment for delinquent taxes, it is proper to provide that it bear interest from the date of its entry.

7. Though Pol. Code, § 3670, authorizing the controller to sue for delinquent taxes, and authorizing the court to assess such sum for counsel fees as it may determine to be reasonable, may authorize the court to award counsel fees to attorneys employed in such an action by the controller, yet where the attorney general, whose duty it is "to prosecute and defend all cases in which the state or any officer" is a party (Id. § 470), appears in the action, and employs counsel to assist him, fees cannot be allowed them.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the people of the state of California against the Central Pacific Railroad Company for the collection of taxes. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

H. S. Brown, J. E. Foulds, and Foshay Walker (Wm. F. Herrin, of counsel), for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, A. R. Cotton, and Langhorne & Miller, for the People.

HARRISON, J. Action to recover the amount of taxes assessed against the defendant by the state board of equalization for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888.

1. The underlying question upon this appeal is the validity of sections 3668, 3669, and 3670 of the Political Code, the appellant contending that the provisions of these sections contravene the provisions of section 25, art. 4, of the constitution, and particularly of subdivision 10 thereof, by which the legislature is prohibited from passing a special law "for the assessment or collection of taxes"; that as these sections take from the operation of the general law for the collection of taxes a certain class of railroads, and are applicable to these railroads alone, they are a special law, within this prohibition. The distinction between a special and a general law may not be capable of being formulated in a definition which will be exhaustive of the subject and applicable to every case; and the question may be better determined upon a consideration of each particular case presented for its application by taking into view the purpose and character of the law, as well as the individuals upon which it is to operate. The legislature, in its function of providing for the public welfare and the benefit of the entire people of the state, must determine the character of the laws which it will enact, and, except in so far as it is prohibited by the constitution, should adapt these laws to the condition or necessities of different portions of the state or classes of its citizens. The constitution does not require that all the laws which the legislature shall pass shall have a uniform operation in every part of the state, nor does it prohibit legislation for different classes of citizens. The requirement that all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation, and that the legislature shall not pass special laws upon certain subjects, still leaves open for determination whether any particular statute is a general or a special law. A law which operates only upon a class of individuals is none the less a general law if the individuals to whom it is applicable constitute a class which requires legislation peculiar to itself in the matter covered by the law. The class, however, must not only be germane to the purpose of the law, but must also be characterized by some substantial qualities or attributes which render such legislation necessary or appropriate for the individual members of the class. It may be "founded upon some natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction" (City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 604); but the distinction must be of such a nature as to reasonably indicate the necessity or propriety of legislation restricted to that class. If the conditions of such a class are such as to require legislation which would be inappropriate or injurious to others, or such as to require the enactment of laws which, either in their mode of enforcement or the remedy they provide, are inapplicable to others than the designated class, laws enacted for that class are not special for the reason that they apply to all of the individuals within the conditions. "A law is regarded as general when the provisions apply to all objects of legislation distinguished alike by qualities and attributes which necessitate the legislation to which the enactment has manifest relation." Randolph v. Wood, 49 N. J. Law, 85, 7 Atl. 286. The rule has been formulated by the supreme court of Minnesota in the following terms: "The true practical limitation of the legislative power to classify is that the classification shall be based upon some apparent natural reason, some reason suggested by necessity, by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in different classes as suggests the necessity or propriety of different legislation with respect to them." Nichols v. Walter, 37 Minn. 272, 33 N. W. 800. It is very clearly expressed by Mr. Commissioner Temple in Darcy v. Mayor, etc., 38 P. 500: "The classification must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the constitution or natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation, and must be made for the purpose of meeting different conditions naturally requiring different legislation."

For the purpose of collecting delinquent taxes, the railroads upon which the foregoing sections of the Political Code are intended to operate constitute a class distinct from all other railroads, as well as from all other taxpayers. Not only are the sections inapplicable to other delinquent taxpayers, but the mode provided by statute for collecting delinquent taxes from other taxpayers is inapplicable to this class. The constitution has itself established these railroads into a distinct class in providing a special mode of assessment for a portion of their property as the basis upon which their taxes are to be levied; and the form and nature of this assessment render it eminently appropriate, if not necessary, that the taxes levied against them should be collected in a different mode from that provided for the collection of other taxes. A mere examination of the statutes for the collection of delinquent taxes generally discloses the unsuitableness of those statutes for the collection of delinquent taxes from railroads operated in more than one county. Under those statutes, the tax collector is required to pursue a course which would be entirely inapplicable to these railroads. By section 3764 of the Political Code, he is required to publish a delinquent list which must contain a description of the property on which the taxes are delinquent, and, for the purpose of collecting the delinquent taxes by sale of the property, he is required, by section 3773, to sell the least quantity of the property assessed for which a purchaser will pay the taxes and costs. Upon such sale he is to make out and deliver to the purchaser a certificate of sale, which must contain "a description of the land sold," and enter the same description in a book kept by him for that purpose. If there is no redemption from the sale, he must execute to the purchaser a deed containing the same description. The whole proceedings, commencing with the assessment and culminating in the deed, harmonize with each other, and deal with the property as a unit which can be described, levied upon, sold, and taken into possession by the purchaser. Each item of property assessed is treated as an independent item, disconnected with any other, so that upon the sale of one item it can be enjoyed by the purchaser irrespective of the sale of any other item. Such provisions are inapplicable to the railroads under consideration, so far as concerns that portion of their property which is assessed by the state board of equalization. It must be borne in mind that only a portion of their property, viz. the "franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock" of railroads operated in more than one county, is thus assessed. The depots, stations, shops, and buildings erected upon the space covered by the right of way are assessed by the assessor of the county in which they are situated, and the taxes upon this property are collected in the same mode as are taxes from other individuals. The constitution provides that after the state board of equalization has made the assessment of the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock at their actual value, the same shall be apportioned to the counties in proportion to the mileage in the different counties. It is the "value" of the property after it has been assessed that is to be apportioned to the several counties. There is no apportionment to the counties of the property itself, or of any particular part of that property. Upon the assessment book of the several counties, the assessment that is apportioned by the state board of equalization does not contain a description of the property within that county, or any designation of property upon which the taxes that may be levied could constitute a lien. Only the apportioned part of the assessed value is entered on the books of the county auditor as the basis of the taxes to be levied within the county,—the amount upon which the percentage of tax is to be computed, and from which is derived the amount of taxes to be paid by the railroad. The nature of the property required to be assessed by the state board of equalization shows that the property itself is incapable of being apportioned, and that there could be no description entered upon the books which could serve as the basis of a sale or conveyance. Even if the roadway within the county could be described, there could be no apportionment to the several counties of the franchise or of the rolling stock which could serve as a description or be capable of transfer. The franchise is a unit, and can be transferred only as a unit, and the rolling stock has no particular situs in any county, but, in connection with the roadway and roadbed, is essential for the enjoyment of the franchise; while the whole—the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock—constitutes an entirety incapable of division. If the taxes for any county that are levied against the railroad upon this apportionment by the state board of equalization are delinquent, there is no description of property within that county which can be advertised or incorporated into a certificate of sale and deed. Even if the roadway and roadbed within the several counties could be made the subject of sale for delinquent taxes, the functions of each tax collector would be limited to his own county, and the purchasers in the different counties might not be the same. If they should be offered for sale, and the tax collector of each county should offer to sell to the one who would take the least portion thereof within his county, and only an undivided portion thereof should be sold in either county, the difficulties and complications that would arise between the several purchasers and the railroad of themselves indicate the necessity of devising some other mode of collecting the taxes. These and many other considerations that might be presented make it manifest that the constitution itself, by reason of the manner in which it has provided for the assessment of the property of railroads operated in more than one county, has made the laws which are appropriate for the collection of delinquent taxes upon property generally inapplicable to these railroads, and that, inasmuch as they require legislation upon that subject peculiar to themselves, the law enacted for them is a general, and not a special, law.

The appellant has cited, in support of the appeal, People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 Pac. 303. In that case the court held that, whether the complaint was to be regarded as an ordinary complaint in a civil action to recover money upon a statutory obligation, or as a complaint under section 3670 of the Political Code, it was insufficient, and that the demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was properly sustained. The court also held that a statutory provision for a special form of complaint in an action to recover delinquent taxes contravenes the constitutional prohibition against passing special laws regulating practice in courts of justice; but, as the complaint in the present case is not prepared in that form, that question is not presented. The collection of taxes is not, however, the mere collection of a debt, but is a sovereign act of the state, to be exercised as may be prescribed by the legislature. Whether the tax is collected by an action in court, or by summary sale by the tax collector, is immaterial. The state, through its legislature, can avail itself of the judicial power as the means by which it will collect the tax; and in such proceedings it may prescribe such procedure as may best avail for that purpose, irrespective of the mode of procedure provided for the determination of controversies between individuals, just as it may avail itself of the executive branch of the government by authorizing the sheriff to sell the property upon which the taxes are delinquent, without requiring him to pursue the same course as is required in sales upon judgments between individuals. Although the tax is an obligation from the citizen to the state, it is not of the same character of obligations as exist between citizens, and for the purposes of its collection the state is not limited to the same mode or to the same procedure which it prescribes for individuals in the collection of obligations between themselves. There are matters in the opinion of Mr. Justice Fox, in People v. Central Pac. R. Co., in support of the contention of the appellant; but, after the court had decided that the complaint was insufficient in any aspect in which it might be viewed, its further opinion of the effect of a complaint that would have sufficiently presented a cause of action must be regarded as obiter dicta.

2. It is further urged in support of the appeal that the assessment in question is void for the reason that it includes the franchise received by the appellant from the United States, and in support of this contention California v. Central Pac. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. 1073, is cited. The appellant originally received from the state of California a franchise to construct and operate its railroad within this state, and subsequently it received from the United States a franchise to construct and operate a railroad from the Pacific Ocean eastward; and it is contended that the franchise from the state has been "merged" into that received from the United States. Appellant has not, however, referred us to any authority which holds that the union of the two franchises in the same corporation will operate as a merger of the state franchise, nor has it invoked any principle of law which would authorize us to hold that such merger took place. A license or the right to exercise a privilege which is derived from one authority is not necessarily destroyed or merged by procuring a similar license or right from another authority, any more than is a title to real estate merged by buying in a conflicting title, or taking a conveyance for further assurance from the grantor. The supreme court of the United States, in discussing the right to assess the federal franchise, said in the foregoing action between these parties (127 U. S. 38, 8 Sup. Ct. 1073): "This important grant, though in part collateral to, was independent of, that made to the company by the state of California." It must be conceded that the state franchise is independent of the federal franchise to the extent that it is capable of being revoked by the state. What the effect of such revocation would be, or whether it would in any respect impair the appellant's right to operate its road under the federal franchise, need not be considered. So, too, if the United States, in its visitatorial power, should for any reason recall the franchise which it has conferred upon the appellant, the franchise received by it from the state of California would still remain, and enable it to operate its road. Whether the appellant is operating its road under the franchise derived from the United States, or from the state, is immaterial. The right to operate the road is valuable whether the road is at present operated under the exercise of this right or not. The franchise from the state is still a valid, existing right, and is property which is susceptible of valuation, although its value will depend upon a variety of circumstances. If its exercise is in abeyance while the road is being operated under the federal franchise, it is none the less property, although that circumstance may diminish its taxable value.

The assessment in the present case is upon the "franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock," and the court finds "that, in making its assessment and valuation therefor of defendant's franchise, said state board of equalization did not include, assess, or value any franchise or corporate power held or exercised by defendant under any act of congress." This finding is fully supported by the evidence. The constitution (article 13, § 10), as well as the statute (Pol. Code, § 3665), requires the state board of equalization to include in its assessment the franchise of the railroad; and in the present case the property of the appellant which was assessed by the state board of equalization is described as "the franchise, roadway, roadbed, rails, and rolling stock of said company within this state." We have seen that the state franchise is property susceptible of valuation, and, as the state board of equalization is directed to assess the franchise of the appellant, it must be assumed, in the absence of any other evidence than the assessment itself, that the board has acted upon property within its jurisdiction, rather than upon property which it has no power to include in the assessment. Section 3670 makes the duplicate record of assessments of railways and the duplicate record of apportionment of railway assessments, or a copy thereof, prima facie evidence of the assessment, and that the forms of law in relation to the assessment and levy of such taxes have been complied with; and, if there were no other evidence than this, the finding of the court would be sustained. The appellant, however, under the provisions of section 3664, had furnished to the state board of equalization a statement signed by its secretary, as required by that section, in which it had given as property for which it was to be assessed a description of its roadway, and had stated, in addition: "The value of the franchise and entire roadway, roadbed, and rails within this state is $12,273,785." While the mention by the appellant in the statement furnished by it of property which the state board of equalization had no authority to assess would not prevent it from resisting an attempt to enforce an assessment upon such property, yet if the property so mentioned in the statement could be assessed, or if, as in the present case, the appellant held two franchises, one of which could be assessed and the other could not, it must be held that the franchise which it included in its statement was the one capable of assessment, and that the appellant ought not to be permitted to say that the other was intended by it, or was included in the assessment. City and County of San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. 264; Lake Co. v. Sulphur Bank Quicksilver Min. Co., 68 Cal. 14, 8 Pac. 593; Dear v. Varnum, 80 Cal. 86, 22 Pac. 76. The value given by the appellant in its statement was not conclusive upon the state board. It was only a portion of the information which the board was to obtain in order to exercise its judgment in fixing the amount at which the assessment should be made. If the appellant felt aggrieved by the value placed upon the property as a unit, or as an aggregate of the several items included in its statement, the statute itself afforded the means by which it could obtain relief. There was no error in admitting these statements in evidence. Upon the contention by the appellant that the assessment included the federal franchise, it was competent to show that it had been made in accordance with the statement furnished by it at the request of the state board.

Other testimony was introduced upon the issue presented by the answer that the assessment included the federal franchise, but, at the conclusion of the trial, the court made the above finding that no federal franchise had been assessed. As there was evidence before it in support of this finding, it must be treated here as conclusive, notwithstanding there was other evidence that might be regarded as raising a conflict therewith. It is recited in the statement on motion for a new trial that after the court had determined as a fact, from a preponderance of the evidence before it, that the federal franchise was not assessed, it used the following language in a written opinion upon which the findings were based: "But if the parol evidence offered did not weigh in plaintiff's favor, and if, by a preponderance of such evidence, defendants could have shown that the state intended to and did include a federal franchise in the assessment, I think the court would have to disregard it as incompetent. The effect of such parol evidence would be to contradict the record, which cannot be done. From both the standpoints of fact and of law, the findings must be that a federal franchise was not included in these assessments." From this statement the appellant urges that the evidence offered by it in support of its averment that the assessment includes the federal franchise was disregarded by the court in making its decision, and, as a consequence, that the rule regarding the conclusiveness of a decision upon a conflict of evidence has no application. It clearly appears, however, that the court did not disregard the evidence, but that, after determining as a fact, from the preponderance of evidence before it, that the federal franchise had not been assessed, it stated that, if the preponderance of evidence had been otherwise, it would have held as a matter of law that the assessment must be tested by its own language. The fact that a court, after giving its decision upon an issue, gives its opinion upon the manner in which it would have decided the issue under other circumstances, does not constitute an error to be reviewed in this court.

While Mr. Wilcoxon was being examined as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant, in its cross-examination, asked him some questions referring to testimony given by him before the judiciary committee of the assembly in February, 1889; and, the witness having admitted the correctness of the testimony, counsel for defendant then stated to the court that he would read for the court's information the question and answer "upon which" he proposed to interrogate the witness; and, after reading the same, the court stated in substance that the evidence must be confined to the year 1887, to which counsel reserved an exception, and now urges that the court erred in not allowing an examination of the witness as to his previous statement. The court did not, however, refuse to allow the witness to be examined with reference to any previous statement, for the questions and answers were read to the court after the witness had stated that "the testimony is correct all through, the questions and the answers"; nor did the counsel for the defendant present any question "upon" these questions and answers for the ruling of the court, as he had stated was his purpose. If he had desired to question the witness upon any matters relating to other assessments than the one for the year 1887, he should have made a specific offer, or presented a question for the ruling of the court; but, in the absence of such offer or question, there was no error in the court confining the examination to that year.

The court properly excluded the testimony of Maslin concerning the conversations between the members of the state board of equalization during the session at which the assessment was made. The intention of the board or of any of its members, or the signification to be given to the term "franchise," as used in the assessment, could not be shown in this manner, and the evidence could not be used for impeaching purposes unless the members of the board had been previously questioned thereon.

3. The court erred in allowing plaintiff interest on the amount of the taxes. Section 3668 of the Political Code provides that, if the taxes are not paid on the last Monday in December in each year, five per cent. shall be added to the principal sum and paid by the delinquent. This is the only penalty given by the statute, but the court has included in its judgment not only this penalty, but also interest upon the principal sum from the date of the delinquency at 7 per cent. per annum. Taxes do not bear interest unless it is expressly given by statute (Cooley, Tax'n [2d Ed.] p. 17); and the provision in section 3803 for interest upon a certain class of taxes is indicative of an intention upon the part of the legislature to exclude all other classes. A similar question was presented in People v. Northern Pac. Coast R. Co., 68 Cal. 551, 10 Pac. 45, and decided adversely to the claim of the respondent therein, the court saying: "If it had been intended that interest should be collected on all taxes which the controller might sue for and recover, the complaint formulated by the legislature for their collection would, in our opinion, have demanded judgment for that interest, as well as for the five per cent. for nonpayment." The respondent seeks to uphold the judgment by virtue of the provision of section 3716, which declares that "every tax has the effect of a judgment against the person," etc., and argues therefrom that, as a judgment bears interest, the tax will also bear interest. By the same reasoning the plaintiff would be entitled to an execution against the defendant under which the sheriff could satisfy the judgment. The "effect" of a judgment is not to bear interest, although that is one of its incidents. As a judgment, the tax is a "final determination" of the amount of public burden which is to be borne by the property on which it is charged; and the further declaration in the same section that the tax, as well as the judgment, is not removed until the taxes are paid or the property sold, indicates the character of the "effect of a judgment" which is given to the tax. It was proper to provide in the judgment that it should bear interest from its date of entry like any other judgment. Himmelman v. Oliver, 34 Cal. 246.

4. The court also held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for counsel fees for legal services rendered it by Langhorne & Miller a sum equal to 7½ per cent. upon the principal sum of delinquent taxes, and for legal services rendered it by A. R. Cotton a sum equal to 2½ per cent. upon said principal sum, and rendered judgment accordingly. Langhorne & Miller were the attorneys employed by the state controller to collect these taxes, and commenced this action in January, 1890, and have since that time had charge of the litigation, and acted as the attorneys for the plaintiff. In the early part of 1891 the attorney general requested Mr. Cotton "to take a hand generally" in the suit, and after that time he wrote certain briefs which were filed in the case by the attorney general, and assisted the attorney general upon the argument on the demurrer, and at the trial of the cause as special counsel. Section 3670 of the Political Code authorizes the controller to institute an action for the collection of these taxes after they have become delinquent, and authorizes the court to include in the judgment in such action such sum for counsel fees as it may determine to be reasonable and just. The power of the controller to employ special counsel in the action has not been questioned by the appellant, and it is, perhaps, deducible from the provision for counsel fees above cited. Section 3670 is in accord with the provisions of subdivision 16, § 433, of the Political Code, which makes it the duty of the controller, "to direct and superintend the collection of all moneys due the state," although the latter section, without the direct provisions of section 3670, might not be authority for the institution of the present suit. The appellant, however, insists that the court could not award counsel fees to any other counsel than those employed by the controller, and that the allowance to Mr. Cotton was without authority of law. Section 470 of the Political Code makes it the duty of the attorney general "to attend the supreme court; and prosecute or defend all causes to which the state or any officer thereof in his official capacity is a party." Whether this limits his duty to the prosecution of such causes in the supreme court, or whether it extends to all the courts in the state, need not be considered. If the controller has the right, under section 3670, to intrust the management of the action to other attorneys than the attorney general, it would seem that the attorney general would be absolved from the duty imposed upon him by section 470, and that any part that he might take in such action would be voluntary and subordinate to the authority of the attorneys selected by the controller. If, however, he has the right, as the law officer of the state, to appear in the action, it is only by virtue of his official duty, and for that he would not be entitled to any compensation other than his official salary. This is the view taken by that officer himself, as he stated at the trial in the present action that, in his opinion, he was not entitled to any compensation. The same reason which would prevent him from being entitled to compensation for the services he might personally render in the action would also prevent him from receiving compensation for any person whom he might employ to assist him; and the court would be no more authorized to award judgment against the defendant for compensation to such assistant than it would be for compensation to the attorney general himself. We have been referred to no provision of law giving to the attorney general authority to employ special counsel to aid him in the discharge of his duties, or authorizing a court to award compensation to such special counsel; and, in matters of taxation, only such burdens can be imposed upon the taxpayer as have been expressly authorized by law, whether the taxes are collected by a sale of his property or by means of an action for their recovery. We hold, therefore, that the court was not authorized to include in the judgment against the defendant the sum for counsel fees awarded to Mr. Cotton.

The court below is directed to modify the judgment by striking therefrom the amount allowed for interest prior to the entry of the judgment, and also the amount allowed for counsel fees to A. R. Cotton; and, as so modified, the judgment and order denying a new trial will stand affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. Passing other questions, it is sufficient to say that, in my opinion, the assessment in question is void under the decisions of the supreme court of the United States in the cases of California v. Central Pac. R. Co. and California v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 127 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. 1073, because it includes a federal franchise, and thus attempts to tax "one of the means or instrumentalities employed by the United States government for carrying into effect its sovereign powers." That this cannot be done by a state has been the established law ever since the decision of the United States supreme court in McCulloch v. State, 4 Wheat. 316, which was rendered in 1819. The principle was fully recognized and declared by this court in San Benito Co. v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827, and City and County of San Francisco v. Western Union Tel. Co., 96 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 10. The only difference between the above mentioned cases in 127 U. S. (8 Sup. Ct.) and the case at bar is that in the former the trial court found that the state board of equalization included in the assessment the value of "all franchises and corporate powers held and exercised by the defendant," while in the case at bar the court below found that said board, in making the assessment for the year 1887, "did not include in its said assessment any federal franchise." But the assessment in both instances was exactly the same, namely, "the franchise" of the railroad. In the former cases it does not appear that the trial court received any evidence on the question as to what the franchise included; and it is probable that the finding was based upon the language of the assessment alone. In the case at bar the court did receive evidence as to what the members of the board intended by the words "the franchise"; and it appears in the record that the court, after having concluded that, "from a preponderance of evidence before it, the federal franchise of defendant was not assessed or included in the assessment," proceeded to say that "if, by a preponderance of such evidence, defendants could have shown that the state intended to and did include the federal franchise in the assessment, I think the court would have to disregard it as incompetent. The effect of such parol evidence would be to contradict the record, which cannot be done." Now, if it was competent to introduce testimony to show the intent of the members of the board when they made the assessment, then the court clearly erred in ruling out certain evidence offered on that point by appellant. Upon that theory the offered evidence of Maslin, secretary of the board for many years, was clearly admissible and material; and so were the questions asked by appellant in cross-examination of the witness Wilcoxen. On the other hand, if the record of the board should be alone considered, then it simply appears that the franchise was assessed; and I cannot possibly see how that phrase can be construed to mean anything else than the whole franchise of the railroad,—all the franchise belonging to it. It means just what the lower court had found it to mean, as above quoted, in said cases in 127 U. S. and 8 Sup. Ct. The words "the franchise" clearly, in my judgment, include the right of appellant to do business, and the whole of that right. That right is a unit and inseparable. The court below found that the board "did assess as a unit, and not separately, the franchise, roadway," etc. And I cannot conceive how a court can, first, separate it, or, second, if it could, how it could determine which part to throw away. Moreover, the main foundation of the doctrine of McCulloch v. State is that the power to tax includes the power to destroy; and thus a state might, under the guise of taxation, destroy or materially cripple an instrumentality of the federal government. And is it not manifest that in the case at bar that principle protects the instrumentality here involved from injury or destruction under the pretense that only that part of the unity which comes from the state is taxed? Are not the effects and consequences the same? In my opinion, therefore, without discussing the other questions involved, the judgment should be reversed.

DEAN et al. v. ROSS et al. (No. 15,647.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY—MATTERS OF FACT—LUMBER FURNISHED FOR BOAT—LIABILITY OF OWNER—DECLARATIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

1. In an action for lumber used in the construction of a vessel of which defendant was alleged to be part owner at the time the lumber was furnished, defendant testified that she bought shares in the vessel of its builder "at the time he started to build it"; that she told him she would take shares "after the vessel was built"; and that she got the shares after the boat was built. There was no other testimony as to the time she took the shares. Her receipts for the purchase price of the shares referred to the vessel as "built." Held, that in assuming in his charge to the jury that, at the time the vessel was being built, defendant owned said shares, the court violated Const. art. 6, § 19, prohibiting judges from charging juries as to matters of fact.

2. The court cannot take a fact from the jury unless it is admitted, or the evidence as to its existence is not conflicting.

3. In an action for lumber sold and used in the construction of a vessel, declarations of the share owner who built the boat as to the correctness of the account sued on were not admissible as against one who merely holds shares in the boat.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by E. B. Dean and others against William M. Ross, Henrietta G. Witzemana, and others on an account. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant Henrietta G. Witzemann appeals. Reversed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellant. Henley & Costello, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action to recover a balance due on an account for lumber alleged to have been bought by defendants from plaintiffs with which to construct a schooner. Defendants other than Henrietta G. Witzemann made default. The latter answered, and at the trial verdict and judgment were against her. She appeals from the judgment and an order denying her motion for new trial.

1. The contract for the lumber was made by the defendants John and William M. Ross, at plaintiffs' mill in Oregon, and the vessel was built at Coos Bay, in that state, under the immediate supervision of the Rosses, or one of them. The appellant, who lives in the city of San Francisco, in this state, had no direct dealings with the plaintiffs, and was not known to them in the transaction when they sold the lumber, but the theory on which the action proceeded against her was that she was a part owner in the vessel at the time the lumber was bought, and hence, jointly with the other defendants, liable therefor. The only evidence tending to connect appellant with the transaction was that given by herself. She was called as a witness on behalf of plaintiffs, and testified: "I have four shares in the schooner Maggie Ross. Have had them since I bought them from Captain Ross, five years ago, just at the time he started to build it. That is one-sixteenth. Captain Ross came to me, and said he was going to build a vessel, and I told him I didn't want any vessel built, but, if he wanted to build a vessel, he could do so, and I would take four shares. I did this at the time he was building the vessel. I do not own them now. I held the shares only a couple of years. * * * I took them when it was built, and Captain Ross built the vessel, and I paid him all my bills, and I got my receipts to show I paid it to Captain Ross." Called as a witness on her own behalf, she further testified: "I never ordered any lumber from the plaintiffs in this action, or for any purpose mentioned in the complaint, and never agreed with any of the plaintiffs in this case to pay them for any lumber. I never authorized Captain Ross or any other person to buy lumber from them on my account, or to build a schooner for me, or any part of it for me. * * * Captain Ross came in with his bills, and I paid the bills to him at different times. He said he wanted to build a vessel. I told him all right, if he wanted to build one, why, after the vessel was built, I would take some shares from him. * * * When Captain Ross first told me he was going to build a vessel, I told him he could build a ship, but not on my account; if he wanted to build one, he had to build it himself." The bills referred to by appellant as having been paid by her to Captain Ross were for her shares in the vessel, for which she paid in four installments. The receipt for the first installment was put in evidence, and reads: "San Francisco, April 5, 1888. Received of Mrs. H. G. Witzemann $312.50, being the first payment of twenty per cent. on four shares in new steamer built in Coos Bay. [Signed] John Ross." Appellant testified that the last installment was paid after August, 1888. "After I paid my said four installments, I then became the owner of four shares. Don't know when the last payment was made; it is so long ago. Paid between $1,500 and $1,600 in all."

Upon this evidence, the court below charged the jury: "Now, gentlemen, this case simply presents this question, so far as you are concerned: It appears from the evidence and pleadings in this case the plaintiffs here furnished lumber during a period from the early portion of 1888 until September of that year for the purpose of building this schooner, the Maggie Ross. It appears from the testimony here that certain persons were holding different shares in this vessel, and this defendant, Mrs. Witzemann, became the owner of four shares in the vessel, and therefore was part owner in the vessel. So, as a matter of law, I charge you that she is responsible for this lumber that may have gone into it; consequently there is no dispute on that proposition." At the conclusion of the charge, and before the jury retired, the appellant's attorney said: "I wish to note an exception to the charge of the court that she is found to be an owner of the vessel, or any part of it, at the time the bill was incurred. That is a question that should have been left to the jury.

The Court: There is no question of fact here to be submitted to the jury as to the question of ownership." Appellant excepted to this feature of the charge, and now complains that it is obnoxious to section 19 of article 6 of the constitution of this state, which prohibits judges from charging juries upon questions of fact. We think it a very plain transgression of the line which separates the functions of the judge from those of the jury, and therein falls within the denunciation of the provision in question. It assumes as proven the essential fact upon which, under the theory upon which the case was tried, the right of plaintiffs to recover against appellant depended. It is conceded that, if appellant bought her shares after the vessel was built, she would not be liable, and the question, therefore, as to when she did become interested, was the vital fact in the case. This fact the instruction of the court assumes to have been established in accordance with plaintiffs' theory. The evidence by no means warrants that assumption. To the contrary, the evidence on the point at issue was such that, had the jury seen fit to find in favor of appellant's contention, it could not be held that the finding was wholly unsupported. Appellant was testifying to an event some time past. She said, speaking of the purchase of the shares: "I bought them from Captain Ross five years ago, just at the time he started to build it [the vessel]. He said he wanted to build a vessel. I told him all right, if he wanted to build one, why, after the vessel was built, I would take some shares from him." In another place she said she got the shares after the boat was built; and the language of the receipts given her by Ross would tend at least to bear out the claim that she got her shares subsequent to the time the vessel was constructed; the vessel being therein referred to as "built at Coos Bay." Admitting that appellant's evidence is open to the charge of equivocation, it was nevertheless such as at least to leave the fact in issue, and she was entitled to have the issue found by the jury. Withdrawing it from their consideration, as the court did, was prejudicial error. It is only where the fact is admitted, or there is no shadow of conflict of evidence with respect to it, that the court is justified in taking it from the consideration of the jury. People v. Phillips, 70 Cal. 68, 11 Pac. 493; Vulicevich v. Skinner, 77 Cal. 239, 19 Pac. 424.

2. We think the court erred in admitting, against appellant's objection, the testimony of the witness Wilcox as to the declarations of Capt. Ross about the correctness of the bill for the lumber. They were not joint defendants in any sense which would make his declarations binding upon appellant; and the evidence did not tend to establish any such legal relation between them as to make his declarations admissible as against her.

The other points made do not require to be noticed. The judgment and order denying new trial are reversed.

ADAMS v. GRAND LODGE OF A. O. U. W. et al. (SMITH, Intervener). (No. 15,350.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE—NOMINAL AND REAL BENEFICIARY—DECLARATION OF TRUST—CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY—WAIVER OF CONDITION.

1. Where a certificate of insurance in a mutual benefit association, made payable to a member of a firm to which insured is indebted, is intended by all parties to be for the benefit of the firm, it will, as against the heirs of insured, be entitled to the proceeds of the certificate, though the nominal beneficiary died before the insured.

2. The provision in the constitution of a mutual benefit association, that an application for change of beneficiary in a certificate shall be filed within 30 days of its date, may be waived by the association, and is waived by issue of certificate naming the new beneficiary.

3. Where, in an action for the amount due under a certificate of insurance in a mutual benefit association, the administrator of the nominal beneficiary is made a defendant, and in a verified answer denies that such beneficiary was a trustee for plaintiff as to the certificate, a declaration of trust made by such beneficiary is admissible.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by L. S. Adams against the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen and others. Caroline H. Smith intervenes. Judgment for plaintiff, and intervener appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Cobb and Clinton L. White, for appellant. William H. Jordan, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. The plaintiff, as successor in interest of the firm of Adams, McNeill & Co., brought this action to recover the sum of $2,000, due and payable upon a beneficiary certificate issued by a society known as the "Ancient Order of United Workmen." The party insured was Joshua H. Smith, and the original beneficiary named in the certificate of membership was Caroline H. Smith, his wife, the present intervener and appellant. Subsequently Smith requested the grand lodge to substitute one John McNeill as the beneficiary in the place and stead of his wife, Caroline. This request was complied with, and said McNeill received a new certificate, made payable to himself upon the death of Smith. A few years thereafter McNeill died, and in about a like period after McNeill's death Smith died. No new beneficiary was named in Smith's certificate of insurance after the death of McNeill, and upon this ground the intervener and appellant, Mrs. Smith, representing the heirs and devisees of her late husband, appears in the action, claiming that the insured died without a named beneficiary, and that, therefore, the proceeds of the certificate belong to the heirs of the insured. The defendant the grand lodge appeared in the action by answer, and offered to pay the money to whomsoever the court might decree upon final judgment, while the defendant Bronner, administrator of the estate of John McNeill, deceased, answered, but failed to appear at the trial. Respondent Adams' claims are fairly illustrated and dependent upon the following facts, which we quote from the findings made by the trial court, and which, in our opinion, are fully supported by the evidence introduced at the trial. After finding that Smith was indebted to the firm of Adams, McNeill & Co. in a large sum of money, the findings further declare: "(1) That the said beneficiary certificate, so issued to the said Joshua H. Smith, and so made payable to the said John McNeill, was intended by the said Smith and the said McNeill for the benefit of the said firm of Adams, McNeill & Co., and not otherwise; and that the said certificate was held by the said John McNeill in trust for the said firm of Adams, McNeill & Co., of which said firm the said McNeill was at said time a member, as heretofore found, and that the same was so held in trust by the said McNeill with a full knowledge and consent of defendant the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen of California. (2) That it is a fact that the said firm of Adams, McNeill & Co. received said beneficiary certificate, and caused the same to be held by the said John McNeill in trust for them, as aforesaid, in payment of the said indebtedness to the said firm of the said Joshua H. Smith, and not otherwise; and that since the issuing of said certificate the said firm of Adams, McNeill & Co., and plaintiff, as its successor in interest, have furnished the funds with which to pay all assessments and dues required of the said Joshua H. Smith by the defendant Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen to keep the said beneficiary certificate in full force and effect."

The application of principles of law to litigation arising out of mutual benefit associations is a matter of very recent growth, and especially is this so of that branch of mutual benefit law which directly presents itself for our consideration in the present case. By reason of these things, and by reason of the additional fact that litigation involving these questions is to a great extent at the present time engrossing the attention of courts all over the country, and demanding decision largely without the aid of precedent, we find ourselves, to some extent at least, journeying upon untrodden and devious paths. At the same time we see no reason why those broad and benign principles of equity, which, as it were, are the guardians of the law, should not deal with this case as with other cases, and likewise weigh and measure its merits, rendering unto all parties that justice to which they are entitled. The Ancient Order of United Workmen is not an active party to the litigation. It has no interest whatever in the result. In effect, it has paid the fund into the hands of the court, and is now a stranger to the action. We, then, have a certain fund of money to which the plaintiff and the intervener both claim title, and their respective claims of ownership are to be litigated in the same way, and finally adjudicated and determined upon the same general principle, as though the common source of title of this money came through a bequest or gift, rather than from a mutual benefit association. We had occasion in the recent case of Jory v. Supreme Council, 38 Pac. 524, to give some of the matters here involved careful attention, and in that case we arrived at the conclusion that the relations existing between the insured and the beneficiary might be such as to create equities in favor of the beneficiary which the insured would be estopped from defeating, at least as against any subsequently named beneficiary who possessed no equities. Under the authority of that case, it cannot be questioned but that, if McNeill was a beneficiary possessing such equities, no subsequent act of Smith's, even though it had culminated in the issuance of a new certificate by the order to another beneficiary, could have defeated his equities; conceding, of course, this last beneficiary to be a pure volunteer.

According to the findings of fact, McNeill was the beneficiary in name only, and the real beneficiary was Adams, McNeill & Co. Even conceding that, as against the order, McNeill was the real and only beneficiary, that is not the condition here presented. The order is not here as an aggressive party, standing strictly upon its legal rights, and demanding the letter of its bond. As we have said, it is practically not a party to the action at all. But the conditions facing us are simply these: Two litigants, standing upon a common level, submit to a court of equity their respective claims of ownership to a special fund of money, and ask that court to do justice in the light and under the guidance of those equitable principles which form the glory of that forum. Looking at the case from that standpoint of vision, it presents but little difficulty. If McNeill in terms had been named beneficiary in the certificate, as trustee for Adams, McNeill & Co., there would be no question as to the ownership of the fund. Neither can there be any question but that a certificate could be made payable to McNeill, as guardian of a named minor, or as trustee of Adams, McNeill & Co. If McNeill had lived until the death of Smith, and litigation had arisen between him and Adams, McNeill & Co. as to the ownership of this fund, a court of equity, without hesitation, would have given it to the partnership, and the fact that the trust was not expressed upon the face of the certificate would have been wholly immaterial. The court, under such circumstances, would declare that McNeill was a mere naked trustee of the real beneficiary, and that the real beneficiary was entitled to the money. Such is the principle governing here, and, in the eyes of a court of equity, the fact that the trustee died prior to the death of Smith makes no difference in the conditions. The real beneficiary still lived, and was alive at the death of Smith, and he is the one it is the duty of the court to protect. It is insisted that the certificate issued to McNeill by the order was invalid, for the reason that the application for a change of beneficiary was not filed in the grand lodge within 30 days of its date, and thus was not filed in compliance with the provisions of the constitution of the order. A sufficient answer to such contention by the intervener is that this provision of the law was one that could be waived by the order, and when the order issued the certificate upon the application the provision was waived. The declaration of trust made by McNeill, defining his relations with the firm as to the beneficiary certificate, was properly admitted in evidence. The administrator of McNeill's estate was a party defendant, and filed a verified answer denying the trust relations, and under these circumstances the paper was competent evidence. There is nothing further disclosed by the record demanding our attention. The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re BATES' ESTATE. (No. 19,509.)

DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—APPEAL.

Where deceased bequeathed to her daughter certain named personal property, and the residue of her estate to a charitable institution, under Code, § 1313, precluding testatrix from disposing by will of more than one-third of her estate, it must be shown, on appeal by the daughter from a decree of distribution rendered in accordance with the terms of the will, that such "residue" amounted to more than one-third of the whole.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. Claflk, Judge.

Proceedings in the probate of the will of Annie Bates, deceased, from a decree of distribution, in which her daughter, Mary Dunbar, appeals. Affirmed.

Lawson & Ardis, for appellant. Bicknell & Trask, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The decedent left a last will and testament, making the following dispositions of her property: "Secondly. I give and bequeath to my daughter, Mary Dunbar, the wife of Edwin Dunbar, the household furniture, beds, and clothing, and all articles in my late residence in the township of Compton, in said county of Los Angeles, state of California. Thirdly. I give and bequeath to the Los Angeles Infirmary, a corporation for the care of the sick and feeble persons, all the remainder and residue of my estate, real, personal, and mixed, of which I die seised or possessed, the said infirmary having benevolently cared for me during my illness, and have agreed and covenanted to bury my body as above provided." Upon the final settlement of the accounts of the executor, the court made a decree of distribution, in which, after reciting that "the residue of said estate consists wholly of real property," it ordered that the residue of said estate, consisting of two parcels of land situated in Los Angeles county, described in said decree, be distributed to the "Los Angeles Infirmary, a corporation for the care of sick and feeble persons, organized and existing under the laws of the state of California." From this order the daughter of the decedent has appealed, upon the ground that by virtue of the provisions of section 1313, Civ. Code, the testatrix was precluded from disposing by will of more than one-third of her estate.

The inventory of the estate is not set forth in the record, nor is there any bill of exceptions or data from which the amount of the estate of the decedent can be determined. For the purpose of sustaining the order of the court, we must assume that any matters which would support the order, if they had been before the court, were presented to it, and made the basis of its action. Caruthers v. Hensley, 90 Cal. 559, 27 Pac. 411. In the absence of any facts showing it to be erroneous, the order of the court must be assumed to be correct, and the burden of showing error is upon the appellant. The items of property bequeathed to the appellant may have been of more than twice the value of the property left to the corporation, and the "residue" distributed to the corporation may have been less than one-third of the distributable portion of the estate. As the contrary is not made to appear, the presumption that the order is correct must prevail. The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. HOFFMAN v. HECHT et al., Board of Freeholders. (No. 16,005.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1895.)

PREPARATION OF CITY CHARTER—ELECTION OF BOARD OF FREEHOLDERS—INELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS ELECTED—EFFECT—DE FACTO OFFICERS—AUTHORITY.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 8, one who has not for five years been a qualified voter of the city for which a charter is to be prepared is ineligible to a position on the board of freeholders chosen for that purpose.

2. Where 2 of the 15 freeholders chosen to prepare a city charter, as provided by the constitution, are ineligible, the remaining 13 members are competent to organize and act as such board.

3. Though 2 of a board of 15 freeholders chosen to prepare a city charter are ineligible, the fact that they have been duly elected and commissioned as members of such board makes them de facto members.

4. The acts of de facto members of a board of 15 freeholders chosen to prepare a city charter are valid as to the public and third parties until their right to their seats is judicially passed upon.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Quo warranto by the state, on the relation of Henry N. Hoffman, to determine the status of the board of freeholders elected for the purpose of preparing a charter for the city of San Francisco. From judgment for defendants, after an order sustaining two separate demurrers to the complaint, the state appeals. Modified and remanded.

Robt. Ash, for the State. H. T. Creswell and H. N. Clement (Wm. F. Gibson, of counsel), for respondents.

SEARLS, C. This is a proceeding by quo warranto, brought in the superior court, to determine by what authority the defendants, as individuals or as a board, are acting as a board of 15 freeholders to prepare and propose a charter for the city and county of San Francisco. Two several demurrers were interposed to the complaint; one by and on behalf of William B. Bourn and I. W. Hellman, two of the defendants, and the other by all the defendants. The demurrers and each of them were sustained by the court, and, the relator declining to amend, final judgment went for the defendants, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The complaint, which, for the purposes of this case, is to be taken as true, avers in substance as follows: (1) The city and county of San Francisco is, and at all the times herein mentioned has been, a municipal corporation, duly organized and existing under and by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of California approved April 19, 1856, and the several acts of said legislature amendatory thereof, and supplementary thereto, and contains a population of 300,000 inhabitants. (2) On the 11th day of September, 1894, the properly constituted authorities of said city and county of San Francisco, by due proceedings, ordered that a board of 15 freeholders, who shall have been at least five years qualified electors thereof, should be elected by the qualified voters of said city and county, at the general election on the 6th day of November, 1894, whose duty it should be to prepare and propose, within 90 days after such election, a charter for such city and county, under and by virtue of section 8 of article 11 of the constitution of the state of California. (3) Thereafter, and in due time, 43 persons were regularly nominated as candidates for the said officers of board of freeholders, certificates of such nominations duly filed as required by law, all of whom were believed to possess the qualifications required by law to fill said offices. (4) The names of the persons so nominated were placed upon the ballots as candidates for said office. (5) On the 25th day of October, 1894, a proclamation was duly made, issued, and published by the proper officers, as required by law, that there would be chosen and elected on the 6th day of November, 1894, a board of 15 freeholders. (6) At the general election of November 6, 1894, the said persons so nominated were voted for by the qualified voters of said city and county, each receiving the number of votes mentioned in the complaint. (7) The vote was duly canvassed, and the defendants herein declared duly elected to fill said office. (8) Thereafter defendants, and each of them, received certificates of election, duly qualified, and organized as a board of 15 freeholders, and entered upon the discharge of their duties as such board, and are still so acting, and preparing a charter. (9) The defendants are not now, and never have been, a legally constituted board of 15 freeholders, but have usurped the functions of said board, without authority or right. That no board was chosen by the voters, as required by the election and article of the constitution referred to herein, for the reasons: (a) Defendant I. W. Hellman was ineligible to said office in that he had not been for at least five years a qualified elector of said city and county; that he had been such qualified elector for but three years, and that prior to said three years he had been a resident and elector of the city of Los Angeles, Cal. (b) The defendant W. B. Bourn was ineligible because he had not been for five years a qualified elector of the city and county of San Francisco, as required by the constitution; that he had been an elector but two years, and that prior thereto he was a resident and elector of the county of Napa, Cal. (c) The remaining defendants and members of the board are but 13 in number, and do not constitute a board of 15 freeholders. (d) The above-named 13 defendants are all eligible and qualified to hold the office as members of the board aforesaid, and have accepted the certificates and acknowledged the right of said defendants Bourn and Hellman as members of said board, and are sitting with said Bourn and Hellman as members of said board, and claim that said persons are and constitute a board of 15 freeholders.

The general demurrer of all the defendants is upon the ground "that said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The separate demurrer of Hellman and Bourn is upon the ground that the "said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these defendants, or either of them." Section 8 of article 11 of the constitution of the state of California, as amended, and the ratification thereof declared December 30, 1892, is in part as follows: "Any city containing a population of more than three thousand five hundred inhabitants may frame a charter for its own government, consistent with and subject to the constitution and laws of this state, by causing a board of fifteen freeholders, who shall have been for at least five years qualified electors thereof, to be elected by the qualified voters of said city at any general or special election, whose duty it shall be, within ninety days after such election, to prepare and propose a charter for such city, which shall be signed in duplicate by the members of such board, or a majority of them," etc.

The first question for consideration relates to the eligibility of the defendants I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn as freeholders under the constitutional provision. They had not been for at least five years qualified voters of the city and county in which the election was held, and for which the charter was to be prepared. The language used by the framers of the constitution in relation to the qualification essential to eligibility to the office or position of a freeholder is plain and unequivocal, and the authority to prescribe the qualification is not open to doubt. The reason of the rule is apparent, and need not be stated. The defendants Hellman and Bourn, not having been for at least five years qualified electors of the city and county of San Francisco, were ineligible to the office of freeholder, and their separate demurrer should have been overruled.

2. Do the remaining 13 members who were regularly elected constitute a legal board, with authority to act? The contention of appellant is that in order to constitute a valid board it is essential that 15 qualified members be elected, and that without such number thus qualified there can be no constitutional board, and hence that the 13 members should be inhibited from acting, either with or without the two who are disqualified. We think this position is unwarranted under the language of the constitution, and not in consonance with public policy or the analogies in similar cases. It is true the constitution provides for the election of a board of 15 freeholders; but the persons who are, when elected and qualified, to constitute such board, are elected and must qualify as individuals, and the entity known as the board has no legal existence until it is organized by the individuals who come clothed with the insignia of authority afforded by a certificate or other adequate proof of an election. The electors select the persons who are to constitute the board, but do not create the board. That is done by the organization of the members. When the electors have elected, by a plurality of all the votes cast, 15 members to constitute the board, and furnished them with the evidence of said action, their power in the premises is exhausted, and the requirement of the constitution is so far complied with that it only remains for the persons so selected, or a majority of them, to organize and exercise the power which by virtue of their election is vested in them. An interpretation which holds that the ineligibility or death or unwillingness to act of a single member thus selected invalidates the entire election would work great hardship, and tend to thwart the will of the electors in many instances, and should not be indulged unless rendered imperative by the mandate of the constitution. The same constitution (section 5, art. 11) provides that the legislature, by general and uniform laws, shall provide for the election or appointment in the several counties of "boards of supervisors," etc. Other portions of the constitution provide for a supreme court, "which shall consist of a chief justice and six associate justices." Again, "the senate shall consist of forty members and the assembly of eighty members." It would, we think, hardly be contended that, because the constitution provides for a board of supervisors, an election for supervisors, in which a single member elected was disqualified would either invalidate the election of other members, or prevent their organizing and acting as a board. Like considerations apply to the election of members of the senate and assembly, and to the election, organization, and action of the supreme court. The Code provides that "words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons are construed as giving such authority to a majority of them, unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority." Pol. Code, § 15. The earlier doctrine was that where a board of commissioners was created by the legislature, and discretionary powers conferred upon them to decide upon matters of public interests, and the law had made no provision that a majority should constitute a quorum, all must be present and consult, though a majority might decide. People v. Coghill, 47 Cal. 363, and cases cited. The rule prior to its modification by the Code may be stated thus: The power or authority given to public officers, commissioners, or committeemen was a joint authority to be exercised by all of them, and (except as provided by statute) all must meet and deliberate; but, this done, a majority could decide. To the exercise of this joint authority it was sometimes held, and it would seem logically, that the existence of a full board was necessary. If the authority was, in contemplation of law, to be exercised by all the members, then there should be members capable and competent to its exercise; but under our codes this authority, although joint where given to three or more, is to be "construed as giving such authority to a majority of them," unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority. If a majority possesses all the authority of the whole, then such majority must be competent to its exercise. For all practical purposes, the majority becomes the full board. It is the receptacle—the reservoir—of all the authority conferred upon the whole, and its action, it is submitted, cannot be stayed by the nonaction, failure to qualify, absence, death, or want of eligibility of the minority. These were the very obstacles intended to be surmounted by the statute.

Since the enactment of the Code it was held in People v. Harrington, 63 Cal. 257, that the action of a quorum was the action of the board of supervisors, and that the action of a majority of such quorum, though not constituting a majority of the board, was valid and binding. In State v. Huggins, Harp. 139, court of appeals of South Carolina, the facts were that of 18 managers of elections appointed by the legislature 2 had refused to qualify, 1 was dead, and 1 disqualified to serve, and the court held that a majority, viz. 8 of the remaining 14, properly formed a board to determine on the validity of a contested election; a majority of the managers qualified to serve being all that is required by the legislature. Colcock, J., in the course of his opinion, said: "Now, if necessity and public convenience may require that, where all the managers of these elections are alive, and have qualified, a majority may act, does not the same reason operate to authorize the managers of an election to act where some of those who have been nominated are dead or have not qualified?" Words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers will be construed as giving it to the majority, unless otherwise expressed. Talcott v. Blanding, 54 Cal. 289. If the authority is given to and may be exercised by the majority, and the minority, if present and acting, cannot defeat it, it must follow that such minority cannot, by absence or failure to qualify, defeat the will of the majority. This doctrine was illustrated in City of Oakland v. Carpentier, 13 Cal. 540, where it was argued that, as the charter provided that a board of five trustees should be elected, etc., and as only four qualified, their acts were void for want of a legal organization. The court disposed of the question by saying: "We can see no reason for holding that a majority of the members elected to this board should not as well be held empowered to act at the first as at any subsequent meeting of it." There is nothing inherent in the duties to be discharged by the freeholders to invoke a more strict rule of construction against them than would be called for in the case of other boards or bodies invested with public functions. The provision of the constitution is self-acting. People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612. The constitution does not in terms require the joint action of all the members of the board of freeholders. It does provide that the charter prepared by them must be "signed in duplicate by the members of such board or a majority of them."

Under the doctrine which was formerly upheld by many of the courts, that all the members of a board, committee, or commission must meet and deliberate, though a majority could decide, the contention of appellant in support of the theory that the presence and action of all the members is necessary to an organization may be upheld. The consensus of modern opinion, however, is believed to be that, where a majority may act, such majority may organize and act. This is believed to be the very object of the fifteenth section of the Political Code. Again, the office of freeholder is created by the constitution. It is a de jure office. When Hellman and Bourn were elected by a plurality of the qualified electors, received their certificates of election, and qualified and participated in the action of the board, they were there under color of office, and presumptively entitled to the office. They were de facto officers in the discharge of the duties of a de jure office, and as such their acts while they remained such were as valid and binding as those of de jure officers. There must be a de jure office to be filled, before there can be a de facto officer. If the former exists, and the latter holds it under and pursuant to a regular commission purporting to empower him to act, his acts in such office, until his right thereto is judicially determined, the law holds, upon principles of policy and justice, to be valid, so far as they involve the public and third parties, notwithstanding the personal liability of the incumbent for intruding into such office. A leading case upon the subject of officers de facto is that of State v. Carroll, 38 Conn. 449, in which Butler, C. J., after an exhaustive discussion of the doctrine, and a review of the English and American cases, uses the following language: "A definition sufficiently accurate and comprehensive to cover the whole ground must, I think, be substantially as follows: An officer de facto is one whose acts, though not those of a lawful officer, the law, upon principles of policy and justice, will hold valid, so far as they involve the interests of the public and third persons, where the duties of the office were exercised: First. * * * Second. * * * Third. Under color of a known election or appointment, void because the officer was not eligible, * * * such ineligibility * * * being unknown to the public."

We reach the following conclusion:

1. The 13 freeholders, constituting as they do a majority of all the members of the board, were competent to organize and act as a board of freeholders under the constitution and law, and may lawfully prepare and propose a charter for the city and county of San Francisco.

2. I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn were not eligible to the office of freeholder, and, although regularly elected and commissioned, are not de jure officers of the board.

3. Said Hellman and Bourn, having been elected and commissioned, became de facto members of the board, and as such their acts were and are valid as to the public and third parties.

We are asked by the counsel, in the event of holding that Bourn and Hellman are not entitled to their seats, to indicate: (1) Whether or not Patrick Reddy and J. C. Whiting, who received the next highest number of votes, are entitled to demand and receive certificates of election; and, if not, then (2) how shall the vacancies be filled? The first query seems to be settled in this state. Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 145; Crawford v. Dunbar, 52 Cal. 36. We must, however, decline to pass upon either of the foregoing propositions, for the reason that they are not involved in the issues presented in the case, and anything which might be said would be mere obiter dictum, and of no binding force should the same questions again arise.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed as to all the defendants except I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn, and reversed as to said two last-named defendants, with directions to the court below to overrule the separate demurrer of said I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn, with leave to answer.

I concur: HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed as to all the defendants except I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn, and reversed as to said two last-named defendants, with directions to the court below to overrule the separate demurrer of said I. W. Hellman and William B. Bourn, with leave to answer.

PEOPLE v. WARD. (No. 21,094.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—EXAMINATION OF JURORS—HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSANITY AS A DEFENSE.

1. Where an attorney, appointed for the defense on the day the trial occurred, made application for a continuance, to become better acquainted with the case, but did not accompany the application with a verified statement, a denial by the court was proper.

2. Counsel appointed for defense on the day of trial, who knew that defendant had been examined on the claim of insanity, but not that the cause was alleged to be excessive drinking, being denied a continuance, proceeded to the examination of, and accepted, six jurors, not having examined them as to their views on the plea of insanity caused by excessive drinking as a defense, and the court then adjourned for four days. After the resumption of the trial, he failed to show cause, or call to the attention of the court his desire, to further question or challenge the six jurors. Held, that his action was a waiver of defendant's right so to do.

3. Evidence by a police officer, witness for the prosecution, in a trial for murder, that he telephoned "to have the harbor police arrest any of the race-track boys that tried to cross the ferry, particularly Richard Ward" (defendant), not being an expression of opinion by witness that defendant is guilty, is competent.

4. The record in an examination on a plea of insanity in a trial for murder, being evidence of defendant's mental condition at the time of examination, is not admissible to prove his mental condition on the date of the killing.

5. Where circumstantial evidence is relied upon to establish guilt, it should be sufficient to exclude, not every other hypothesis, but every other rational hypothesis, than guilt.

6. An instruction asked, containing the words, "that the evidence against defendant is purely and wholly circumstantial," when in fact it is not, is properly denied.

7. Defendant is presumed to be sane until he, by a preponderance of evidence, establishes affirmatively his insanity.

8. The doctrine of reasonable doubt has no application to the determination of an issue of the sanity of the accused, in criminal cases.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William R. Dangerfield, Judge.

Richard Ward, convicted of murder, appeals. Affirmed.

Augustus Tilden, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was informed against upon a charge of the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed at the city and county of San Francisco. Upon his plea of not guilty, a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, with punishment fixed by the jury at imprisonment for life. The appeal is from judgment upon such verdict, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The cause was called for trial in the superior court on the 2d day of November, 1893, when Augustus Tilden, Esq., counsel for defendant, asked for a continuance upon the ground that he had recently come into the case as the attorney of defendant, and desired time to familiarize himself with the facts. It thereupon appeared that the cause had been continued repeatedly for some three months; that, upon a suggestion of the insanity of the defendant, a jury had been impaneled, and a trial had, which resulted in a verdict that defendant was sane. Thereupon, and on the 1st day of November, 1893, James Smith, Esq., who had acted as attorney for defendant, retired from the case; and on the following day, to wit, November 2, 1893, said Augustus Tilden, Esq., was by the court appointed attorney for defendant. The motion for a continuance was not supported by an affidavit, or other written evidence, so far as appears. The motion for a continuance was denied; the court remarking, in substance, that the matter of impanelment of a jury needed no long preparation. After six jurors had been examined and accepted, the panel being exhausted, additional jurors were ordered summoned; and the cause was continued for four days, when the jury was completed, and a further postponement, of one day, was had. The refusal of the court to grant the continuance, as prayed for, is assigned as error. In view of the fact that no statement upon which the continuance was asked was verified, it cannot be said that there was any abuse of that broad discretion which is lodged in trial courts, in refusing a continuance before the jury was impaneled. Practically, defendant's counsel had a continuance of five days, within which to prepare for the trial of the cause upon its merits. This was sufficient to remove the question from the realm of doubt, did any exist, as to the propriety of the action of the court.

The contention that the plea of defendant was insanity arising from the excessive use of intoxicating drinks; that his counsel examined and accepted the first six jurors, after questioning them as to their views of the plea of insanity in general, and only discovered that the claim of insanity upon the part of the defendant was based upon the foundation of drunkenness, after the examination of said jurors,—cannot prevail. The record shows that counsel for defendant was aware of the particular phase or alleged cause of defendant's claim of insanity at the time of the killing, at the resumption of the trial after the adjournment of four days; and assuming, without legal proof, that he previously knew of the claim of insanity, but not its cause, the fact yet remains that he did not ask, or in any way evince a desire, to further examine the six jurors, which indicates pretty clearly that the matter was not at the time regarded as important. In civil cases it has been held that a juror may, for cause, be excused by the court after having been once accepted. Grady v. Early, 18 Cal. 109; Lawlor v. Linforth, 72 Cal. 205, 13 Pac. 496. In criminal cases, challenges, whether peremptory or for cause, "must be taken when the juror appears, and before he is sworn to try the cause, but the court may for cause permit it to be taken after the juror is sworn, and before the jury is completed." Pen. Code, § 1068. The authority of the court to permit a challenge to a juror in a criminal case, after he is sworn, has been upheld. People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 676. Failing to show cause, or call to the attention of the court his desire, to further question or to challenge the six jurors already accepted, was, under the circumstances, a waiver on behalf of defendant of his right so to do.

It is further urged that the court erred in permitting John A. Maloney, a police officer, and one of the officers who arrested defendant, to testify, on behalf of the prosecution, that he telephoned "to have the harbor police arrest any of the race-track boys that tried to cross the ferry, particularly Richard Ward." The objection to this testimony is that it "amounted to an expression of an opinion by the witness that Ward was guilty." If the theory of counsel is correct, then testimony of an officer that he arrested one charged with crime would show the formation and expression of an opinion as to his guilt, and subject to a like objection. To direct the arrest of a man is, or may be, as much an act as the actual arrest, and how either can be fairly viewed as an expression of opinion is not readily perceived. The testimony in question was a part of the narrative of the arresting officer as to the steps taken by him to arrest the defendant, and, while it was of no importance, except to make a connected whole in a statement by the officer, it could not have injured the defendant.

It is also urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct during the trial, prejudicial to defendant. This alleged misconduct consisted (1) in asking defendant, on cross-examination, when a witness in his own behalf, if he had been in the prize ring; and (2) in offering in evidence, in rebuttal, the record of an investigation as to the sanity of defendant, and the verdict of the jury pronouncing him sane. The testimony was, in the last case, ruled out by the court, and in the former was withdrawn by the district attorney, upon objection by defendant, and upon suggestion by the court that it was not proper cross-examination. In this conduct, no element of misconduct or oppression is perceived. Defendant had testified in chief that on the evening of the homicide he and the deceased "had met in Ritter's saloon; had a friendly boxing match. I hit Kelly [the deceased], in the nose and he took off his gloves." He then described meeting Kelly, later, at the race-track stable where they slept, and that Kelly there hit him, and tried to hit him, and he (the defendant) ran out in the alley, etc. The prosecution had introduced evidence tending to show that, at this very place and time, defendant had beat Kelly to death with a pitchfork. Under such circumstances, it was quite natural for the district attorney to desire to show that defendant had been a prize fighter, as tending to show skill in self-defense against such an attack as he claimed had been made upon him, and hence that there was no need of his resorting to the use of a deadly weapon. Concede that it was not admissible evidence, and still the circumstances divest the offer of apparent evil motive. Like considerations apply to the offer of the record upon the trial of the question of the insanity of defendant. Evidence had been taken at the trial tending to show that at the time of the homicide, and for some time prior thereto, defendant had been an habitual drunkard, and that his mind had been impaired thereby so as to render him irresponsible. The proceeding touching his sanity, evidenced by the proffered record, related to the time when such proceeding was had, and not to the date of the homicide, and was taken under Pen. Code, §§ 1367-1369, to determine whether or not defendant was in such mental condition as to warrant his trial on his plea of not guilty. The record was evidence of defendant's mental condition at the date when it was made, but not at the date of the killing, and hence was not admissible.

There seems a disposition on the part of counsel for defendants, in all criminal cases, since the decision in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078, to count upon the alleged misconduct of the prosecution as cause for reversal. That was an extreme case, in which this court was of opinion the assistant district attorney had willfully and persistently offered incompetent evidence, to the prejudice of defendant, well knowing its inadmissibility. The animus of the prosecution there was so apparent, and its effect so pronounced, that the court deemed it but just to stamp with the seal of its disapprobation, not only for that case, but as a warning against like conduct in other cases,—a course of proceeding militating against justice, and the fair and orderly conduct which should characterize judicial proceedings in criminal cases. It is only in extreme cases, of which this is not one, that the remedy there administered applies. The attack in that case was not upon error by the prosecution, but upon willful error, persisted in for an illegitimate purpose, followed by injustice to the prisoner.

The following instruction, asked by defendant, was refused, and such refusal is assigned as error: "I also instruct you that the evidence against defendant is purely and wholly circumstantial. Such evidence must exclude every other hypothesis than the guilt of defendant; otherwise, it is insufficient to convict. Therefore, in summing up the evidence, if you can find any explanation of the homicide, inconsistent with defendant's guilt, you must acquit." The instruction is marked: "Refused. Rational hypothesis. W. R. D., Judge." From the note of the judge, it may be inferred that the refusal to give the instruction was because the word "rational" did not precede the word "hypothesis." Where circumstantial evidence is relied upon to establish guilt, it should be sufficient to exclude, not every other hypothesis, but every other rational hypothesis, than guilt. An hypothesis is a supposition,—a proposition or principle which is supposed or taken for granted, in order to draw a conclusion or inference for proof of the point in question. Something not proved, but assumed for the purpose of argument, or to account for a fact or an occurrence. Webst. Dict. "An hypothesis being a mere supposition, there are no other limits to hypotheses than those of the human imagination." Mill. In law, the meaning of the word does not vary from its usual significance. Black, Law Dict. See People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 202; People v. Hardisson, 61 Cal. 378; People v. Eckman, 72 Cal. 582, 14 Pac. 359; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 430, 24 Pac. 1006. There is another reason why the instruction was properly refused. It informed the jury "that the evidence against defendant is purely and wholly circumstantial." Such was not the fact. The prosecution, after proving the death of John Kelly, that he was known as "Red Kelly," that defendant and Kelly were together, and that the witness heard blows and exclamations, called as a witness Albert Ivey, who met defendant just after the supposed killing, when the latter said, "I have done that damned red son of a bitch." The witness then said: "He said he referred to John Kelly, known as 'Red' at the race track. I asked him if he had killed him, and he replied, 'I don't know if he is dead, but I stuck this pitchfork in him.'" There was more testimony of like character, which, clearly, was not circumstantial, but direct, evidence.

The defendant having introduced evidence tending to show that he was insane at the time of the killing, the court, having instructed the jury in relation thereto, proceeded to instruct as follows: "(12) In the matter of insanity, the doctrine of reasonable doubt does not apply. That is to say, gentlemen, the burden of proof of insanity is not on the people of the state of California, as it is with the other issues in this case, but it is on the defendant, to show by a preponderance of evidence that he was insane at the time of the alleged homicide. If you believe that the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the people, you must decide for the people on that issue; and, if you believe that the preponderance of evidence is in favor of the defendant, you must decide for the defendant on that issue." The contention of appellant is that the doctrine of reasonable doubt applies to the question of insanity, and hence that the instruction was erroneous. We need not stop to discuss the question here, as it has been foreclosed against the contention of appellant by the previous rulings of this court. See People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 597, and 29 Pac. 61; People v. Travers, 88 Cal. 233, 26 Pac. 88;

People v. Eubanks, 86 Cal. 295, 24 Pac. 1014; People v. Kernaghan, 72 Cal. 609, 14 Pac. 566; People v. Messersmith, 61 Cal. 246; People v. Wilson, 49 Cal. 13; People v. McDonell, 47 Cal. 134; People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 231; People v. Meyers, 20 Cal. 518. The doctrine of these cases is that in criminal cases the defendant is presumed to be sane until the contrary is made to appear, and his insanity, if relied upon as a defense, must be established affirmatively, by a preponderance of proof, as in civil cases; and, this being so, the question of reasonable doubt, either in favor of or against the defendant, as to his sanity or insanity, has no application to such issue. The instruction upon the question of reasonable doubt, upon the whole case, was full and complete, and in substantially the language of Shaw, C. J., in Com. v. Webster, 5 Cush. 320. The court, in instructing the jury upon the subject of insanity, informed them "that the doctrine that in some forms of insanity the patient or sufferer knows the nature of his act fully, but at the same time cannot prevent it, through paralysis of the will power," and which is known as "uncontrollable impulse," has no legal standing in this state, etc. The instructions on the subject of insanity, taken together, are in consonance with the doctrine enunciated in People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, and are not objectionable.

The modifications of defendant's instructions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, were merely verbal, and in no sense added to or detracted from the principles involved in them, as asked.

A careful study of the whole case leads to the conclusion that the defendant was fairly tried, and properly convicted. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

GRAND GROVE OF UNITED ANCIENT ORDER OF DRUIDS OF CALIFORNIA v. GARIBALDI GROVE, NO. 71, OF UNITED ANCIENT ORDER OF DRUIDS et al. (No. 15,529.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)
BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES—SUSPENSION OF SUBORDINATE BRANCH—APPEAL.

1. The constitution of a benevolent association provides that the grand grove may suspend any subordinate grove "for good cause shown"; that charges may be preferred in writing to the grand grove, and a copy thereof and a notice of hearing thereon furnished the grove complained of; and that a certain officer may, during a recess of the grand grove, "whenever he shall deem it necessary," suspend an offending grove, "such suspension to hold good until annulled by the grand grove." Held, that such officer cannot suspend a grove unless written charges have been preferred against it, and, together with a notice of hearing thereon, served upon it.

2. Where a benevolent association's constitution provides that a certain officer may, during a recess of the grand grove, "whenever he shall deem it necessary," suspend an offending grove, when a grove has been suspended by said officer, without the notice required, the court's finding, in a subsequent action by the association to recover the suspended grove's effects, that the defendant was in fact an offending grove, does not validate the illegal suspension.

3. Where the court refused to permit a complaint in intervention to be filed, and the defendant excepted thereto, but the proposed interveners did not appeal, the ruling is not open to review.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Grand Grove of the United Ancient Order of Druids of California against the Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, of the United Ancient Order of Druids, C. Duchain, and others, to recover certain funds. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant C. Duchain appeals. Reversed.

E. C. Chapman, G. H. Perry, and W. C. Burnett, for appellant. A. B. Hunt, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff is the supreme tribunal of Druidism in California, and the defendant Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, is a subordinate grove of Druids, of which the appellant, Duchain, is the treasurer. The relation between the plaintiff and the subordinate grove is established by the constitution and by-laws of the order, by virtue of which the grand grove is given "sole right and full power to grant charters to subordinate groves, to receive appeals and redress grievances, and, in its discretion, for good cause shown, to suspend groves, arrest charters," etc. By section 15 it is provided that when any subordinate grove shall violate the terms of its charter, or refuse or neglect to obey the direction and laws of the grand grove or the general laws of the order, charges thereof may be preferred in writing to the grand grove, and that a copy thereof shall be furnished to the grove complained of, and notice when and where to appear for trial. The grand grove holds an annual session on the third Tuesday of June in each year, and it is provided in section 9 of article 20 that, "during the recess of the grand grove, the noble grand arch may, whenever he shall deem it necessary, suspend a delinquent or offending grove, such suspension to hold good until annulled by the grand grove." On the 5th of September, 1892, the noble grand arch of the plaintiff suspended Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, for the reason that he considered it was an "offending grove," and issued a proclamation of this fact to the other subordinate groves within the state. Article 19 of the rules of the order provides that the trustees shall be the custodians of the property of the grand grove, and that "it shall be their duty to execute all orders of the noble grand arch, to receive, by legal process or otherwise, all moneys, papers, and other property of dissolved or suspended groves in this jurisdiction," etc. In December, 1892, the noble grand arch reported this suspension to the trustees of the plaintiff, and directed them to commence the present action for the possession of the books and records of the suspended grove, and for the moneys belonging to it. The court found that the appellant, Duchain, as treasurer of Garibaldi Grove, had in his possession $954.15, moneys belonging to said grove, which he refused to deliver upon the demand of the trustees therefor, and rendered judgment directing him to pay the said money to the plaintiff herein, or to its trustees. From this judgment and an order denying a new trial Duchain has appealed.

The articles of association, or the constitution and by-laws of a benevolent or social organization, are in the nature of the terms of contract which the members thereof have entered into, and for the violation of any of these terms the articles themselves ordinarily provide a penalty and the mode of its enforcement, as well as a tribunal which shall determine whether the penalty has been incurred. But, as the payment of money or the delivery of property cannot be enforced by the machinery of these organizations, the aid of the judicial tribunals of the state is required. In order, however, to invoke this aid, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show a right in itself to the money or property sought, and that the defendant is under an obligation to comply with its demand therefor. The appellant, as the treasurer of Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, came lawfully into the custody of the money sued for, and, as against the plaintiff, is entitled to retain such custody, unless it can be shown that, by reason of some provision in the rules of the order, he is under an obligation to deliver it to the plaintiff. The only provision of these rules by which it is claimed that such obligation has been shown is the authority given to the noble grand arch to suspend the grove, and the proceedings taken by him under the authority so conferred.

It is a principle of natural justice that no one shall be condemned without an opportunity to be heard in his defense. Whoever would claim the right to deprive another of property or privilege, without giving him an opportunity to defend the same, must show some consent on his part to such action. It is well settled that a member of a benevolent association cannot be expelled without being given a hearing, and that a by-law which authorizes such a course is unreasonable and without effect (Fritz v. Muck, 62 How. Pr. 69; Wachtel v. Society, 84 N. Y. 28; People v. Musical Mutual Protective Union 118 N. Y. 108, 23 N. E. 129; Bac. Ben. Soc. § 101); and the same rules are applicable whether the action of the body is an absolute severing of the relations, or a suspension by which the rights of the suspended party are destroyed or impaired. There is no distinction in principle between expelling a member from a subordinate grove and revoking the charter of the grove itself or suspending its charter. It appears from the record herein that the suspension of Garibaldi Grove was made without any written charges having been preferred against it, and that there was given to it no notice of any complaint, or any opportunity to be heard thereon. The noble grand arch testified at the trial that, "from reports conveyed to him by individual members of the order, he considered it an offending grove, and accordingly suspended it. He did not serve or cause to be served any notice upon it; nor was there any notice of any kind given of his intention to suspend the grove; neither was there any trial had. He simply issued the proclamation, based upon what he had heard about the grove." It is claimed by the respondent that section 9, aforesaid, of article 20, gave this officer authority in his discretion to suspend an offending grove during the recess of the grand grove, without giving any notice of his purpose. We are of the opinion, however, that the rules of the plaintiff do not authorize an arbitrary suspension of a subordinate grove by him; but that, whenever he proposes to take such action, the grove which is charged with an offense for which he is authorized to suspend it has the right to be informed of such charge, and to be heard in its defense before he can act under this section. The limitation upon the power of the grand grove to itself suspend a subordinate grove "for good cause shown" implies that formal charges must be presented and sustained; and the provision in section 15 that, when charges are made against a subordinate grove, a copy of the charges shall be furnished to it, and an opportunity given to be heard, show that the general principles under which a suspension may be had require such notice and hearing. The power of suspension which is conferred upon the noble grand arch is to be exercised by him only during the recess of the grand grove, and, in the absence of express terms, ought not to be construed as greater than that of the grand grove itself, or to be exercised in any other mode than that provided for the grand grove. The authority given to this officer is not limited to a suspension until the next session of the grand grove, but holds good "until annulled" by the grand grove. This provision indicates that it is to have the same effect as if the suspension had been made by the grand grove; since, unless some action in the nature of an appeal is taken from the act of the noble grand arch, the grand grove is never required to exercise its will upon the subject.

The finding of the court that Garibaldi Grove was in reality an offending grove, and that there was sufficient ground for its suspension, does not remedy the defect. The jurisdiction to determine this fact was by the rules of the order conferred upon the noble grand arch, and, as his determination of that fact under those rules could not be reviewed by the court, neither could his suspension of a grove in violation of the rules be validated by any judgment of the court. We hold, therefore, that the action of the noble grand arch in suspending Garibaldi Grove, No. 71, was not in accordance with the rules of the order; and consequently, as the grove was not properly suspended, there was no obligation upon Duchain to pay to the plaintiff the money which he had in his hands as treasurer of the subordinate grove.

At the trial the court was asked to permit a complaint in intervention to be filed on behalf of certain members of the Garibaldi Grove, including Duchain. Objection being made thereto, the court sustained the objection, to which Duchain excepted. No exception appears to have been taken by the interveners, and, as they have not appeared, the correctness of the ruling is not open to review.

The judgment and order are reversed.

ROBERTS v. BALL et al. (No. 15,622.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Failure to find on certain issues raised by the pleadings, and making findings outside the issues, is harmless error, where the findings made on material issues warrant the judgment whatever the findings on the other issues.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by W. G. Roberts against A. E. Ball, administrator, and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Maxwell, Dorsey & Soto, for appellant. H. I. Kowalsky, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This appeal by the plaintiff is from the final judgment upon the naked judgment roll, which contains no bill of exceptions; and the only error assigned is that the court did not find on all the issues of fact raised by the pleadings. After a careful examination of the voluminous pleadings and findings, we think the court substantially found upon every material issue, except upon that raised by defendants' plea of the statute of limitations. But, even if the court had expressly found in favor of the plaintiff upon this issue and all others upon which he contends there should have been findings, still the facts actually found would have been controlling, and amply sufficient to uphold the judgment. In other words, the facts expressly found support the judgment, and are entirely consistent with all averments in the complaint not negatived by an express finding, and also consistent with a finding in favor of plaintiff upon any issue tendered by the answer upon which there is no express finding. If, as contended by counsel, some of the findings are outside of the issues, this is immaterial, since the judgment finds ample support by findings upon the material issues. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Dolliver v. Dolliver, 94 Cal. 642, 30 Pac. 4. Upon the authority of these cases, the judgment is affirmed.

In re SMITH'S ESTATE. (No. 15,754.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 26, 1894.)

RECORD ON APPEAL—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—DISPOSAL BY WILL—ACCEPTANCE BY WIFE.

1. Where, on appeal, there is neither a bill of exceptions nor a statement of the evidence, the findings of fact will be accepted as true.

2. A will of a married man, in terms disposing of all the community property, which states that it "is made with full knowledge of property rights of husband and wife, and with the knowledge and consent of my said wife," indicates the intention of testator to dispose of all his property, including the interest of his wife.

3. Where a will shows that testator meant to dispose of community property, the conveyance by testator's widow of a life estate devised by the will operates as an acceptance by her of the provisions thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; James F. Breen, Judge.

Accounting by Robert Cardiff as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Robert Smith. From the decree made, the administrator and Mary Smith, widow of testator, appeal. Affirmed.

Briggs & Hudner, for appellants. Montgomery & Jefferson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Robert Smith, who died April 31, 1892, disposed of all his property by his last will as follows: "I give and bequeath to my daughter, Mrs. Mary Cardiff, now of San Benito county, California, a life estate in my home ranch in San Benito county, California, the same being described as follows, to wit, being the southwest quarter of section 6, township 15 south, range 7 east, M. D. M.; also all live stock, farming utensils, household furniture, and in fact all personal property that may be on the said ranch, excepting money on hand, securities, and other evidences of money due me; to have and hold and use during her natural life as her own, and at her death to pass in fee to her sons, Robert Cardiff and Geo. H. Cardiff, and to their heirs in fee simple. But, in the event I survive my said daughter, Mary Cardiff, then, at my death, said property to pass directly to her said sons, Robert and George Cardiff. This bequest, however, is not to take effect during the lifetime of my wife, Mary Smith, who is now residing with me on the above-described property. In the event she survives me, she is to have full and free use and absolute control of said real property and personal herein referred to, and after her death to pass as above provided. This is made with full knowledge of property rights of husband and wife, and with the knowledge and 'consent of my said wife.'" The will further bequeathed one dollar to each of four grandchildren of the testator, and the residue of testator's personal property, consisting of money and securities, as follows: To his son William R. Smith, four-tenths thereof; to his son John A. Smith, three-tenths thereof; and to his daughter Jessie Smith, three-tenths thereof. The will nominated said William R. and John A. joint executors thereof, and on May 2, 1892, they were duly appointed as such by the probate court. Both qualified and entered upon the performance of the duties of the trust, but both died before the settlement of their final account,—John A., October 19, 1892, and William R., June 25, 1893, though the latter had filed an account which purported to be a final account, on June 1, 1893. On July 22, 1893, Robert Cardiff, son of Mary Cardiff, and grandson of the testator, was appointed administrator with the will annexed, who, on December 18, 1893, filed his final account, and his petition representing that the estate was in condition to be closed, and praying that his final account be allowed, and that the estate be distributed. While the matter of settling the final account of the administrator was pending, to wit, January 31, 1894, Mary Smith, widow of the testator, filed in the probate court her written claim and notice that all the property of which the testator died seised or possessed was community property, and that she claimed one-half thereof as not subject to testamentary disposition by her late husband. The widow of John A. Smith, as executrix of his estate and as heir of her husband, filed written objections to the final account of the administrator, and also objections to the claim of Mary Smith to one-half of the estate of the testator, alleging that Mary Smith had elected to take under the will, etc. The court, after settling the final account of the administrator, found that all the property of the testator was community property of husband and wife, but that the wife of the testator (Mary Smith) had elected to take under the will, and that she had so taken, and had sold, conveyed, and released to Robert Cardiff and George H. Cardiff, her grandsons, who were also rever-sionary devisees of all the estate devised and bequeathed to their mother (Mary Cardiff) and to their grandmother (Mary Smith) during their lives; and thereupon the court decreed that the whole estate be distributed in strict accordance with the will. The administrator, Robert Cardiff, and Mary Smith, widow of the testator, appeal from the order settling the administrator's final account, and also from the decree of distribution.

The appeals come here on the judgment roll, consisting of the final account as rendered by the administrator, the petition of the administrator for the allowance of his account and for distribution of the estate, the written objections to the account, the written notice of Mary Smith that she claimed one-half of the entire estate, the written findings of the court, the order of the court settling the administrator's final account, and the decree of distribution. Estate of Isaacs, 30 Cal. 106; Estate of Page, 57 Cal. 240; Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 Pac. 345, 639. There is no bill of exceptions, nor any statement of evidences, though it appears that the findings of fact are based upon evidence produced by the parties. Therefore the findings of fact, at least so far as they are self-consistent, must be accepted as true. The appellants contend that the court erred in distributing the property according to the will of Robert Smith to the prejudice of the right of appellant Mary Smith to one-half of all the property, real and personal, described in the will. In support of this point they claim that the language of the will does not sufficiently evince an intention of the testator to devise more than his own half of the community property to overcome the presumption to the contrary as held in the cases, In re Gilmore, 81 Cal. 240, 22 Pac. 655; In re Gwin's Estate, 77 Cal. 313, 19 Pac. 527; and Estate of Silvey, 42 Cal. 210. But I think this is a mistake, and that the language of the will clearly indicates the intention of the testator to dispose of all the property therein described, including the interest of his wife. On the construction given it by appellants, no single provision of the will as expressed can be executed without disturbing and partly defeating all others. Besides, it is expressly stated that the will "is made with full knowledge of property rights of husband and wife, and with the knowledge and consent of my said wife." This indicates very clearly that he actually knew what he is presumed to have known, namely, the law governing the rights of husband and wife as to community property; and that he intended to dispose of her interest in the property in a way which would not be valid without her consent. And, conceding that this would not be competent evidence of her consent, it is nevertheless competent and satisfactory evidence of his intention specifically to dispose of each parcel of property described in the will.

It is contended, however, that the widow never elected to take, and never did take, under the will. But, as above shown, the findings of the court below are conclusive upon these points. As to her election, that court found the "naked ultimate fact "that said

Mary Smith, widow of said Robert Smith, has elected to take under said will"; and also the probative fact that after the death of her husband, and prior to January, 1894, she said to Robert Cardiff that "she wished the will to stand." As to the actual taking of the property under the will the court found: "That since the death of said Robert Smith said Mary Smith, his widow, conveyed all her interest in said property, mentioned in said will as vesting a life estate therein upon said widow, to Robert and George Cardiff.

* * * She has remained in possession of said real property, and said personal property upon and about said real property, being the property described in the will as bequeathed to her a life estate, until the year 1893, when she conveyed all her interest therein as hereinbefore stated." It should be observed here that Mary Cardiff, to whom was devised the second life estate in the land and personal property thereon, died after the death of the testator, so that her life estate never vested; and therefore, the effect of the conveyance or release of the life estate of Mary Smith to Robert and George Cardiff, the reversioners in fee, was to invest them with the absolute title to all the land and personal property thereon under the will. But if the will is not valid as to the widow's half of that property, then her life estate and the reversion to Robert and George Cardiff were restricted to the testator's half of the land and personal property thereon. Another effect of restricting the will to the testator's half of the property would be to deprive William R., John A., and Jessie Smith of one-half of the specific legacies bequeathed to them. I think the findings of fact bring this case under the rule announced in the case of Morrison v. Bowman, 29 Cal. 347, affirmed in Noe v. Splivalo, 54 Cal. 207. In the former of these cases Mr. Justice Curry, after reviewing the authorities, stated the rule as follows: "A testamentary provision in lieu of a devisee's or legatee's proprietary right, in order to render it such upon acceptance of it, must be declared in terms to be given in lieu of such right; or that intention must be deduced by clear and manifest implication from the will, founded upon the fact that the claim to such proprietary right would be inconsistent with the will, or so repugnant to its dispositions as to disturb and defeat them. * * * The intention of the testator must be kept in view as the pole star in the construction or interpretation of his will; and it is not to be presumed, in the absence of a manifest intent on his part, that he designed to make disposition of any property not his own. But when it does so appear, and the owner of such property accepts a legacy or devise under the will, which acceptance necessarily operates to give effect to the will as an entire disposition by the testator, such acceptance must, by the conditions on which it is founded, be held to be a confirmation of the dispositions of the will." None of the cases cited by appellant conflict with that of Morrison v. Bowman. I think the order settling the administrator's final account and the decree of distribution should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order settling the administrator's final account and the decree of distribution are affirmed.

COCHRANE et al. v. BURTON et al. (No. 19,513.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1895.)

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND—PROPRIETY OF CONFIRMATION—FINDINGS AS TO MARKET VALUE.

1. Where a sale of land to pay a decedent's debts is legally made, and the amount bid is not disproportionate to its value, and no increased offer for the land is made after the sale, and there is no prospect of securing a better offer if a new sale be ordered, the sale is properly confirmed.

2. A finding by the court, on a motion to confirm a sale of land to pay a decedent's debts, that, but for the fact that the heirs circulated a report that the purchaser at the sale would not acquire a good title, the market value of the land would have been a certain sum (which was much more than the amount realized), is not a finding that such sum was the market value of the land.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. Pierce, Judge.

Proceeding by Henry H. Burton, as administrator of the estate of Henry S. Burton, to sell decedent's lands for the payment of debts. From an order confirming the sale, Elizabeth Lull Cochrane and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Nougues, W. T. McNealy, and Haines & Ward, for appellants. McDonald & McDonald, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of San Diego county, made and entered on the 22d day of March, 1894, confirming the sale of the Rancho Jamul, made by the respondent Henry H. Burton, as administrator of the estate of Henry S. Burton, deceased, to the respondent J. Wade McDonald, on the 24th day of February, 1894. The objections to the confirmation of the sale were made by the heirs of the deceased, and they now prosecute this appeal. For a reversal of the judgment they rely upon the claim that the sum bid, and for which the sale was made and confirmed, was disproportionate to the value of the land sold. Upon the hearing of the application for confirmation, and the objections thereto, the court took testimony and made findings of fact to the following effect: (1) That after due notice given said property was sold at public auction at the courthouse door, in the city of San Diego, for the sum of $38,000. (2) That said sale was in all respects fairly and legally conducted and made, and that said sum bid was not disproportionate to the value of the property. (3) That no sum exceeding such bid 10 per cent, or exceeding said bid in any sum or amount whatsoever, can be obtained if a new sale was had, and no offer of any kind in excess of the aforesaid bid has been made to the court. (4) "That prior to said sale, and at the time thereof, the said objectors to the confirmation of said sale had by the commencement of certain litigation in respect of said property and the previous orders of this court with reference thereto, and which litigation is still pending and undetermined, and by public threats of further litigation, and notification publicly made at the time and place of said sale that any purchaser of said land at the same time would 'purchase a lawsuit,' and other declarations of like character and effect, created such a feeling of distrust and uncertainty as to the title that any purchaser of said property at said sale should or might acquire thereto by virtue of said sale and the confirmation thereof by this court, and the execution and delivery of an administrator's deed for said property, that the said sum of $38,000 so bid by the said J. Wade McDonald therefor was and is the full market value of said property, although but for such feeling of doubt and uncertainty, so created by said objectors, the market value of said property would then and there have been the sum of $80,000, or thereabouts, as claimed by said objectors." In the face of these findings, the judgment must be affirmed, for every element of a probate sale necessary to make it binding and legal is present in this case. We see no course that the trial court could have pursued other than the one taken. The debts of the estate must be paid, and there does not appear, either by the record or by appellants' briefs, to be even a prospect of securing a more advantageous offer if a new sale were ordered. The sale was legally made. It was a public sale. The amount bid was not disproportionate to the value of the property. No increased offer was subsequently made to the court prior to confirmation, and it was the full market value of the property. Upon such a state of facts there was but one thing for the court to do, and that was to confirm the sale. In finding 4 the court declares that if it had not been for certain things the market value of the property would have been $80,000. This finding is in no sense a statement that the market value was at the time of the sale $80,000. It is no finding of value at all. The court may as well have said that if the tract was highly cultivated its market value would be $80,000, or, if land in San Diego county was selling at the boom prices of a few years ago, the market value of this property would be $80,000. The reasons for the depreciation in the market value, or for the present market value, in no way control a court in its judgment as to whether or not a sale should be made. The reasons for the present market value are alike immaterial, whether they be good or bad. It is the fact with which the administrator and the court had to deal, and the reasons for the existence of the fact were matters of minor importance, and hardly incidental to the investigation going on. In conclusion it is sufficient to say that this finding of a conditional fact is not equivalent to a statement of the present value of the land, and the present value of the land is the important and controlling element of the case. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed:

MORROW et al. v. NORTON et al. (No. 15,530.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1894.)

ASSUMPSIT—PLEADING—LIMITATIONS.

1. The fact that the complaint, in an action by an assignee of an account for goods sold against copartners, after alleging the incurring of the liability by defendants, also alleges that one of the defendants promised to pay the same, does not render it demurrable, as the latter allegation may be treated as surplusage.

2. In an action on a contract, required by the statute of frauds to be in writing, the complaint need not allege that it was in writing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by George S. Morrow and others against W. H. Norton and another. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Norton appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Wall, for appellant. Warren Olney, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. We deem this appeal frivolous. Judgment was for the plaintiffs in the court below, and the defendant Norton appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The only point made against the judgment is that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained for want of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. There is nothing in the point. The complaint counts on two several promissory notes made by the firm of McBride & Pease to plaintiffs, and an account for merchandise sold and delivered by a third party to defendants and assigned to plaintiffs. These several obligations are set up in separate counts, each complete in itself, setting forth that at the time of incurring them defendants were carrying on and conducting a livery stable business as partners under the name of McBride & Pease, and that the notes were made and the account incurred by defendants as such partners, and that they have not been paid. It is then further alleged that since the making of the notes and the account defendant Norton has promised to pay them. It is urged that the original obligations of McBride & Pease and the separate promise of Norton cannot both be counted on in the same action. But the point does not arise under the demurrer. The complaint states a cause of action against the defendants jointly, and the allegation of the independent promise of Norton might be disregarded as surplusage, and yet leave the complaint sufficient. It is further urged that the separate promise of Norton was one which, under the law, must be in writing, and it is not so averred. Assuming this to be true, the failure to so allege does not make the complaint demurrable. Where a contract is alleged which, under the law, is required to be in writing, and the complaint is silent as to the manner in which it was made, the implication is that it was made in the manner required. Barnard v. Lloyd, 85 Cal. 131, 24 Pac. 658.

2. The second and only other point made is that the evidence does not sustain the finding that the defendants were partners. We have examined the evidence, and it is sufficient to say that, while somewhat conflicting, we think it amply sufficient to warrant the finding in question, and the judgment cannot, therefore, be disturbed. We think the character of the record in this case should not pass unnoticed. The statement on motion for new trial covers about 150 pages of the transcript. It is plainly nothing more nor less than a copy of the shorthand reporter's notes of the trial, with a head and tail attached. It is replete with all the unnecessary repetition and irrelevant side-bar matter which so readily and almost unavoidably finds its way into the record at the trial in the lower court under our present system of verbatim stenographic reporting. Nothing in the way of unnecessary matter seems to have been eliminated, or even permitted to escape. There is not a pretense, from beginning to end, of stating anything in narrative form. Everything is by question and answer, just as it came from the reporter, apparently. This is inexcusable. In order to pass intelligently upon the objection made to the findings, we have been compelled to wade through this whole mass of 150 pages of matter, good, bad, and indifferent, while all that is relevant and material to appellant's case, as presented here, could have been fully, and much more advantageously for him as well as the court, stated in not to exceed 20 pages. The proper method of preparing statements and bills of exceptions is so clearly indicated in the statute, and has so often been adverted to and pointed out by this court, that it need not be restated here. It is enough to say that this statement not only wholly fails to comply with the statute, but is one of a character that has been most frequently criticised and condemned. It should be the aim of counsel in preparing a record to facilitate, rather than impede, the ready and intelligent examination of the case. Certainly it is in the interest of the litigant that this should be so. The law at best is not an exact science, and its proper administration is sufficiently beset by difficulties without additional burdens cast by carelessly prepared records. The judge of the court below would have been fully justified in refusing to settle this statement in its present form; in fact, it was his duty, without objection, to require the party to put the statement in the form required by the statute before certification. The judgment and order are affirmed, with $100 damages.

In re CROCKER'S ESTATE. (No. 5,730.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1895.)

PARTIAL DISTRIBUTION—BOND BY DISTRIBUTEES—WHEN REQUIRED—DISCRETION OF COURT—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. art. 1, c. 11, §§ 1658-1663, empowering the court to order partial distribution before final settlement, where the petition for partial distribution is not filed until more than a year after letters were issued, all the claims allowed have been paid, and the court withholds from distribution property of such estate and of another estate, whose value greatly exceeds the amount of a contested claim for which both estates, if either, are jointly liable, the refusal of the court to require the distributees to give bond to the executrix, as provided by section 1661, is a proper exercise of its discretion.

2. In the statute requiring the court to find that "the estate is but little indebted," the quoted words are intended to be used relatively, and as referring to a condition of things in which the debts are small as compared with the value of the estate, and not absolutely, so as to require the estate to be but little indebted regardless of its value.

3. A petition by devisees and legatees for partial distribution is not defective because it describes petitioners as "heirs at law."

4. It is no objection to a petition for partial distribution that it is filed by several claimants, instead of one.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Petition by the heirs at law, who are also devisees and legatees of Clark W. Crocker, deceased, for a partial distribution of deceased's estate. From an order of partial distribution, the holders of a rejected and contested claim against such estate appeal. Affirmed.

A. N. Drown and D. M. Delmas, for appellants. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, J. On November 23, 1893, the heirs at law of Clark W. Crocker, deceased, who are also devisees and legatees under his last will and testament, made their application to the superior court, sitting in probate, for an order of partial distribution. In their petition they allege, among other things, the appointment of Julia A. Crocker, the surviving wife of the decedent, and one of the petitioners, as executrix of said last will and testament, and that letters testamentary were issued to her from the court on the 22d day of July, 1890, which letters have never been revoked, annulled, or set aside; that there is now in the hands of said executrix the sum of $13,232.74, in money, and certain real estate and personal property, all of which is fully set forth and described in the schedule hereunto annexed, marked "Schedule A," and made a part of this petition; that the estate of said deceased is but little indebted; and that the shares of petitioners in the said estate and property, excepting, however, the two parcels of land situated on Mission street, in the said city and county of San Francisco, set forth and described in items 14 and 15 of said schedule, may be allowed to them without loss to the creditors of said estate; concluding with the usual prayer. The petition was resisted by the appellants, who, in their answer thereto, claim to be creditors and persons having claims against the deceased in his estate, but whose claim was rejected by the executrix, and an action is now pending thereon. The grounds of objection and contest to the application are: "First, that the estate of said decedent is largely indebted; second, that the shares of said estate of the said parties so applying by said petition cannot be allowed to them without loss to the creditors of said estate; third, that the legacy or share of the estate of said decedent to which either of the parties so applying is entitled cannot be allowed to either of the said parties so applying without loss to the creditors of the said estate; fourth, that no part of the shares of the parties so applying can be allowed to them without loss to the creditors of said estate; fifth, that no part of the share or portion of the estate of said decedent to which either of the parties so applying is entitled can be allowed to him or her without loss to the creditors of the said estate." At the hearing, the court made an order allowing and directing a distribution of the estate of said decedent, and payment to petitioners of their legacies and distributive shares of said estate, except the real property embraced in items 14 and 15 of the schedule referred to in the petition, and valued at $216,000; the same being withheld from distribution by the court to await the result of the action pending upon contestants' rejected claim. The court, in its said order of partial distribution, found "that the estate of said deceased is but little indebted; and that the property and estate hereinafter described may now be set apart and distributed to said heirs at law without loss to the creditors of said deceased; and that there will remain in the estate of said deceased, undistributed, and in the hands of said executrix, after such distribution, sufficient property to pay in full all claims against and all creditors of said estate, and also all expenses of administration thereof; and that it is not necessary to require a bond of or from any of said heirs at law." From this order the appeal is taken by contestants, with a bill of exceptions.

It appears: That the contestants are the sole heirs at law of William H. Wallace, deceased, who died, intestate, on the 2d day of October, 1881. On that day, and for many years prior thereto, he was associated with said Clark W. Crocker, deceased, and one Albert W. Sisson, also deceased, as copartners, under the firm name and style of Sisson, Wallace & Co., who, as such, were engaged in carrying on a mercantile business. That said copartnership was dissolved by the death of said Wallace, and the said Sisson and Crocker thereby became and were the surviving partners thereof. That the claim of contestants upon which the joint action referred to was originally brought against the said Sisson and Crocker, as surviving partners of Sisson, Wallace & Co., and now pending against their personal representatives, is based entirely upon their alleged acts as such in relation to the partnership business, and for an accounting, and is for the sum of $162,500, together with interest thereon, and for their costs and disbursements in said action, amounting in the aggregate, as claimed, to about $300,000. It further appears that this same claim upon which said action is now pending was presented to the executors of the will of said Sisson, deceased, and by them rejected; and that there is now in the hands of said executors property of the estate of the value of $200,000; and that all claims against that estate have been paid except the rejected claim in question.

The power of the court to make an order of partial distribution before final settlement is expressly conferred by statute (sections 1658-1663, inclusive, of article 1 of chapter 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure). But it is claimed that the order appealed from is void, because it did not require that "each legatee or devisee obtaining such order should execute and deliver to the executrix a bond," etc. Code Civ. Proc. § 1661. The record shows upon its face that more than one year had elapsed from the issuance of the letters testamentary to the filing of the petition in this proceeding; "that all claims allowed have been paid"; and the court finds that no injury can result to the estate by reason of such partial distribution. The existence of these statutory conditions mentioned in section 1663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the proviso to the first subdivision thereof, coupled with the joint and several liability of the estates of said Sisson and Crocker for the full amount of contestants' alleged claim, and the withholding from distribution property of both estates aggregating in value the sum of $416,000, to await the result of the action pending thereon, show that the court properly exercised the discretion vested in it by the statute in dispensing with the requirement of a bond. In re Levinson's Estate, 98 Cal. 654, 33 Pac. 726.

The finding by the court that the estate was but little indebted is objected to by appellants, upon the ground that these words are intended to "operate only where as a matter of fact and absolutely the estate, no matter what its size, was but little indebted." These statutory words were intended to be used relatively, and not absolutely, and they merely refer to a "condition of things in which the debts are small when considered in connection with the value of the estate." Hence it follows that the contention of appellants on this point cannot be sustained.

Nor is the objection well founded that the petition is defective, because it describes the petitioners as "heirs at law." This proceeding is but a step in the ordinary course of administration; and the fact that petitioners are described in the petition as heirs at law, instead of devisees and legatees under the will, is entirely immaterial, the court having judicial notice of the will at every stage of the proceeding.

The further objection to the petition that it is nugatory, because not presented by a single claimant, is equally untenable. The remaining questions discussed by counsel, orally and in their briefs, are not necessary to be considered. Let the order be affirmed.

FREEMAN v. BADGLEY et al. (No. 15,511.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1895.)

APPEAL—DECISION—REVERSAL—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS.

Where the findings of the trial court are inconsistent and confusing, so that its intent cannot be certainly determined, the judgment will be reversed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Frank Freeman, as assignee of George H. Tay & Co., against Charles Badgley and R. H. Quincey, on an account. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant Quincey appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Morehouse and Hiram Tuttle, for appellant. Crandall & Biddle, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Plaintiff, as assignee of George H. Tay & Co., sues to recover the balance of account for goods sold and delivered. The court found that the business was conducted by Charles Badgley and Charles F. Schettler, under the firm name of Schettler & Co., until November 17, 1888, when Badgley bought out his partner, and conducted the business until December 4, 1888, when he formed a partnership with R. H. Quincey, who is respondent here. When the firm of Schettler & Co. was dissolved, it was indebted to George H. Tay & Co. in the sum of $3,250.30, which indebtedness was then assumed by Badgley, who incurred a further indebtedness to the same firm before he formed the partnership with Quincey of $174.05, making the entire debt at that time $3,424.35. That in the partnership agreement executed by Badgley and Quincey, December 4, 1888, among other things, it was agreed as follows: "And to that end and purpose the said parties hereto are each to be equal partners, and each own one-half of the stock, tools, good will, contracts now entered into by said Badgley, or by the firm of Schettler & Co., the predecessors of said Badgley in said business, and each is required to pay one-half of the obligations and demands now existing against said Schettler & Co., and said Badgley in said business, which indebtedness said Badgley hereby guaranties shall not exceed the sum of $2,949.33." It was also found that on the trial plaintiff disclaimed any right to recover upon the partnership agreement, or any part thereof, but based his right solely upon an agreement made subsequently to the partnership. That Quincey paid to creditors of Badgley, and of Schettler & Co., other than George H. Tay & Co., $1,440.94. That George H. Tay & Co. sold to Badgley and Quincey goods of the amount of $2,498.89, all of which had been paid. That on the 8th day of December, 1888, the firm of Badgley & Quincey agreed to pay George H. Tay & Co. $4,861.77, of which sum they have paid $4,807.50, leaving $54.27 still due and unpaid, for which sum judgment was ordered. Plaintiff in his motion for a new trial claims that the finding to the effect that the sum of $2,498.89 has been paid is not supported by the evidence.

Looking at the statement, it is quite evident that the court did not intend to find that on the 8th day of December, 1888, Badgley & Quincey undertook to pay George H. Tay & Co. $4,861.77, or any other sum, as an indebtedness then accruing. The contention was that the new firm thereby assumed the old debts. The old debts, added to the then existing debts of the new firm, did not amount to that sum by more than $1,100. On the other hand, the court did not intend to find that Badgley & Quincey had paid $4,807.50 of the money agreed to be paid on the 8th of December, 1888, and $2,498.99 for goods subsequently purchased by the new firm. The total amount which the new firm paid to George H. Tay & Co., was $4,807.50. Respondent denies that he ever undertook to pay any sum of money to George H. Tay & Co., or to the creditors of Badgley, except as provided in the articles of copartnership by which the new firm assumed such debts to the extent of $2,949.33. The evidence shows that Badgley & Quincey have already paid more than that sum to such creditors. The agreement upon which suit is brought is charged to have been made after the contract of partnership was made. At the trial, and now, plaintiff disclaims any right based upon the partnership agreement, but says his action is founded upon a subsequent agreement. I find no evidence which tends to prove a subsequent agreement to that effect, or such as the court has found. Where a new partner is taken into an old firm, it may be shown by circumstances that the new firm assumed the former liabilities. But proof that the new firm recognized the debts of the old firm as its debts does not tend to prove an assumption of the old debts subsequently to the formation of the new copartnership, but that at the time of the formation of the last copartnership the new firm assumed the old debts; that the liability of the new partner for them was a part of the consideration paid by him for his interest in the partnership. This proof, however, by circumstances, only raises a presumption which may be rebutted by direct proof as to what the copartnership agreement was. Such proof is furnished here by the written articles of copartnership. The plaintiff, therefore, to avoid the effect of that proof, claimed that his cause of action against Quincey did not arise from the partnership agreement, but from a contract made subsequently. That would be an agreement to pay the debt of another, and must be established in compliance with the statute of frauds. Quincey pleaded that the agreement was without consideration. There is no express finding upon that issue. The findings are inconsistent and confusing; so much so that I think a new trial should be awarded. Apparently it is found that Badgley & Quincey agreed to pay George H. Tay & Co. a sum greater than was due them. Other findings, however, show that no such effect was intended. Very likely the attorneys are to blame for this confusion, but I think justice requires that a new trial be awarded.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

HANSEN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(No. 15,500.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES — USE OF TRACK AS PATHWAY—ACQUIESCENCE OF COMPANY—PRESUMPTION—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK.

1. Where, in an action against a railway company for personal injuries, there is evidence that a large number of people crossed defendant's right of way at a certain point at all hours of the day, the question whether plaintiff was at such point on the right of way with the company's consent is for the jury, though defendant's witnesses testify that the company boarded up the right of way, and did everything in its power to warn people from crossing it.

2. Where a railroad company permits the public to use its right of way for the purpose of travel, it is liable to one who, while crossing the right of way, is injured by a dangerous contrivance placed by the company at a point so used.

3. Where a certain part of the right of way of a railroad company has been used by the public for more than 20 years as a footpath for travel, with the knowledge of the company, the acquiescence of the company in such use will be inferred.

4. Where a person is on the right of way of a railroad company with its consent, the company is bound to use reasonable care to avoid injuring him.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Charles W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Hansen against the Southern Pacific Company and another for personal injuries. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes, for appellants. Joseph Leggett and James G. Maguire, for respondent.

SEARLS, C. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff, an infant of the age of about seven years, through the wrongful acts, negligence, and default of the defendants, their agents and servants. The cause was tried before a jury. Plaintiff had a verdict for $10,000, upon which judgment was entered in his favor. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The complaint contained two causes of action. According to the first count or cause of action set out in the complaint, the defendant the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation, was and is the owner of a railroad, roadbed, track, etc., extending from San Francisco south to and beyond the southerly limits of the city and county; that the other defendant was and is the lessee of said railroad, and operates the same; that said lessee placed and maintained upon said railroad, near Thirtieth street, San Francisco, a cattle guard which is described at length, and as being so constructed as to be dangerous in character to persons crossing or attempting to pass over the same, all of which was well known to defendants; that at the place where this "dangerous trap" was placed and maintained it was, and for many years had been, the custom of the public generally, with the knowledge and consent of defendants, to pass and travel upon and over said railroad, roadbed, and right of way, and turnstiles had, with the knowledge and consent of defendants, been placed in the fences on each side of and inclosing the right of way; that on the 20th day of June, 1889, plaintiff, an infant of the age of seven years, with the consent of defendants, entered upon said right of way and track, and in attempting to pass over said "trap" his foot was caught, and firmly held thereby, and a passing train of defendant ran over and crushed his leg, so that amputation was necessary. The second cause of action states the facts up to and including the statement as to the plaintiff being caught in the cattle guard or "trap," as it is designated, and then counts upon the wanton and willful negligence of the engineer of defendant as the cause of his injury, stating in apt terms facts tending to show that, but for the gross carelessness of such engineer, the train might have been stopped before reaching plaintiff. The answer of defendants denies all the material allegations of the complaint.

Upon the close of the testimony on the part of plaintiff defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds: "(1) That the evidence failed to show that either the public or the plaintiff ever acquired, with the consent, assent, or permission of defendants, the right to a user of the railroad as a way for travel, or as a playground or place of rendezvous for children. (2) That the evidence fails to show any negligence in the construction, equipment, or maintenance of the cattle guard in which the foot of plaintiff was caught at the time of his injury; that the track was fenced and barricaded against the passage of animals and human beings. (3) That there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the engineer of defendants' train, but that, on the contrary, it is affirmatively shown that said engineer did all in his power, aided by all the best appliances that machinery and science could furnish, to avoid doing the infant plaintiff any harm." The motion was overruled, an exception noted, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

The evidence showed without contradiction that from Twenty-Fifth street to Thirtieth street in the city of San Francisco, the railroad of the defendant runs most of the way upon an embankment varying in height from a few feet up to say 20 feet, with trestles or bridges under which travel upon the cross streets passed. The road curves to the left or east going south, and is fenced on both sides with a board fence, consisting of posts set in the ground with four boards placed horizontally, and a cap on the top of the posts. There is a somewhat heavy up grade going south or towards San Jose, and a reverse curve commences a little south of Thirtieth street. Just south of Thirtieth street the defendant had placed a cattle guard, the slats or bars of which were of iron or steel, placed with their edges upward, say three inches, more or less, apart, with an excavation of a few inches under them. Cross fences ran from the side fence up to the ends of this cattle guard in the usual manner. On or about June 20, 1889, the infant plaintiff, a boy of about seven years of age, was upon the right of way and embankment of defendants' road, and in attempting to cross said cattle guard his left foot passed between the slats thereof, was caught and held, and a south-bound passenger train of defendant, running on schedule time, and, so far as appears, at its regular rate of speed, ran over and crushed the left leg of said plaintiff so that amputation of the limb was a necessity. The train was stopped so that only the forward wheels of the engine passed over plaintiff. There was also evidence tending to show that for a number of years prior to and up to the time of the accident complained of a large number of people residing in the vicinity were accustomed to use the embankment and right of way of the railroad as a route over which to pass on foot, and for egress and ingress from and to their homes, and that this user was so general that people could be seen at all hours of the day passing over the said road. At several points boards were off the fences, through which they passed in going to and from the road. That there were between Twenty-Eighth and Thirty-First streets two or more turnstiles, two or three gates through the railroad fence, and one place at which stairs were erected over the same. The inference may be fairly drawn from the evidence that hundreds of people daily passed over this portion of defendants' road and right of way on foot, and that such user was known to defendants. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff could have been seen, and the fact that he was caught in the cattle guard, at a point on the road 150 feet north of the position he occupied. James Hewitt, the engineer in charge of the train by which the injury to plaintiff was occasioned, was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, and testified, in substance, that he was running at his usual rate of speed, say 18 to 20 miles per hour; saw the boy at say a distance of 150 feet, but did not discover his predicament until within, say 50 feet, of him, when he immediately reversed his engine, applied the "emergency stop" (which he described as being the best modern appliance for suddenly stopping a train), and brought his train to a stand just as it passed over the leg of the boy. To use his language: "There was nothing I could have done that I did not do to stop the train when I saw that he was caught." The witness testified to always seeing people on the track at and near this point, and described at considerable length the conduct of boys who would stand in front of approaching trains, and then suddenly jump aside, and various antics well calculated to deceive and distract those in charge of trains by causing them to believe said boys to be in peril, and all for their own amusement. The weight of testimony was to the effect that the boy had been playing on and about the track for nearly an hour before the accident, with two other boys. Plaintiff, however, denied this, and said, in substance, that he went to a point near where the accident occurred by previous appointment to meet another boy; failing in which, he met and talked with two small girls, looked on at the work of some men employed near the track, and started for home, when he was caught in the guard, where he stood, screamed, and motioned to stop the approaching train, but in vain. The testimony as to the dangerous character of the cattle guard was confined mainly to a model, and to showing that its slats were elastic, and that plaintiff was caught and held fast by it. There was also testimony tending to show that defendants had notices posted on or near the railway track in the vicinity of the accident, forbidding trespassers upon the company's grounds, and requesting parents to prevent their children from attempting to board cars in motion, and to keep them away from the company's grounds.

The contention of defendants is, in substance, that defendants were entitled to the sole and exclusive user of their road and right of way; that, having fenced it, and forbidden the public to trespass thereon, they had done all within their power to prevent such trespasses; and the fact that many persons continued to intrude upon their right of way did not constitute such persons other than trespassers, and the evidence of such intrusion was not admissible in evidence to prove acquiescence on the part of defendants, and did not, under such circumstances, tend to prove a license to the public to use the right of way. It seems to us that to say there was no evidence of an invitation on the part of the company to make use of the track at the point where the accident occurred is to assume the question of fact involved in the case,—to assume the very fact which it was the duty of the jury to determine. That the testimony on this subject objected to by defendants was admissible, we cannot doubt. In Townley v. Railway Co., 53 Wis. 626, 11 N. W. 55, it was held to be error to exclude evidence offered to show that persons living near the track, and other people, men, women, and children, had for years immediately preceding the accident been in the habit of passing back and forth upon the same pathway where the plaintiff (a little girl) was hurt by a moving car. Casida v. Navigation Co., 14 Or. 551, 13 Pac. 438, is to like effect. Noyes v. Railroad Co., 92 Cal. 285, 23 Pac. 288, although differing widely in its facts, involves a like principle. A multitude of cases tending to the same end might be quoted. We content ourselves with stating the rule thus: The question whether or not the infant plaintiff was upon the road with the consent of defendants was an ultimate fact which went to fix the measure of diligence required of defendants in determining the question of negligence. Had the fact been conceded one way or the other, or established without contradiction, a question of law only would have been involved; but, the testimony being contradictory, the fact to be deducted therefrom was for the jury, under the instruction of the court as to the law applicable. Langhoff v. Railway Co., 19 Wis. 489; Cooley, Torts, p. 670; Noyes v. Railroad Co., supra; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 172. The evidence, being properly admitted, established a sufficient showing, notwithstanding the fencing of the right of way and notices given by the company, to entitle its submission to the jury. As circumstances indicative of the nonconsent of defendants to the public use of its property as a way for foot travel, the facts indicated are potent. On the other hand, the continued user by the public, coupled with the facilities for such user, such as gates, stairs, and turnstiles, and openings in the fences, long continued, are cogent circumstances tending to an acquiescence in such user; hence the propriety of submitting the question to the jury.

Manifestly, if the jury found in favor of the theory of acquiescence by the company in the use by the public of its track and grounds as a way for travel, the character of its cattle guard, as to being dangerous or otherwise, became a factor in the problem. What it might lawfully do, as against trespassers upon its property to whom it owed no duty, it could not do with impunity to those having rights thereon. The character, material, and mode of construction of the cattle guard afforded means, coupled with the fact that the infant plaintiff was caught and held by its blades, by which to determine, to some extent at least, the question of its safe or dangerous character in such a place. In Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, it was said: "That the turntable was a dangerous machine, which would be likely to cause injury to children who resorted to it, might fairly be inferred from the injury which actually occurred to the plaintiff. * * * When the jury learned from the evidence that he had suffered serious injury by his foot being caught between the fixed rail of the roadbed and the turning rail of the table, they were justified in believing that there was a probability of the occurrence of such accidents." A like inference was deducible from the accident here. The evidence that the engineer might have seen the boy at a distance of 150 feet or more, and might at that distance have determined his situation, afforded some evidence of such negligence as would have rendered defendants liable in certain aspects of the case, and, coupled with the other facts and circumstances in proof, justified the court below in its denial of the motion for a nonsuit.

Defendants introduced evidence on their part tending to show: (1) That the cattle guard in question was of approved design, well calculated to promote the object of its construction, and that it had received the sanction of leading railway men of the country. (2) That they had kept notices posted on their road, warning the public from trespassing thereon; had constantly repaired breaks in their fences, only to have them renewed; had nailed up gates, employed special policemen, who, with the regular police of the vicinage, had labored in vain to keep people, and more particularly boys, from their track and right of way. As illustrative of the testimony in this behalf, Timothy Sullivan, a section man on this portion of the road, after testifying at length as to their efforts in keeping the fences in repair, stated as follows: "A year ago we repaired that fence near the Fairmount school as good as new. Carpenters came and repaired it, and, as soon as the carpenters repaired it, it was cut the following day. It was always repaired according as we see holes. I never kept any account of how many times that hole has been repaired. I know myself, sometimes at Twenty-Seventh and Dolores street, that we nailed up one gate. One gate that is there we nailed up every day for three months, and it would be cut in the morning. There was a watchman put there at night, and those nights it was not cut. As long as the watchman remained in sight it was not cut, but as soon as he was away it was cut. I believe there was 1,000 feet of lumber lost in repairing of those holes, taking no account of the nails or labor." The testimony of the policemen was quite full and specific in the detail of their efforts to keep people, and especially boys, off of the right of way of the railroad. The most that can be said is that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence on this branch of the case, and, while we might come to a different conclusion from that reached by the jury were the question submitted to us as an original proposition, we are not authorized for this reason to override the deliberate action of the jury, supported as it is by that of the court before which the cause was tried.

Exceptions are taken by the appellants to the instructions given to the jury on behalf of the plaintiff, and to those refused to be given on behalf of the defendants. These instructions are too lengthy to be reproduced in full. The following will give the scope and tenor of those given on behalf of plaintiff: If you find from a preponderance of evidence "that the defendants permitted and consented to the use of their tracks and right of way by the public for the purpose of travel along and across the same at the place where the cattle guard was maintained, and that the plaintiff was so using the track and right of way at the time that the injury occurred, then I charge you that the plaintiff was not a trespasser, and the defendants owed him a duty not to obstruct the track and right of way with a dangerous contrivance; and if you further find that the cattle guard was a dangerous trap, and that the defendants knew, or ought to have known, that it was dangerous, you will find for plaintiff on said first cause of action, provided you find that the injury was caused by the said cattle guard, without fault on the plaintiff's own part." The court further instructed the jury, in substance, that if for more than 20 years the locus in quo had been used by the public as a footpath for travel with the knowledge of said defendants, and without protest or objection from them, then the jury might infer that such use of the track and right of way was with the acquiescence and permission of defendants. Upon the second cause of action the instruction was, in substance, that if plaintiff was upon the track by the consent and permission of defendants, then they were bound to exercise reasonable care in keeping a proper lookout and otherwise, and if they failed therein, and by reason of their negligence, and without the fault of plaintiff, he was injured, the jury should find for plaintiff; and that, if plaintiff was not on the track or road by permission of the defendants, he was a trespasser, and the defendants owed him no duty, except to use ordinary care to avoid injuring him when they discovered him on the track; and if, under such circumstances, they exercised such care, the verdict should be for defendants on the second cause of action. The instructions at which we have glanced, taken as a whole, embodied the law applicable to the case with great clearness, and were in no wise objectionable. The fault of the instructions asked by defendants and refused by the court, so far as important, was that they steadily assumed the fact that plaintiff was a trespasser, and therein were objectionable. The other objections raised are not tenable, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

I concur: BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

NEW TRIAL—VERDICT—VACATING—STATEMENT OF CASE—AMENDMENT.

1. The granting a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence will not be disturbed unless there was a clear abuse of its discretion.

2. When, in the opinion of the trial court, the verdict is against the weight of conflicting evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial.

3. Where a verdict covering two independent causes of action for the recovery of a money judgment was for one entire sum, and was erroneous as to one cause of action, it was properly set aside in toto, although as to the other cause of action it was right.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring the trial judge, in settling the statement on appeal, to make it "truly represent the case, notwithstanding the assent of the parties to any inaccurate statement," where, after a statement was settled, certain material exhibits were alleged to have been omitted, the judge could vacate his certificate of settlement, and insert the same in the statement.

Department 1. Appeal from city and county of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Seth Warner against the F. Thomas Parisian Dyeing & Cleaning Works. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant moved for a new trial. From an order granting that motion, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Horace W. Philbrook, for appellant. Reinstein & Eisner, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint in this case contains two separate causes of action, and judgment is asked for the aggregate sum of $1,321. The case was tried before a jury, and the plaintiff recovered a verdict for the sum prayed for, on which judgment was entered. The defendant moved for a new trial, upon the ground, among others, of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; and the court granted the motion upon that ground, as shown by its opinion found in the transcript, and in which the evidence is very thoroughly reviewed. The plaintiff appeals from the order thus made.

The rule is settled in this state that a motion for new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its action in granting the motion will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that there was a clear abuse of such discretion. It is also settled law that, when the evidence is conflicting, the trial court is authorized to review it; and if, in its opinion, the verdict is against the weight of the evidence, it is its duty to grant a new trial. Bjorman v. Redwood Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591; Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 411, 35 Pac. 1024, and cases cited. Here there was a clear conflict in the evidence; and, as appears from the opinion filed, the court was of the opinion that the verdict was contrary to the weight of the evidence, and hence should be set aside. In all this no abuse of discretion appears.

It is claimed, however, that there are in the statement of the case no sufficient specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence, and hence that the court was not authorized to consider the statement or examine the evidence. We have carefully looked at the specifications, and, in our opinion, they are quite sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute.

It is also claimed that the verdict covered two independent causes of action, and that, as to one of those causes of action, it is conceded to be right, and therefore it was error to set aside the entire verdict. But the second cause of action was for $71, and the verdict was for an entire sum, without any mention of the separate items. It was not error, therefore, to set the whole verdict aside.

It is further claimed that the settlement of the statement by the court was a gross abuse of discretion, and therefore the statement should not be considered. It appears that, after the statement of the case had been settled by the judge and filed with the clerk, it was brought to the notice of the court that the statement was incomplete, in that several exhibits referred to therein had not been engrossed at length, although it was recited in the statement that it contained all the material evidence taken at the trial of the action. The defendant's attorneys thereupon moved the court that the settlement and allowance of the statement be vacated, and that they be allowed to re-engross the same, and place these exhibits therein. This motion was resisted by the attorney for the plaintiff, but, after a hearing of the parties, was granted; and the plaintiff's attorney excepted to this action of the court. We see no error in this proceeding. Courts of justice are organized for the purpose of determining the controversies between litigants according to their respective rights; and rules of procedure are intended to facilitate this purpose, rather than to hamper or obstruct the action of the court in determining which of the parties is entitled to a judgment. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc., makes it the duty of the judge in settling the statement to make it "truly represent the case, notwithstanding the assent of the parties to any inaccurate statement." If the judge shall become satisfied that a statement as settled by him does not truly represent the case, he is authorized, and it is his duty, to make such corrections therein as will cause it to conform to the facts. In the present case the defendant's attorney, in preparing the proposed statement, had included therein a reference to these exhibits by inserting the words, at the place where they were referred to, "Here insert plaintiff's exhibit," so that the plaintiff's attorney was not misled in preparing amendments thereto; and, when the attention of the judge was drawn to the fact that the exhibits had not been engrossed in the statement, he was authorized to vacate his certificate of settlement, and direct that they be engrossed therein, so that his certificate might conform to the facts. Whether the omission to engross them was the result of inadvertence or carelessness on the part of the defendant's attorney did not deprive the court of a discretion to settle it correctly; and, for the purpose of determining what exhibits were in reality referred to in the statement, it was authorized to make such investigation as would enable it to settle the statement according to the facts.

There are no other points requiring special notice. The order is affirmed.

OPENING DEFAULT—DECISION ON APPEAL.

On reversing an order denying a motion to set aside a default judgment, the appellate court will not direct the imposition of terms on the opening of the default, this being a matter for the lower court.

On motion for rehearing. Denied.

For prior report, see 38 Pac. 512.

RUCKER et al. v. HALL et al. (No. 15,421.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1895.)

PLEADING — ELECTION BETWEEN COUNTS — FACTS UNKNOWN TO PLAINTIFF — SALE OF LAND — AGREEMENT FOR COMMISSIONS — CONSTRUCTION.

1. In an action to recover commissions for a sale of real estate under a contract for payment thereof at a certain rate if certain facts were true and at another rate if other facts were true, and all the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant, plaintiff may state his cause of action in different counts accordingly, and should not be compelled to elect on which he will proceed.

2. A contract running for one year provided that if plaintiff effected a sale of defendant's property he was to receive a certain commission, and in case a sale was made without his aid, or the property was withdrawn from sale, one-half such commission. Held, that a lease by defendant for five years, with the exclusive privilege to the lessee of purchasing at a fixed price at any time before the expiration of the lease, was a sale within the meaning of the contract, entitling plaintiff to one-half the commission.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action by J. E. Rucker & Son against Mrs. Hall and another to recover commissions on a sale of real estate. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Jackson Hatch, for appellants. Lloyd & Wood and J. G. Maguire, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. The plaintiffs were real-estate brokers at San Jose, doing business as J. E. Rucker & Son. The defendant Mary Hall in writing appointed the plaintiffs her agents for the sale of certain lands, and which authorization contained the following clauses: "The said J. E. Rucker & Son shall have complete control of all sales to purchasers furnished by them or through their agency, and I agree, in case I shall sell or dispose of such property to any customer furnished by said J. E. Rucker & Son, to pay them three per cent. commission on such sales. Should I find a purchaser independent from said J. E. Rucker & Son, or withdraw the property from sale, I agree to pay the said J. E. Rucker & Son one-half of the above commission as compensation for their services in advertising," etc. This contract and appointment was made August 24, 1886, and was "to run for one year, and thereafter until withdrawal of same in writing." This action was brought to recover commissions under said instrument. The complaint contained two counts, the first based upon the second clause above quoted, alleging a sale by Mrs. Hall, made January 11, 1887, and claiming one-half of 3 per cent. commission, amounting to $300; and the second count was based upon the first clause, alleging that plaintiffs, being ignorant of the sale above mentioned, on the 24th day of August, 1887, found a purchaser, and notified Mrs. Hall thereof, but that she refused, etc. The defendants answered each cause of action, specifically denying each allegation of the complaint. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and findings and judgment went for defendants, and this appeal is from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

Before any evidence was offered, plaintiffs were required by the court, upon defendants' motion, to elect upon which of the two counts contained in the complaint they would offer evidence and rely for judgment, upon the ground that said counts required different testimony; that evidence which would support one would not support the other. Plaintiffs excepted to the order, and elected to rely upon the first count, and offered no evidence under the second count. The first cause of action was based upon an alleged sale of the property by Mrs. Hall in January, which, if made, entitled the plaintiffs to one-half of the commission they were to receive in case of a sale made by themselves, Mrs. Hall having retained the right to sell to purchasers not furnished by plaintiffs. The second cause of action was based upon a sale made by plaintiffs in accordance with the terms of their contract with Mrs. Hall, which would have entitled them to full commissions. This sale was alleged to have been made in ignorance of the alleged sale by Mrs. Hall some seven months before, and which it is alleged Mrs. Hall concealed from them. Plaintiffs' right to recover under the first cause of action depended upon the fact of a sale having been made by Mrs. Hall. If such sale had in fact been made, their right to recover was clear; while, if no sale had been made by Mrs. Hall, they would as clearly have been entitled to full commissions upon proof of the facts alleged in the second count or cause of action. These causes of action were based upon the same contract, and upon the face of the complaint it would appear clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon one or the other, according as the proof might be. The allegation of a sale by Mrs. Hall in January was based, as appears from the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs, upon a lease for the term of five years, "with the sole and exclusive privilege of purchasing" the same property upon payment of the sum of $19,000; Mrs. Hall agreeing to accept payments at any time of $1,000 or more, but no conveyance to be executed until at least $5,000 had been paid. This lease and agreement further provided that the lessees should pay rent for the premises at the rate of $125 per month, payable quarterly in advance, and, in default of such payment of any installment of rent for 30 days after it became due, the right to purchase the lands should terminate, and the lessor, the defendant here, should "have the right to claim an abandonment thereof." Whether the lessees had made payments entitling them to a conveyance, or whether a conveyance had in fact been made, or whether they had forfeited the right to purchase, and, if so, whether Mrs. Hall had exercised the right to claim an abandonment of the contract of purchase under the terms of the contract, were facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants, and which could not be certainly known to the plaintiffs. The subject of the action was the recovery of commissions under a single contract for the payment thereof at a certain rate under one set of circumstances and at a different rate under different circumstances. I think all the facts might properly have been stated in a single count, as, under those facts, the ultimate question was as to the amount of commissions to which the plaintiffs were entitled. But the defendants could not have been prejudiced by the more logical and technical mode of pleading adopted by the plaintiffs. The uncertainty as to the facts above noticed justified that mode of pleading, and the court erred in requiring the plaintiffs to elect between the counts, and to rely upon one only. Wilson v. Smith, 61 Cal. 209; Sadler v. Olmstead, 79 Iowa, 121, 44 N. W. 292; Longprey v. Yates, 31 Hun, 432; Blank v. Hartshorn, 37 Hun, 101; Whitney v. Railway Co., 27 Wis. 327. In the case last cited it was held that, where the plaintiff cannot know, before the evidence is all in, the precise nature and limits of defendant's liability to him, he may state his cause of action variously in different counts of the complaint, and should not be compelled to elect upon which he will proceed.

The court found that plaintiffs accepted the said contract or authorization orally, and advertised said property for sale, but did not perform any other covenant or condition therein agreed by them to be performed. So far as the first cause of action is concerned,—and upon that alone the cause was tried,—the latter part of the finding is outside of any issue; since, by the contract, if Mrs. Hall sold the property to a purchaser not procured by plaintiffs, she was to pay one-half commissions as a compensation for advertising. The finding is, therefore, that, so far as their right to recover upon that count is concerned, they fully performed the contract on their part.

The fifth finding is not justified by the evidence in so far as it finds that Mrs. Hall did not find a purchaser or sell the property while her agreement with plaintiff was in force. It is true, the lease for five years, with the exclusive privilege of purchasing, did not bind the lessee to purchase; but Mrs. Hall bound herself to sell to the lessees at any time during the continuance of the lease, and to convey upon payment of $5,000 of the purchase money. She thus placed it out of her power to complete any sale plaintiffs might make for the space of five years, or forever, as the case might be. Such contracts must have a reasonable construction. The transaction must be considered as to its effect upon her contract with the plaintiffs, and not simply as to whether she had made a contract of sale such as she could, in any event, enforce against a purchaser. This is apparent from the further provision of the contract with the plaintiffs that, if she should withdraw the property from sale, she was bound to pay plaintiffs the same commission as though she had made a sale to an independent purchaser. If the fifth finding had set out the lease with the contract therein giving the lessee the exclusive privilege of purchasing for the period of five years, it would have required, as a conclusion of law, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover under the first count. The latter part of that finding, to the effect that Mrs. Hall is not indebted, etc., is a conclusion of law.

The eighth finding is against the plaintiffs upon the second cause of action, upon which they were not permitted to offer any evidence, and which was not tried.

Some other questions are discussed by appellants, but they need not now be considered. No brief was filed by respondents. The order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order denying a new trial is reversed, with directions to set aside the order requiring the plaintiffs to elect between the causes of action stated in the complaint; and a new trial is ordered.

BANK OF MARTINEZ v. HEMME ORCHARD & LAND CO. et al.
(No. 15,621.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1895.)
COMMERCIAL BANKS—POWERS—LOANS ON REAL ESTATE.

1. In the absence of a prohibitory statute, a commercial bank may loan money on real-estate security.

2. The word "banking," as used in Const. art. 4, § 34, prohibiting the legislature from passing any act granting any charter "for banking purposes," and Id. § 35, commanding the legislature to prohibit any person, association, or corporation from "exercising the privilege of banking or creating paper to circulate as money," refers merely to the issuance of bank bills or paper to circulate as money.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Jos. P. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Martinez against the Hemme Orchard & Land Company and others to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Earl H. Webb, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal was taken by the Hemme Orchard & Land Company from an order refusing a new trial. The plaintiff is a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state in 1873. The articles of incorporation specify that the corporators desire to incorporate under the laws of the state of California in relation to the formation of corporations "embraced in title 1, pt. 4, div. 1, of the Civil Code of this state"; and, further, "that the purposes for which said corporation is formed are to engage in and carry on the business of banking to such extent and in such branches as may legally be done under the constitution and laws of the state of California." The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given by defendants August and Minerva E. Hemme to plaintiff to secure a loan made to them by plaintiff. Appellants contend that the mortgage is invalid because ultra vires, and illegal because forbidden by sections 34, 35, art. 4, Const. 1849,¹ which was in force when plaintiff was incorporated.

1. So far as the first point depends upon the provisions of the Civil Code, we are unable to see any force in it. The Code authorizes banks of deposit and discount, and prohibits the issuance of paper to circulate as money. Banks of deposit had from time immemorial been almost universally banks of loan and discount. Discount is a mode of loaning. No reason is suggested why they might not as well loan upon land security as any other. We are unable to see any point in the suggestion that because savings banks may loan on real estate therefore commercial banks may not. It might as well be argued that such banks cannot loan on personal security because savings banks are authorized to do so. The power to loan on real estate is not what distinguishes a savings bank from a commercial bank. In some states such loans are prohibited to commercial banks, either expressly or by the language of the charters. Cases arising under such laws have no force here.

2. The second point is no longer open. In Bank v. Fairbanks, 52 Cal. 196, it is said: "Under article 4, § 34, of the constitution of the state, deposit and loan associations may be formed which do not issue paper to circulate as money; and such are not 'banks,' within the prohibition of the constitution, although they may be called 'banks.'" We cannot follow the appellants in their attempted discrimination between that case and the one in hand. We perceive no essential difference. That decision was made while the constitution of 1849 was in force, and rights have grown up under it. Even if it did not meet our approval, we should not now feel at liberty to disturb that conclusion. But we think that conclusion correct. The provisions of the constitution of 1849 must be viewed in the light of 1849. The framers of that instrument had a vivid realization of the evils of bank bills issued by private corporations to circulate as money. Practically, they had never known any other money than bank bills till they came to California. The inconvenience arising from such currency was always very great, but the framers of the constitution of 1849 had known the utter prostration of business which resulted from the panic of 1837, when every bank in the United States suspended. As their bills constituted the entire currency of the country, the calamity can be better appreciated than described. The people of California were elated by the possession of rich gold placers, and probably believed that no other currency than gold and silver would be required. The reiteration of the idea shows that they desired above all things to prohibit the circulation of bank bills. This is what they meant by "banking," for while prohibiting it they authorized the formation of associations for the deposit of gold and silver, which, however, shall not put in circulation paper "of any bank" to circulate as money. Section 35 is but the counterpart of section 34, and requires the legislature to prohibit to any person or persons, as well as to corporations, the privileges of banking, which by the preceding section were denied to corporations. The two sections must be taken together, and it cannot be supposed that the convention intended to nullify the express exception made in the same provision. Besides, if the phrase "privileges of banking" includes all functions of banking, it would prohibit any person in the state from drawing a bill of exchange, giving a promissory note, or even collecting a debt, for those and many other transactions, essential to civilization as society is now constituted, are and have for centuries been the usual functions of banks. This is the reductio ad absurdum which shows the conclusion false. The legislature of 1849-50 passed a law prohibiting any corporation from performing even these acts. Section 3, "Act Concerning Corporations," passed April 22, 1850. But private persons were not prohibited from doing such business. On the contrary, an act was passed at the same session regulating demand, protest, etc., of bills of exchange and other paper. But the matter need not be pursued further, for it is absurd to attribute to any civilized modern community any such intent. The order appealed from is affirmed.

¹ Const. art. 4, § 34, provides that the legislature "shall have no power to pass any act granting any charter for banking purposes; but associations may be formed under general laws for the deposit of gold or silver but no such associations shall make, issue or put in circulation any bill, check, ticket, certificate, promissory note or other paper, or the paper of any bank, to circulate as money." Section 35 provides that the legislature shall prohibit "any person or persons, association, company or corporation from exercising the privileges of banking or creating paper to circulate as money."

LEVY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRAN-CISCO et al. (No. 15,577.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1895.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — COMPELLING PERSON TO TESTIFY AGAINST HIMSELF—UNREASON-ABLE SEIZURE AND SEARCH.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1459, 1460, provide that if an administrator complains that any person is suspected to have concealed, embezzled, etc., any moneys or goods of decedent, or has in his possession any writings tending to disclose the right of decedent to property, or any claim, demand, or lost will, the court may cite such person to appear; that, if he refuses to submit to an examination, the court may commit him to the county jail until he submits, or is discharged; that if, on such examination, it appear he has concealed, embezzled, etc., any moneys or goods, or has any such writings, the court may order him to disclose his knowledge, and may commit him to the county jail until the order is complied with, or he is discharged. Held, that such statute is remedial, and not criminal, and is not in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that no person shall "be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself," or with article 1, § 19, providing that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable seizures and searches, shall not be violated." McFarland and De Haven, JJ., dissenting.

In bank.

Petition by H. M. Levy for a writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department No. 9, and J. V. Coffey, judge of such court, commanding them to refrain and desist from further proceeding with a certain proceeding for the examination of petitioner on oath concerning property belonging to the estate of Morris Hoeflich, deceased, which it is alleged petitioner concealed and disposed of. Writ denied.

Byron Waters, J. B. Brandt, and Reddy, Campbell & Metson, for petitioner. Henry E. Highton, for respondents.

VAN FLEET, J. Morris Hoeflich died at the city and county of San Francisco in May, 1891, and Solomon Hoeflich was by the superior court of said city and county appointed administrator of his estate. Thereafter, on the — day of June, 1893, the administrator filed in said superior court a petition in the matter of said estate, averring, in substance, that it had come to his knowledge that said deceased was at and prior to his death either a full partner with one H. M. Levy, or engaged with said Levy jointly in a large number of transactions in stocks and mines in California and Nevada, and in other property, "the exact nature and extent of which transactions, and of the real and personal estate resulting therefrom, can be ascertained by an examination of the said H. M. Levy and other witnesses under oath, and by the production and examination of books of account, correspondence, checks, deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts, and other writings and documents now in the exclusive possession of said H. M. Levy"; and also by the examination of other named persons, and documents, etc., in their possession. The petition further averred that said Levy has concealed, conveyed away, and disposed of moneys and property of said deceased, and has in his possession and within his knowledge deeds and other documents and writings "which contain evidences of and tend to disclose the right, title, interest, and claim of said deceased to real and personal property," portions of such property being particularly described. The prayer was that said Levy be cited to appear before said court and undergo an examination under oath, together with such witnesses as might be then produced, touching all the matters set forth in the petition, "and especially touching his possession and knowledge of any and all deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts, or other writings, which contain evidences of or tend to disclose the right, title, and interest or claim of the decedent, Morris Hoeflich, to any real or personal estate, or any claim or demand whatsoever"; and that said Levy be required to produce all said deeds, conveyances, and other writings, books of account, etc., for inspection and examination. In response to a citation issued upon said petition, said Levy appeared and demurred, which demurrer being overruled, he filed a verified answer specifically denying all the material averments of the petition; denied that he had any property in which the deceased was interested, as a partner or otherwise, or that he had any documents or writings relating to any such property. He also filed written objections to any further proceedings in the matter of said examination; but the demurrer and the objections were overruled, and a day was set by the court for the examination. Thereupon said Levy filed his petition here, setting up these facts, upon which he makes this application for a writ of prohibition directed to said court, and the Honorable J. V. Coffey, judge thereof, commanding said respondents to refrain and desist from further proceeding with said contemplated examination. An alternative writ was issued, in response to which respondents have demurred and answered, and the matter has since been argued and submitted.

The proceedings in the superior court which are called into question by this application for prohibition were admittedly taken under and in pursuance of sections 1459 and 1460 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and these sections are as follows:

"Section 1459. If any executor, administrator or other person interested in the estate of a decedent complains to the superior court, or a judge thereof, on oath, that any person is suspected to have concealed, embezzled, smuggled, conveyed away, or disposed of any moneys, goods or chattels of the decedent, or has in his possession or knowledge any deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts or other writings, which contain evidences of or tend to disclose the right, title, interest or claim of the decedent to any real or personal estate, or any claim or demand, or any lost will, the said court or judge may cite such person to appear before such court, and may examine him on oath upon the matter of such complaint. If such person is not in the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted, he may be cited and examined either before the superior court of the county where he is found, or before the superior court of the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted. But if, in the latter case, he appears and is found innocent, his necessary expenses must be allowed him out of the estate.

"Section 1460. If the person so cited refuses to appear and submit to an examination, or to answer such interrogatories as may be put to him touching the matters of the complaint, the court may, by warrant for that purpose, commit him to the county jail, there to remain in close custody until he submits to the order of the court, or is discharged according to law. If, upon such examination, it appears that he has concealed, embezzled, smuggled, conveyed away, or disposed of any moneys, goods or chattels of the decedent, or that he has in his possession or knowledge any deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts or other writings containing evidences of or tending to disclose the right, title, interest, or claim of the decedent to any real or personal estate, claim or demand, or any lost will of the decedent, the court may make an order requiring such person to disclose his knowledge thereof to the executor or administrator, and may commit him to the county jail, there to remain until the order is complied with, or he is discharged according to law; and all such interrogatories and answers must be in writing, signed by the party examined, and filed in the court. The order for such disclosure made upon such examination shall be prima facie evidence of the right of the executor or administrator to such property in any action brought for the recovery thereof; and any judgment recovered therein must be for double the value of the property as assessed by the court or jury, or for return of the property and damages in addition thereto, equal to the value of such property. In addition to the examination of the party, witnesses may be produced and examined on either side."

Petitioner contends that these provisions of the Code are unconstitutional and void, and that the proceeding in the superior court is, therefore, without warrant of law. His position is that they are obnoxious to several features of the constitution of the state, and more particularly to section 13 of article 1, which provides that: "No person shall * * * be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself"; and to section 19 of the same article, which provides that: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable seizures and searches, shall not be violated." These two provisions of the constitution are of well-understood significance; they involve like principles, and, in considering the objection made, may be regarded as one. The argument of petitioner is that these sections of the Code are distinctly penal in character, and contemplate a proceeding which is in its essential nature criminal, within the meaning of the above provisions of the constitution; that, being a criminal proceeding, petitioner is protected by the constitution from being compelled to testify against himself, or submit his books and papers in evidence.

There is no question that, if petitioner's premises are correct, his conclusion follows necessarily. But his construction of the provisions in question cannot be sustained. These provisions have received a construction at the hands of this court directly at variance with that put upon them by petitioner. Sections 1458-1461 of the Code of Civil Procedure were, prior to the adoption of the Codes, a part of the old probate act, as sections 116-119; they are a part of the same article, and relate to the same subject, which is expressed in the title as "Embezzlement and surrender of property of the estate." In the case of Jahns v. Nolting, 29 Cal. 507, this court had occasion to construe section 116 of the probate act (now section 1458, Code Civ. Proc.) upon the very feature now involved. That was an action by an administrator to recover property belonging to the estate of his decedent, which he alleged had been embezzled by defendant and converted to his own use. The lower court held that the action was brought under section 116 of the probate act, which alone gave plaintiff a remedy for the wrong; that the statute was penal in its nature, and that the plaintiff was bound to prove the embezzlement as alleged, or fail in his action. Judgment having gone against him, the plaintiff appealed, and in disposing of that question the court said: "The position that section one hundred and sixteen affords the exclusive remedy for embezzling and alienating the effects of the deceased, intermediate the death of the deceased and the grant of administration, cannot be maintained, unless that section can be held to be a penal statute. * * * The distinctions between penal and remedial statutes are not always clearly marked, nor are the authorities quite harmonious where statutes very similar in their purpose and general terms have been under review. A penal statute is one that imposes a penalty or creates a forfeiture as the punishment for the neglect of some duty, or the commission of some wrong, that concerns the good of the public, and is commanded or prohibited by law. The law generally first prescribes what shall or shall not be done, and then declares the penalty. Its primary object is punishment, and to deter others from offending in like manner, though it may give the penalty, or some portion of it, to the person who may prosecute the action. Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick. 94; Suffolk Bank v. Worcester Bank, 5 Pick. 106; Frohock v. Pattee, 38 Me. 103; Bayard v. Smith, 17 Wend. 88; Sedg. St. Const. Law, 390." And it was held that the section was not penal, but purely remedial. Sections 1459, 1460, are strictly within the principles of construction announced in that case. They are no more penal in their essential features than is section 1458. It is true that, as urged by petitioner, they provide for pains and penalties, in the way of imprisonment and damages, under certain contingencies; but the essential distinction between these provisions and a penal statute is that the penalty is not imposed as a punishment for a public wrong, but as redress for a private grievance. And it is not unusual to find provisions of a similar character in statutes purely remedial. Both before and since Jahns v. Nolting these sections have several times been under consideration by the court. In Beckman v. McKay, 14 Cal. 250, the court considered the action, which was brought under section 116 of the probate act, as in the nature of an action of trover and conversion; and in Mesmer v. Jenkins, 61 Cal. 151, it is said "that under a statute very similar, if not precisely like sections 1458-1461, Code Civ. Proc., the power of a judge of probate, in respect of matters of this kind, is analogous in its extent and object to the power exercised by courts of chancery upon bills of discovery."

Petitioner relies largely in support of his position upon Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524, and Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195. But we think those cases entirely distinguishable in principle from, and not at all in conflict with, the views expressed in Jahns v. Nolting. There are, it is true, some general expressions and language in those cases which, read without reference to the particular facts of those cases, might be construed as supporting the petitioner's position. But when considered in the light of what was before the court, and the premises from which they were reasoning, any seeming conflict fades away. In the case of Boyd v. U. S., a statute declared that any person who, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, should commit or omit certain acts, should for such offense be fined in any sum not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition, should forfeit the merchandise in respect to which the wrongful acts were performed. Under this statute, an information was filed against certain goods, charging an offense under the act, and asking the forfeiture of the goods. In the course of the proceeding, Boyd having appeared as a claimant of the property, and denied any act of forfeiture, and it being important to the government to show the quantity and value of the goods, a motion was made by the United States district attorney for an order directing the claimant to bring into court a certain invoice alleged by him to be in their possession and to contain proof of the truth of the allegations of fraud made by the United States. Such order was made, and, in obedience to it, the claimants produced the invoice, which was used as evidence against them on the trial. Speaking of the character of the proceeding, it was said by the court (page 634, 116 U. S., and page 534, 6 Sup. Ct.): "In this very case the ground of forfeiture, as declared in the twelfth section of the act of 1874, on which the information is based, consists of certain acts of fraud committed against the public revenue in relation to imported merchandise, which are made criminal by the statute, and it is declared that the offender shall be fined not exceeding $5,000 nor less than $50, or be imprisoned not exceeding two years, or both; and, in addition to such fine, such merchandise shall be forfeited. These are the penalties affixed to the criminal acts, the forfeiture sought by this suit being one of them. If an indictment had been presented against the claimants, upon conviction the forfeiture of the goods could have been included in the judgment. If the government prosecutor elects to waive an indictment, and to file a civil information against the claimants,—that is, civil in form,—can he by this decree take from the proceeding its criminal aspect, and deprive the claimants of their immunities as citizens, and extort from them a production of their private papers, or, as an alternative, a confession of guilt? This cannot be. The information, though technically a civil proceeding, is in substance and effect a criminal one. * * * As, therefore, suits for penalties and forfeitures incurred by the commission of offenses against the law are of this quasi criminal nature, we think they are within the reason of criminal proceedings for all the purposes of the fourth amendment of the constitution and of that portion of the fifth amendment which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself. * * *"

The difference between the proceeding under discussion there and the proceeding complained of here by petitioner was recognized in the same opinion in the following language (page 624, 116 U. S., and 524, 6 Sup. Ct.): "The entry upon premises made by a sheriff or other officer of the law for the purpose of seizing goods and chattels by virtue of a judicial writ, such as an attachment, a sequestration, or an execution, is not within the prohibition of the fourth or fifth amendment, or any other clause of the constitution; nor is the examination of a defendant under oath, after an ineffectual execution, for the purpose of discovering secreted property or credits, to be applied to the payment of a judgment against him, obnoxious to those amendments. But when examined with care it is manifest that there is a total unlikeness of these official acts and proceedings to that which is now under consideration. In the case of stolen goods, the owner from whom they were stolen is entitled to their possession, and, in the case of excisable or dutiable articles, the government has an interest in them for the payment of the duties thereon, and, until such duties are paid, has a right to keep them under observation, or to pursue and drag them from concealment; and, in the case of goods seized on attachment or execution, the creditor is entitled to their seizure in satisfaction of his debt; and the examination of a defendant under oath to obtain a discovery of concealed property or credits is a proceeding merely civil to effect the ends of justice, and is no more than what the court of chancery would direct on a bill for discovery." In the Counselman Case, which was a case growing out of the refusal of Counselman to testify before a grand jury upon an investigation of alleged violations of "An act to regulate commerce," on the ground that his answers might tend to criminate him, the court held it was within the principles announced in the Boyd Case, and reaffirmed those principles. The case of Lees v. U. S., 14 Sup. Ct. 163, is another case falling strictly within the principles of Boyd v. U. S.

These considerations dispose of the main objection of petitioner. The other objections to the constitutionality of the statute are, in our judgment, without merit. Nor is the objection tenable that the proceeding in the probate court involves passing upon title to property, and is, on that ground, without its jurisdiction. Ex parte Casey, 71 Cal. 269, 12 Pac. 118; In re Curry, 25 Hun, 321. Writ denied.

We concur: FITZGERALD, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; BEATTY, C. J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. This is an original petition here by H. M. Levy for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, department No. 9, and Hon. J. V. Coffey, judge thereof, commanding said court and said Coffey to refrain from further prosecuting a certain proceeding instituted in said court against said petitioner. An alternative writ was issued, and on the return day the respondent demurred and answered, and the matter was then submitted.

It appears that the administration of the estate of one Morris Hoeflich, deceased, is pending in the court of respondent, sitting as a probate court, and that one Solomon Hoeflich is administrator of said estate. On the — day of June, 1893, the said Solomon Hoeflich, as such administrator, filed in said court, in the matter of said estate, a certain writing, or petition, the contents of which are substantially these: It is therein averred that, from information derived from persons whose names said administrator is unwilling to disclose, he has ascertained that the said deceased, Morris Hoeflich, prior to and down to the time of his death, "was either a full partner with the said H. M. Levy, or engaged with him jointly in a large number of transactions" in stocks and mines in California and Nevada, and in other property, "the exact nature and extent of which transactions, and of the real and personal estate resulting therefrom, can be ascertained by an examination of the said H. M. Levy and other witnesses under oath, and by the production and examination of books of account, correspondence, checks, deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts, and other writings and documents now in the exclusive possession of said H. M. Levy"; and also by examination of other named persons and documents, etc., in their possession. It is also averred that said Hoeflich, deceased, before his death represented to a number of persons, whose names the administrator is unwilling to disclose, "that he was in partnership and had large joint interests with said H. M. Levy"; and that the fact that he made such representation "confirms and strengthens the information otherwise received by your petitioner, and the conviction produced thereby." It is also averred in general terms that said Levy has concealed, conveyed away, and disposed of moneys, etc., of the said deceased, and has in his possession and within his knowledge deeds and other documents and writings "which contain evidences of and tend to disclose the right, title, interest, and claim of the said decedent to real and personal property," portions of said property being particularly described. The foregoing are, in brief, the material averments of said petition; and it was prayed therein that said Levy be cited to appear before said probate court and undergo an examination under oath as to all the matters set forth in said petition, and subject all his documents, writings, and papers to inspection and examination. A citation was issued according to the prayer of the petition to said Levy, who appeared and demurred to the petition; and, the demurrer having been overruled, he filed a lengthy written-verified answer, in which he specifically denied all the material averments of said petition, and denied that he had any property in which the said decedent was interested, either as a partner or otherwise, or that he had any documents or writings of the character alleged in said petition. He also filed written objections to any further proceeding in the matter of said petition and citation; but the court overruled the objections, and set a day for the examination. Whereupon the said Levy filed here the present petition for a writ of prohibition, setting up all the foregoing facts, and praying that the respondents be restrained from proceeding with said examination; and he contends that said proposed examination is beyond the jurisdiction of said court, and that certain provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon which he contends the proceeding is based, are unconstitutional and void.

The proceeding sought to be prohibited, if valid at all, must rest for its validity upon sections 1459 and 1460 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Our general law of procedure is averse to proceedings which are in their character inquisitorial. The only provision in the Code of Civil Procedure in the nature of a bill of discovery, other than said sections 1459 and 1460, is contained in section 1000, which provides that "any court in which an action is pending, or a judge thereof, may, upon notice, order either party to give to the other, within a specified time, an inspection and copy or permission to take a copy of entries of accounts in any book, or of any document or paper in his possession, or under his control, containing evidence relating to the merits of the action or the defense thereto"; and the proceeding here in question is certainly not under that section. Of course, the probate court would have no jurisdiction over any action to determine conflicting rights of property between the estate of Hoeflich and the petitioner herein, H. M. Levy. Moreover, no such an action is pending.

Sections 1459 and 1460, above referred to, are as follows:

"Section 1459. If any executor, administrator, or other person interested in the estate of a decedent, complains to the superior court or a judge thereof, on oath, that any person is suspected to have concealed, embezzled, smuggled, conveyed away, or disposed of any moneys, goods or chattels of the decedent, or has in his possession or knowledge any deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts or other writings, which contain evidences of or tend to disclose the right, title, interest or claim of the decedent to any real or personal estate, or any claim or demand, or any lost will, the said court or judge may cite such person to appear before such court, and may examine him on oath upon the matter of such complaint. If such person is not in the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted, he may be cited and examined either before the superior court of the county where he is found, or before the superior court of the county where the decedent dies, or where letters have been granted. But if, in the latter case, he appears and is found innocent, his necessary expenses must be allowed him out of the estate.

"Section 1460. If the person so cited refuses to appear and submit to an examination, or to answer such interrogatories as may be put to him touching the matters of the complaint, the court may, by warrant for that purpose, commit him to the county jail, there to remain in close custody until he submits to the order of the court, or is discharged according to law. If, upon such examination, it appears that he has concealed, embezzled, smuggled, conveyed away, or disposed of any moneys, goods or chattels of the decedent, or that he has in his possession or knowledge any deeds, conveyances, bonds, contracts or other writings containing evidences of or tending to disclose the right, title, interest or claim of the decedent to any real or personal estate, claim or demand, or any lost will of the decedent, the court may make an order requiring such person to disclose his knowledge thereof to the executor or administrator, and may commit him to the county jail, there to remain until the order is complied with or he is discharged according to law; and all such interrogatories and answers must be in writing, signed by the party examined, and filed in the court. The order of such disclosure made upon such examination shall be prima facie evidence of the right of the executor or administrator to such property in any action brought for the recovery thereof; and any judgment recovered therein must be for double the value of the property as assessed by the court, or jury, or for return of the property and damages in addition thereto, equal to the value of such property. In addition to the examination of the party, witnesses may be produced and examined on either side."

It is contended by petitioner herein that these provisions are in contravention of section 13 of article 1 of the state constitution, which provides that: "No person shall * * * be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself"; and of section 19 of the same article, which provides that: "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable seizures and searches, shall not be violated." He also contends that they contravene section 11 of said article, which provides that: "All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation," and section 25 of article 4, which provides that no special law shall be passed "regulating the practice of courts of justice," for the reason that they give special privileges to administrators over other litigants. It is also contended that the probate court could not make the orders sought here to be restrained without passing upon rights of property between the estate of Hoeflich and said Levy, which it has no jurisdiction to do.

I shall not discuss any of the above positions taken by petitioner, except the first two. The two provisions that a person shall not be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal case, and shall be secure against unreasonable seizures and searches, are so akin to each other that they are both covered by those judicial decisions and constitutional inhibitions which have established the personal rights and liberties of Englishmen and Americans. A compulsory production of a man's private papers is, in effect, compelling him to be a witness against himself. It will be sufficient, however, in this case, to particularly consider only the first of these two provisions, although the second is necessarily involved. And, basing our decision on that provision, I am of the opinion that upon the principles announced, and the decisions made by the supreme court of the United States in the cases of Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524; Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195; and Lees v. U. S., 14 Sup. Ct. 163,—the contention of petitioner must be sustained, and that the writ of prohibition should issue as prayed for. If the proceeding in the probate court sought here to be restrained were, in form, a "criminal case," there could be no plausible contention that, in view of section 13 of article 1 of the state constitution, the petitioner could be compelled to be a witness against himself. But in the Boyd Case it was held that the fourth and fifth amendments to the federal constitution—which are similar to said sections 13 and 19 of our state constitution—applied to a proceeding to recover a penalty or forfeiture, although the proceeding was not criminal in form. That was a suit to forfeit Boyd's property for an alleged violation of a revenue law, and the court held that to compel him to produce books and papers as evidence against him was a violation of said amendments. The court say that suits for penalties and forfeitures "are within the reason of criminal proceedings for all the purposes of the fourth amendment to the constitution, and of that provision of the fifth amendment which declares that no person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." The court further say that "illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely, by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure," and that "this can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy, and leads to gradual deprivation of the right, as if it consisted more in sound than substance." Afterwards the same court, in Counselman v. Hitchcock, 142 U. S. 547, 12 Sup. Ct. 195, expressly approved the decision in the Boyd Case, and declared that in the Boyd Case it was held that a statute which authorized a court to require a party to produce his private papers in court was "unconstitutional and void, as applied to a suit for a penalty or to establish a forfeiture of the goods of the party, because it was repugnant to the fourth and fifth amendments of the constitution"; and, furthermore, that "it is an ancient principle of the law of evidence that a witness shall not be compelled, in any proceeding, to make disclosures or to give testimony which will tend to criminate him, or to subject him to fines, penalties, or forfeitures." But the principle was still more directly decided in the late case of Lees v. U. S., 14 Sup. Ct. 163. That was a civil action brought by the United States to recover a penalty of $1,000 for the violation of an act of congress prohibiting the importation of aliens under contracts for labor. The circuit court compelled Lees, one of the defendants, to become a witness for the government, against his objection that the suit was in the nature of a criminal proceeding, and that he could not be compelled to testify; and on a writ of error to the United States supreme court the judgment was reversed. The supreme court, by Mr. Justice Brewer, said: "This, though an action in civil form, is unquestionably criminal in its nature; and in such a case a defendant cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself. It is unnecessary to do more than to refer to the case of Boyd v. U. S., 116 U. S. 616, 6 Sup. Ct. 524. The question was fully and elaborately considered in that case; and within the rule there laid down it was error to compel this defendant to give testimony in behalf of the government."

It is quite clear that said sections 1459 and 1460 include a "penalty" within the meaning of the authorities above noticed. Indeed, the whole scope of the proceeding which it is their purpose to authorize is, in its nature, quasi criminal. It is founded upon the fact that the party to be examined "is suspected" of being guilty either of the embezzlement or smuggling, or of the fraudulent concealment and secret and unlawful disposition of property of another. Certain things are to be done if he "is found innocent." But, if the contrary is found, then an order for disclosure is to be made, which he must obey or be sent to jail. And then it is provided that such order for disclosure shall be prima facie evidence of the right of the administrator to the property involved in any action brought for the recovery of such property; and that "any judgment recovered therein must be for double the value of the property as assessed by the court or jury, or for return of the property, and damages in addition thereto equal to the value of such property." It is thus sought to compel the party examined to testify, and to produce his private papers for the purpose of furnishing evidence upon which may be based an order that will make a prima facie case against him in an action for a penalty which may be of the most grave character. If he be defeated in such action, although he may have defended it with the utmost good faith, and under an honest claim of right, the judgment against him will not be, as in ordinary civil actions, for the value of the property or its return with the usual incidental damages, but, in addition to that, the judgment "must be" for a second full value of the property as a penalty, and cases might easily arise where the amount of such penalty would greatly exceed the highest fine provided as punishment for a crime by any section of the Penal Code. I am satisfied, therefore, that the said sections of the Code are within the inhibition of the constitutional provision of said section 13 of the constitution and the state. And, under the rule and the authorities above cited, a person in the position of the petitioner cannot be compelled to give testimony or produce papers which would tend to make a case against him, or furnish data or links of evidence favorable to such case. I have just noticed the recent case of U. S. v. James, reported in 60 Fed. 257, in which Judge Grosscup of the United States district court, N. D. Illinois, in a very interesting opinion, discusses the subject here under review at great length. In that case the learned judge holds that a person cannot be compelled to testify or produce documents that may tend to criminate him, although there be a statute providing that he shall not be prosecuted or punished for the matter about which his testimony is sought. He holds that the purpose of the fourth and fifth amendments was not confined to the protection of a witness against "law-inflicted pains and penalties only," but that the purpose was "to make the secrets of memory, so far as they brought one's former acts within the definitions of crime, inviolate as against judicial probe or disclosure"; and that "the privilege of silence, against a criminal accusation, guaranteed by the fifth amendment, was meant to extend to all the consequences of disclosure." This doctrine is, perhaps, extreme. It may be that a statute exempting a witness from prosecution and from any exposure to penalties or forfeitures for the acts or things about which he is called upon to testify might remove him from behind the constitutional shield. I have noticed the James Case, however, because it is the latest judicial expression upon the general subject, and because the opinion discusses very fully the personal rights of individuals under English and American institutions. Of course, if our views hereinbefore expressed, and the authorities therein cited, are correct, the petitioner herein can invoke these constitutional principles equally with one who is a party to an action which is strictly in form criminal.

If the administrator of the estate of Hoefflich, deceased, believes, from information which he has, that said estate has a just cause of action against the petitioner herein, he has the privilege of bringing an action against said petitioner in the proper court; and when said action is pending he may avail himself, like other litigants, of the provisions of section 1000 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have an inspection of such books, documents, and papers in the possession of said petitioner as the court may deem proper, and may also examine said petitioner as a witness in the case. I think that a peremptory writ of prohibition should issue as prayed for in the petition.

BURRIS v. KENNEDY et al.¹ (No. 15,634.)
PROBATE SALES OF LAND—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. A probate sale of realty, when collaterally attacked by the grantee of a distributee under the final decree, who raised no objection to the validity of the sale, will not be set aside for mere irregularities.

2. Where an order of probate sale of realty recites that at the hearing thereon the court "heard, understood, and fully considered the law and the premises," it will be assumed that it heard evidence as to the value of the property sold, and the sale will not, on collateral attack, be set aside because of the absence in the petition for sale of an allegation of the value of said property.

3. Where a petition in the probate court for the sale of realty recited that the petitioner "duly made and returned to said court * * * a true inventory and appraisement of all the estate" of deceased, as "will more fully appear by reference to the papers on file in the clerk's office," it will be assumed, on a collateral attack on the sale, that the realty was inventoried and appraised as required by statute, and its actual cash value there stated, so as to supply an omission in the petition to state the value of the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Jesse Burris against Catherine Kennedy and others to quiet title. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hutchinson & Campbell and Donald Y. Campbell, for appellants. Sharp & Bolton, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to quiet title, and grows out of the claim of respondent that a probate sale of real estate, made in the estate of James Kennedy, deceased, was void. The respondent is a grantee of Annie Church, an heir of Kennedy, and it is conceded occupies no more advantageous position in this litigation than would Annie herself, if the party plaintiff. Judgment went for the respondent, and this appeal is from that judgment and from the order denying a motion for a new trial. Respondent at the trial made numerous objections to the validity of the sale, but many of them are directed to mere irregularities, and are highly technical—entirely too technical to be considered when a collateral attack is made upon the judgment and decree confirming the sale. It was well said in Burris v. Adams, 96 Cal. 664, 31 Pac. 565: "In a doubtful case a court will not lean towards the attacking party, when he is, as in the case at bar, a mere volunteer, and when his grantor was a distributee in the final decree based upon the validity of the sale, and made no objection to it, and received without question the benefit of the money paid into the estate by the purchaser at the sale." And we reiterate that such a grantee must come before the court with something more substantial than irregularities in the proceeding, before probate sales of realty will be set aside in actions of the present character. Courts now hold much more liberal views upon these matters than are indicated in the early judicial history of the state; and, since the enactment by the legislature of section 1537 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it now reads,—which legislation in part was placed upon the statute books by reason of the prior rigorous holding of the court against the validity of probate sales,—the cases have been very exceptional in which by collateral attack sales have been annulled and set aside; and the advance upon liberal lines which the court has made in this class of litigation is largely attributable to the broader jurisdiction with which the court is now possessed under the present constitution, as compared to that which rested upon it in earlier times. The petition for sale of real estate involved in the present action asked that six certain tracts of land be sold. Five of these tracts were fully described, and their valuation and condition stated. The remaining tract, and the one in which we are now interested, is described in said petition as follows: "A piece of property bounded westerly by Bihler property, east by property line, southerly by the Central Pacific Railroad, northerly by East Fourteenth street, being an undivided one-fourth interest, valued at one thousand dollars per acre." No complaint is now made as to the sufficiency of the description, but it is claimed that, as to this particular tract of land, the petition is jurisdictionally defective, in this: that no valuation is placed upon it, and thus a positive demand of the statute omitted. The acreage of the tract not being stated, it is claimed that the valuation of $1,000 per acre gives the court no light as to its value, for it is impossible from the face of the description to even estimate the acreage. The trial court held that the objection to the admission of the petition in evidence upon this ground was well taken, that the petition was fatally defective, and the sale thereunder void for this reason. We see no other matter disclosed by the record pertaining to the validity of the probate proceedings leading up to the sale, the confirmation thereof, and the delivery of the deed, of sufficient importance to demand extended consideration. This is rather a small matter upon which to set aside a sale of real estate in an action to quiet title. The description of the land is sufficient, its condition is shown, and a valuation placed upon it by the acre. In addition, the order of sale recites that at the hearing of the application the court "heard, understood, and fully considered the law and the premises"; and, upon such a recital in the decree, we must assume that the court heard evidence upon the question of value. Under the foregoing state of facts, we are not now prepared to say that the sale was invalid by reason of the absence in the petition of an allegation of the total value of the tract.

But there are other reasons for sustaining the sale more weighty than these. The petition recites "that your petitioner duly made and returned to said court * * * a true inventory and appraisement of all the estate of said deceased, * * * all of which will more fully appear by reference to the papers on file in the clerk's office * * * in the matter of said estate, which is hereby made." By reason of this reference, the inventory and the appraisement are to be considered a part of the petition, and omissions of material statements from the petition may be supplied by statements from the inventory and appraisement. It was said in Stuart v. Allen, 16 Cal. 501: "Nor is it essential that there should be in the petition itself, and without reference to any other paper or thing, a statement of these facts. The main fact required is the averment of the insufficiency of personal assets, and mere formal defects in the mode of statement would not affect the jurisdiction. The reference to the inventory makes, for all purposes of the reference, the inventory a part of the petition." This principle is also recognized in Estate of Boland, 55 Cal. 310. The inventory and appraisement in the estate of Kennedy, deceased, is not in the record, but we must assume in this character of action that the particular tract of land involved was not only inventoried, but that it was appraised, as required by the statute, and its actual cash value there stated, and, if the value of the land sought to be sold is such a material and jurisdictional fact that its recital in the petition is absolutely necessary, then a reference to the appraisement upon file among the records of the estate for such information satisfies the statute. The fact that this reference is general for all purposes, rather than special for one purpose, in no way weakens its effect; and upon principle, and also upon the reasoning of Stuart v. Allen, supra, we think the defective statement of facts found in the petition proper is cured by the reference. In the case of Dennis v. Winter, 63 Cal. 16, the validity of a probate sale was upheld, although the record disclosed that the petition for sale placed no valuation whatever upon the land sought to be sold, and the order of sale found as a fact the appraised value alone. The court held that, in view of the last clause of section 1537, Code Civ. Proc., the petition, aided by the order, was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the proceeding. For the foregoing reasons, the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

APPEAL—NOTICE—RECORD.

An appeal will be dismissed where the record does not show service of the notice of appeal, required by Pen. Code, § 1240, and no certificate of the clerk that there was service has been filed, though permission to file such certificate, on the ground that the failure of the record to show such service was due to an error of the printer, was asked several months before the dismissal.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGarvey, Judge.

A demurrer to the information against W. H. Swearinger was sustained, and the people appeal. Dismissed.

J. E. Pemberton, for the People. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The information in this case charges that on the 15th day of August, 1893, in the county of Mendocino, the defendant, W. H. Swearinger, "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously alter and deface the earmarks and brand of one certain roan spotted yearling steer, the property of and belonging to one P. M. Bucknell, with the intent to thereby steal the same, and to prevent identification thereof by the said P. M. Bucknell, the true owner." The defendant demurred to the information upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The demurrer was sustained, and from the order or judgment thereupon entered the people appeal.

The record does not show that the notice of appeal was served upon the attorney of the adverse party, or upon any one, as required by section 1240 of the Penal Code, and on that ground the respondent moves to dismiss the appeal. The appellant, in the reply brief, admits that the record is defective in not showing that the notice of appeal was served, but says that it was in fact properly served, and that the omission was an error of the printer. A diminution of the record is then suggested, and leave is asked "to file a certificate of the clerk of the court below showing that there was due service." The reply brief was filed August 2, 1894, but no certificate of the clerk of the court below, or other paper, showing that there was due service, has been filed in this court. It follows that the appeal cannot be considered, and that it should be dismissed. People v. Phillips, 45 Cal. 44; People v. Clark, 49 Cal. 455; People v. Bell, 70 Cal. 33, 11 Pac. 327.

Action of ejectment by Charles McLaughlin against Peter Menotti. McLaughlin having deceased, Kate M. Dillon and Mary A. Crocker were substituted as parties plaintiff, and claim title under the land grant to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and conveyances therefrom. Defendant claims under a selection by and a listing to the state of the lands as lieu school lands. On a former appeal from judgment for defendant (26 Pac. 880, 89 Cal. 354), the cause was remanded because of the failure by the trial court to find whether defendant's grantor was a bona fide settler upon the premises in question. From a second judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

PER CURIAM. Upon the former appeal in this case (89 Cal. 354, 26 Pac. 880) the case was remanded for a new trial, for failure of the trial court to find whether Hirleman, the predecessor of the defendant, was a bona fide settler upon the lands involved in the action, within the meaning of section 4 of the act of congress of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 358), amending the act of July 1, 1862. That section, so far as applicable to the present case, as found in the printed volume of the statutes, reads as follows: "And any lands granted by this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, shall not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp-land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation, or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler, or any lands returned and denominated as mineral lands, and the timber necessary to support his said improvements as a miner, or agriculturist," etc.; and this court, in its opinion upon the former appeal, assumed this reading to be correct. Upon the subsequent trial of the cause, the superior court found that Hirleman was a bona fide settler, within the meaning of the act of congress, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs have appealed from this judgment upon the findings alone. Counsel for appellants has now produced a copy of the enrolled act on file in the department of state at Washington, under the seal of the department, and certified by the secretary of state, from which it appears that the true reading of the foregoing portion of the statute is as follows: "And any lands granted by this act, or the act to which this is an amendment, shall not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp-land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler on any lands returned and denominated as mineral lands, and the timber necessary to support his said improvements as a miner, or agriculturist," etc.

We must accept this certified copy of the act as the authentic statute and expression of the legislative will. What are the provisions of a statute is a question of law to be determined by the court upon an examination of the statute itself, and the enrolled copy of the act is the statute or legislative will, by which courts are to be governed. If there is any variance between an act as found in the printed volume of statutes, and the original, as enrolled and deposited with the secretary of state, the latter must prevail. Section 1875 (3), Code Civ. Proc., provides that the courts of this state shall take judicial knowledge of public acts of the legislative department of the United States, and declares that "the court may resort for its aid to appropriate books or documents of reference." In the absence of the original act, a copy, certified by its legal custodian to be correct, must be accepted as the highest proof of its terms. It is worthy of note that in two cases in which the statute under consideration has been before the supreme court of the United States it is quoted in their opinion in the terms found in the foregoing copy, as certified by the secretary of state (Broder v. Water Co., 101 U. S. 276; Railroad Co. v. Dunmeyer, 113 U. S. 635, 5 Sup. Ct. 566); thus furnishing persuasive evidence that the error in the printed volume had been previously called to the attention of that court. As the court has found "that no part of said lands are or were mineral lands, or were returned or denominated as mineral lands," its finding that Hirleman was a bona fide settler is immaterial, since it is only the improvements of a bona fide settler on such lands that are referred to in the act; and, as the other questions presented in the action were determined upon the former appeal in favor of the present appellants, we are required to reverse the judgment, and direct that a judgment be entered upon the findings in favor of the appellants. The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter a judgment in favor of the appellants for the recovery of the lands described in the findings, and for the amount of rents and profits therein found.

PEPPER v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 15,420.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1895.)

RAILROAD CROSSING ACCIDENT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES FOR DEATH OF ADULT SON.

1. A person killed at a railroad crossing, by a train running 30 or 35 miles per hour, had just driven rapidly to the crossing from a point 400 feet therefrom, where there was a view of the track in the direction from which the train was coming for four-fifths of a mile from the crossing, with the exception of the 1,500 feet next to the crossing, which were obscured by an orchard extending along the side of the highway to the railroad right of way, which was 100 feet wide. Deceased did not attempt to check his horses till coming into the right of way, when, they being frightened, he was unable to stop them. Held, that he was negligent, as he, when 400 feet distant, either could have seen the train, or thereafter drove at a reckless speed.

2. An engineer who sees that the driver of a team rapidly approaching a crossing does not observe the approaching train, and that there will be a collision unless the team stops, is not negligent in giving signals when both are near the crossing, though the horses are frightened thereby.

3. A person's negligence in attempting to cross ahead of a train which he saw or heard approaching is not affected by the fact that it was running unusually fast.

4. Where a person knew that a train was due at a crossing 8 minutes before it struck him, there was no excuse for his negligent approach to the crossing, he having for 15 minutes previously been in sight and hearing of the crossing.

5. In an action for the death of a relative, it is error to charge that the measure of damages is "not alone the pecuniary loss and injury" of plaintiff, but that, "in addition," plaintiff's loss by being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of deceased may be considered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by William Pepper against the Southern Pacific Company for death of a son. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

H. V. Morehouse, Hiram D. Tuttle, H. L. Gear, S. Frohman, and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. D. M. Delmas, W. L. Gill, and Bull & Cleary, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Miles Pepper, a young man of 25 years, in driving across the track of the defendant's railroad in or near the town of Los Gatos, was killed by a passing train. Miles was never married, and the plaintiff, his father and heir at law, brought this action, alleging that his son's death was caused by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant. The answer denied all negligence on the part of the defendant, and alleged that the death of the deceased was caused by his own negligence. The jury found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $8,000. This appeal is from the judgment, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Several exceptions were taken to evidence, and to instructions given and refused, and it is further specified that the verdict is not justified by the evidence in many particulars. The more important specifications of insufficiency of the evidence are, in substance (1) that the evidence was insufficient to show negligence on the part of the defendant; and (2) that it does show negligence on the part of the deceased contributing proximately to the accident.

The complaint alleged the negligence of the defendant to consist in not giving any warning, either by ringing a bell or sounding a whistle, of the approach of the train, and in causing the train to approach the crossing at a reckless and negligent rate of speed, and in its negligence in obstructing the view of its track at said crossing. Some of plaintiff's witnesses testified that no bell was rung or whistle blown as a warning of the approach of the train to the crossing, nor until the danger signal was blown, when the engine was so near the crossing that it was too late to prevent the accident; others said they did not hear any whistle or bell until the danger signal was given; while about an equal number of defendant's witnesses testified that the bell was rung continuously from the time the train left the station at Los Gatos, a little more than three-fourths of a mile from the place of the accident, until the train stopped after the accident. It is not necessary to discuss the question whether this evidence was sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the bell was not rung, inasmuch as the negligence of the defendant in not giving warning of the approach of the train to the crossing—if it did not give such warning—is not conclusive of its liability.

As to the rate of speed of the train, the evidence was without conflict that it was going at the rate of 30 or 35 miles per hour. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that it is negligent or dangerous to run at that speed; and there is nothing in the record to show, as matter of fact, that it was negligent, unless it can be said to be negligence to cross any public road at a speed of 35 miles an hour, and that is not claimed by respondent. Nor is there anything in the record tending to show that the defendant obstructed the view of its track at said crossing, whether negligently or otherwise. Conceding, for the purposes of the case, that the defendant did not give the required warning of the approach of its train to the crossing, and that the omission was negligent, we think that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, for the reason that the defendant's negligence proximately contributed to cause the accident resulting in his death. The deceased was engaged in driving a butcher's wagon, delivering meat to customers. The accident occurred where a public road, known as "Showers' Lane," crosses the track of defendant's railroad. Showers' lane runs east and west, and the railroad north and south; and this crossing is 4,444 feet north of defendant's station at Los Gatos. Deceased had served one or more customers on the west side of the crossing the morning of the accident; then went over the crossing to the east side of the railroad; and, at the time of the accident, was again crossing the track at the same place, going west, and the train was going north. On the east side of the railroad, and south side of Showers' lane, there is a small orchard extending southerly from the lane 280 feet, which obstructs the view of the railroad track and of trains south of the crossing as the crossing is approached from the east, until the railroad right of way is reached, which is there 80 feet wide, or 40 feet on each side of the center of the track. A fence on the easterly line of the right of way separated it from the orchard. On the easterly side of the orchard, and crossing Showers' lane, is University avenue, which deceased crossed in going to the railroad crossing; and at that point a train can be seen on any part of the railroad between the Los Gatos depot and the place where the accident occurred, except for the space of 1,000 to 1,500 feet next to the crossing, which was obscured by the orchard and a house and barn in the orchard. The distance between University avenue and the railroad right of way is not stated in the record, except by reference to a map which is not before us; but Mr. Wheeler, who lives on the easterly side of the avenue, testified that the distance from his house to the crossing was 20 or 25 rods, and the avenue is stated to be 60 feet wide. Assuming the distance from the easterly line of the avenue to the easterly line of the right of way to be 25 rods, the distance in feet would be 412; or, if 20 rods, 330 feet. Taking the longer of the distances from the crossing that a train would be hidden by the orchard from a person on Showers' lane opposite the avenue, viz. 1,500 feet, the distance from the center of the avenue to the railroad was at least one-third of the distance that the train would have to pass after it disappeared behind the orchard; so that, if the train were running at a speed of 30 miles an hour, the deceased must have driven at the rate of 10 miles an hour to be upon the crossing in time to be struck by the train. But, if the train was not behind the orchard when he crossed the avenue, it must have been, according to the undisputed testimony, where he could not fail to see it if he had looked. If he approached the crossing at the rate of speed above stated, and did not stop before attempting to cross the track, it was not simply negligence, but recklessness. Mr. Wheeler testified that, when deceased left him, he drove directly towards the crossing, and that he was driving at the "usual gait." What that gait was he did not otherwise state. Jennie Joachim, a girl then 13 years of age, called by the defendant, appears to have been in Showers' lane at some place west of the crossing, and was returning, and at the time of the accident was standing on the west side of the railroad about the edge of the right of way, and at the north side of the lane, and saw the deceased, as well as the train, approach the crossing. She testified that the deceased was driving "very rapidly"; that "he came into the railroad right of way, and tried to check his horses, and the train was about 100 feet from the crossing when it whistled and scared the horses, and they started across. He couldn't hold them. I saw him try to check them, but he couldn't do it. He just hollered 'Whoa' at them. Before that he was driving very rapidly. He had a butcher wagon, with a covered top." Upon cross-examination her testimony given before the coroner was read, and disclosed very clearly that her estimate of the distance of 100 feet was not reliable. The engineer testified that he got a glimpse of the top of the wagon through the trees before he could see the horses, and sounded the whistle; that he saw the wagon still coming pretty rapidly towards the track, and gave several short blasts of the whistle; the horses were in full gallop; that he applied the brake, reversed the engine, and used sand; that he "judged" he was 250 to 300 feet from the crossing when he whistled. Mr. Crabtree, an assistant agent of the defendant, was in the fourth or fifth coach from the engine, next an open window. When he heard the danger signal, he looked out, "and saw he was coming towards the track at a pretty high rate of speed. * * * When I first looked out, the horses' heads were just inside the railway inclosure." There is not only no evidence that the deceased used any care or made any effort to ascertain whether a train was approaching, but the evidence excludes the possibility of his having used any reasonable care or caution in approaching the crossing. The fact that his view was obstructed after he crossed University avenue made it negligence on his part to drive at a rate of speed which not only interfered with his hearing an approaching train, but made it difficult or impossible to stop. If he could not see an approaching train because his vision was obstructed, ordinary care for his own safety required him to stop in order that his hearing should not also be obstructed, and, in any event, to make his approach so slowly as to give him complete control of his team, and enable him to stop instantly if occasion required.

So far as the negligence of the deceased is concerned, we see no conflict in the evidence; and it is well settled in this state and elsewhere that, if his negligence contributed proximately to the accident resulting in his death, the plaintiff cannot recover, even though the defendant negligently omitted to give the warning of the approach of the train which the law and its duty required. Hagar v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 309, 33 Pac. 119; Fleming v. Railroad Co., 49 Cal. 253; Glascock v. Railroad Co., 73 Cal. 137, 14 Pac. 518. It is said, however, that the train was running at a rate of speed faster than usual. This could not affect the question, since the deceased could not have been misled by the unusual speed of the train, unless he saw or heard the train, and undertook to cross ahead of it; and to make such attempt and fail is conclusive evidence of negligence. Nor is the fact that the train was 8 minutes late any excuse for the neglect of the deceased to take proper precautions in approaching the track. If he knew the precise time the train passed this crossing when on time, he must have known that it had not passed. He crossed the track going east about 15 minutes before the accident, which was before the train was due, and, while he was on the east side, he was at no time beyond sight and hearing of the train if it had passed. On the other hand, if he did not know when the train was due, it was clearly his duty, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence for his own safety, to use all reasonable means to ascertain whether he might then cross without danger from a passing train.

It is argued by respondent that "if his horses were frightened by the negligent blowing of the whistle, and ran before they reached the right of way," it would not show that he did not intend to stop, look, and listen when he reached a point where he could view the track. This argument assumes that the blowing of the whistle was negligence. We think it was not. The engineer, when he saw the wagon approaching behind the trees at a rapid gate, could not assume that the driver heard the train; and, under such circumstances, his duty was to attract the driver's attention by blowing the whistle. If the deceased had stopped his team, and thus indicated that he was aware of the approaching train, and was waiting for it to pass before attempting to cross, a different question might have been presented if the horses became frightened and unmanageable because of the sounding of the whistle. In a similar case the supreme court of Iowa, said: "When the engineer saw the team, the whistle sounded twice: This, as we suppose, was the call for brakes; but counsel for the plaintiff insist that, if it had not been done, the collision would not have occurred. Possibly this is so, but the question is, was the engineer negligent in thus sounding the whistle? We think not. In the first place, the engineer saw the horses close to the track, and that a collision would certainly occur unless something was done immediately to prevent it. To sound the whistle under the circumstances in the pending emergency was, we think, prudent and proper. There was no time for reflection. It was the usual thing to do, and, if the engineer had failed to do so, we think he possibly would have been negligent if a collision had occurred because of such failure." Schaefer v. Railway Co., 62 Iowa, 624, 17 N. W. 893.

No exceptions were taken to the instructions given at plaintiff's request, but, as the judgment and order must be reversed upon the ground hereinbefore considered, it is proper to notice instructions not excepted to, in view of further proceedings.

The fifth instruction given to the jury upon the point last above discussed was misleading and erroneous in two particulars:

First. That it assumes that if the deceased could not see the train, and was not aware of its approach, he was not negligent. We have already held that, if he could not see the train because of obstructions, he was negligent in not resorting to other means reasonably within his power to ascertain whether a train was near. And, second, it assumes that in blowing the whistle the engineer was negligent.

The court instructed the jury, at defendant's request, that the damages must be confined to the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff; but afterwards, upon its own motion, the court further instructed the jury "that the measure of damages is not alone the pecuniary loss and injury sustained by the plaintiff in the loss of his son, as just explained; but in assessing the damages you may, in addition, take into consideration the loss, if any, sustained by plaintiff in being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased by reason of his death."

* * * You are not to take into consideration sorrow, grief, or mental suffering, if any, occasioned by the death of decedent." This instruction is erroneous. In Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 95 Cal. 510, 30 Pac. 603, the court below, in an action brought by the mother for the death of her infant daughter, charged the jury that "the jury is not limited by the actual pecuniary injury sustained by her by reason of the death of her child"; and it was held that the instruction was erroneous. This question was fully discussed in that case, and it was clearly held that, in an action for damages for the death of a relative, the relations existing between the plaintiff and the deceased could only be considered in estimating the pecuniary loss. Here the jury were instructed that they were "not limited by the actual pecuniary injury sustained by the plaintiff." The instruction, therefore, permitted the jury to give the plaintiff more than his "actual" pecuniary loss. What meaning the court intended to convey by the word "actual" is not clear, but it is comprehensive enough to include all pecuniary loss, and that in actions of this character is the limit of compensatory damages. Besides, the jury were instructed that they might, "in addition,"—that is, in addition to the actual pecuniary injury,—"take into consideration the loss, if any, in being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased." Here "the loss" is not restricted to pecuniary loss, but as was said in Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., supra, the jury "were given wide range to run into any wild and excessive verdict which their caprice might suggest." It may well be doubted whether the facts of this case justified any, even the most guarded, instruction in relation to compensation for the deprivation of the comfort, society, and protection of the deceased. The son was 25 years of age, and had the legal right to change his residence to a remote part of the state or of the world at any time he chose. He was not living with the plaintiff, though in the same town. The case was not like that of husband and wife,—a relation which the law presumes would have continued until the death of the plaintiff; nor like that of parent and minor child, where the right to select the residence of the child and to retain his society, during minority, is given by the law.

Some other instructions are criticised by appellant, but the general discussion we have given will sufficiently cover all other questions arising upon the instructions.

The only serious error in ruling upon the admission of evidence was corrected by the court.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded.

BOOB et al. v. HALL et al. (No. 19,550.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1895.)

SUIT FOR LAND — FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE — BOND ON APPEAL—DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 945, providing that, on appeal from a judgment for the sale of real property, a stay bond to secure appellee against waste, and to secure payment for the use and occupation of the property in case of affirmance, shall be given for "a sum to be fixed by the court by which the judgment was rendered or order made," and that, "when the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency," the trial court has power to fix the amount of the bond in respect to waste, use and occupation, and deficiency. Harrison, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by Paul Boob and others against Lavinia Hall and others to foreclose a mortgage. There was a decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. The cause appeared on a motion by defendants for an order restraining the sheriff from executing his deed to the purchaser at the sale held under such order of foreclosure. Granted.

Goodcell & Leonard, for appellants. Geo. B. Cole, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage in which a decree of foreclosure was rendered for plaintiffs, from which defendants have appealed. The sheriff sold the property, and is about to give a deed to the purchaser; and this case is now before us on a motion of defendants to set aside the sale, and restrain the sheriff from executing a deed, upon the ground that defendants have given an undertaking on appeal which stays execution. The undertaking is in the penal sum of $1,000, and provides that, in case the judgment is affirmed, the appellants will not suffer waste, and will pay the value of the use, etc., of the premises, and also any deficiency that may arise upon the sale; and the undertaking recites that the said $1,000 is the amount fixed by the judge of the court to include the said deficiency. There is certainly no provision of the Code applicable to the matter of a bond for a deficiency judgment upon appeal from a decree foreclosing a mortgage other than section 945, Code Civ. Proc. Section 942, which requires a bond in double the amount of the judgment, is clearly not applicable. It refers solely to a judgment in personam for a certain sum of money, and provides that, upon affirmance on appeal, the sureties must pay the whole amount, or have personal judgment entered against them therefor. It is obvious that such a provision could not apply to sureties on a bond for an unascertained deficiency. Nor is there any other section of the Code which throws any light on the question here involved. Section 945 is as follows: "If the judgment or order appealed from direct the sale or delivery of possession of real property, the execution of the same cannot be stayed unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant, with two or more sureties, to the effect that during the possession of such property by the appellant he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that if the judgment be affirmed or the appeal dismissed he will pay the value of the use and occupation of the property from the time of the appeal until the delivery of possession thereof, pursuant to the judgment or order, not exceeding a sum to be fixed by the judge of the court by which the judgment was rendered or order made, and which must be specified in the undertaking. When the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency." This is the section—and the only section—which provides for a stay bond on appeal from a judgment which directs "the sale * * * of real property," and particularly "the sale of mortgaged premises and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale." The only question is as to how the amount of the bond for deficiency is to be fixed, if it is to be fixed at all; and the answer to the question is not entirely free from difficulty. After mature consideration, however, our conclusion is that the legislature, when framing section 945, intended to give to the judge the power to fix the amount of the bond in all the three matters mentioned in the section; namely, waste, use and occupation, and deficiency. They are all in the same section, and are being dealt with as one group. If the last sentence, referring to deficiency, had been put into the section at a place preceding the words "to be fixed by the judge," or if it had not followed a period and commenced with a capital, there would have been no doubt on that subject. But its mere position in the section does not make it independent of the preceding clause, which is naturally as applicable to it as to any other clause therein. Moreover, as the Code nowhere else provides a way for fixing the amount of a deficiency bond, and as the universal rule of the Code is to fix the amounts of statutory bonds, or to provide how they shall be fixed, we are not to suppose that the legislature intended to leave a hiatus in this instance, unless we are necessarily driven to that conclusion. We find no decisions directly in point.

When the case of Englund v. Lewis was decided (25 Cal. 337), although the law of procedure differed in many respects from our present Code, section 352 of the practice act was in the exact language of section 945 of the Code; and in that case, although the point was not raised or discussed, counsel and court seemed to assume that the amount of a deficiency bond should be fixed by the judge. The court, in its opinion, says: "They also, in proper time, executed and filed their undertaking on appeal, having first applied to the judge of the court for and obtained an order, under section 352 of the practice act, fixing the amount of the undertaking at two thousand dollars to stay waste, and secure the value of the use and occupation of the premises ordered to be sold, and to pay any deficiency unpaid upon said judgment, etc. The appeal thus perfected was passed upon by the supreme court," etc. Under the Code, the amount of the bond must be fixed by the judge, or it must be in general terms, without stating any amount at all, which would be out of harmony with all the other provisions of the Code. Moreover, in such case, in what amount would the sureties be called upon to justify? In that event the judge would have to fix the amount of the justification, which would be doing in substance the very thing denied him in the first instance. In Englund v. Lewis, supra, it was held that the judgment there under review was a dual judgment,—one at law in personam for a sum of money, and one in equity decreeing the enforcement of a vendor's lien. It was first adjudged that "plaintiff do have and recover from said defendants the sum of" $3,205, with costs, etc.; and then followed a decree in equity declaring and providing for the enforcement of the lien. It was held that, under the law then obtaining, such a judgment might be entered even in case of a mortgage, and that the personal judgment was entirely distinct from the decree, and might be enforced immediately by a fi. fa., without regard to the sale of the mortgaged premises. Therefore, it was held that a bond on appeal against waste, deficiency, etc., while it stayed the decree of sale, did not stay the personal judgment, and that the latter could be stayed only by giving a bond in double the amount of the judgment. Whether such a judgment could be properly rendered in an action to foreclose a mortgage under section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the construction put upon it by decisions of this court, is a question which does not here arise; for the judgment in the case at bar is not of that character, either in form or substance. It merely follows the form now in common use, and, after reciting that a certain sum is due upon the debt and mortgage, immediately proceeds to order, adjudge, and decree that the mortgaged premises be sold, the proceeds applied to costs, counsel fees, etc., and the sum due, with interest; and that, if there be any deficiency after the sale, "a judgment of this court be docketed," etc. There was no judgment which could be enforced by common execution. The defendants were therefore required to give no stay bond other than one for waste, occupation, and deficiency; and the amount of the deficiency could not be ascertained until after the application of the proceeds of the sale. It would be great injustice to require an appellant in such a case to give a bond in double the amount of the sum for which the premises are to be sold, for they might be ample security for twice that sum. It appears, for instance, that in the case at bar the premises sold for the full amount found due. It is ordered that all proceedings in this case be stayed until the determination of the appeal herein, and that the sheriff of San Benito county be, and he hereby is, enjoined and restrained from executing a deed of conveyance to the purchaser or purchasers of the mortgaged premises under the sale thereof heretofore made.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; VAN FLEET, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

HARRISON, J. I dissent. To hold that under section 945 the judge may fix the amount of the undertaking for the deficiency required, in order to stay proceedings upon an appeal from a judgment for the sale of mortgaged premises, is to make a law, rather than to give construction to a law that has been enacted by the legislature. The legislature has given the judge authority to fix the amount of such undertaking for only two purposes, viz. to secure the respondent against waste, and for the recovery of the value of the use and occupation in case the judgment is affirmed. Where the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises, an undertaking for the value of the use and occupation is not required (Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal. 354); and consequently no order fixing the amount is proper. The legislature has said, in clear and unambiguous language, that "when the judgment is for the sale of mortgaged premises, and the payment of a deficiency arising upon the sale, the undertaking must also provide for the payment of such deficiency." This is an absolute requirement, and cannot be limited by any order of the judge. To give to this clause the construction that, instead of providing for the payment of the deficiency, —that is, the whole deficiency,—the undertaking need provide for the payment of only such sum as the judge may determine will be the deficiency, is to interpolate into the clause a provision that the legislature has not made, and to give to the appellant a stay of proceedings without securing to the respondent the means of satisfying his judgment. In the present case the judge did not make any order fixing an amount for which an undertaking should be given to secure payment of the deficiency, but made an order fixing "the amount of the undertaking upon such appeal to stay the execution of said judgment under and for the purposes of section 945, Code Civ. Proc.," in the sum of $1,000.

Whether it is a hardship upon an appellant to require an undertaking for the deficiency, in addition to holding the mortgaged premises as security for the judgment, is for the legislature to determine. Whether the execution of such judgment shall be stayed pending an appeal, without any security, or whether the appellant shall be compelled to give security, and, if so, the amount thereof, in order to entitle him to such stay, are matters purely of legislative control. It may be added, however, that the liability upon an undertaking for the deficiency will be no greater than the disparity between the value of the mortgaged premises and the amount of the judgment, and that, if they are of greater value than the amount of the judgment, there would be no liability upon such undertaking. If their value is insignificant, or if they are not of as great a value as the amount of the judgment, the respondent is entitled to an undertaking which will fully guaranty to him the collection of his judgment, as much as in the case of an appeal from an ordinary money judgment. If, upon the appeal, the money portion of the judgment should be affirmed, but it should be held that it is not secured by the mortgage, the respondent would not be fully secured by the undertaking. The rule laid down in Englund v. Lewis, 25 Cal. 337, has been followed for upward of 30 years; and, if it is to be changed, it should be done by legislative act, rather than by judicial decision.

JOHNSTON v. FISH et al. (No. 15,503.)

RECOVERY IN EJECTMENT—EFFECT—RIGHT TO CROPS.

Where plaintiff in ejectment establishes his title, he cannot maintain claim and delivery for a crop raised and harvested on the land by defendant's tenant before judgment in ejectment was rendered, though the tenant knew that plaintiff disputed his landlord's title.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. Sanderson, Judge.

Action by Johnston against Fish and others for the conversion of hay. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart, Aylett R. Cotton, and Nowlin & Fassett, for appellants. Estee & Miller and John B. Mhoon, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to recover damages from defendants for the conversion of certain hay. The plaintiff's right of action grows out of the following facts: Prior to March 1, 1881, Henry Benson had been for many years the owner of a tract of land in Contra Costa county, which on that day he conveyed to one Jones. In May of the same year Jones conveyed it to the defendants herein. The conveyance from Benson to Jones was procured by the fraud of the latter, and on the 1st of September of that year Benson took possession of the land, claiming it as his own, upon the ground that by reason of the fraud he was entitled to disregard his conveyance, and remained in possession until evicted under a judgment in ejectment by the defendants herein in March, 1883. Shortly after Benson went into possession of the land the defendants herein brought an action of forcible entry against him, which was tried before a jury, and a verdict and judgment rendered in his favor November 12, 1881. In April, 1883, this verdict was set aside, and a new trial ordered, but no further step was taken in the action until 1887, when the action was dismissed. November 21, 1881, the defendants commenced an action in ejectment against Benson and others for the recovery of the land, and damages for the withholding thereof. The plaintiff herein was made a defendant in this action, but upon his disclaimer he was dismissed from the action November 29, 1881. A cross complaint was filed in the action in behalf of Benson to avoid his conveyance to Jones on the ground of fraud, and upon the trial of this issue a decision was rendered February 19, 1883, in favor of the plaintiffs therein, upon the ground that they were bona fide purchasers from Jones for value; and after this decision the trial of the issues in the ejectment was had, in which the plaintiffs withdrew their claim for damages, and judgment was rendered in their favor March 22, 1883. On the 1st of December, 1881, the plaintiff herein made a cropping contract with Benson for the cultivation of the land, under which he sowed a portion thereof to hay, which he harvested in the following summer. By the terms of this agreement the plaintiff was to have two-thirds of the crop, and Benson the remaining third; and, after the hay had been cut and stacked, the plaintiff bought from Benson his third of the crop. Subsequently thereto, and while the hay was still on the ground, the defendants herein brought an action of claim and delivery against Benson for the hay, in which, under their direction, the sheriff took possession thereof, and subsequently delivered it to them. This action was brought before the trial was had in the ejectment suit, and issue was joined therein by Benson, but no further proceedings were had therein until 1887, when, upon the stipulation of Benson, judgment for the possession of the hay was entered against him. The present action was commenced in January, 1883, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the value of the hay, assessed at the sum of $4,000.

There is no substantial difference between the facts in this case and those presented in Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, and under the principles laid down in that case the plaintiff's right of recovery must be sustained. See, also, Martin v. Thompson, 62 Cal. 618; Emerson v. Whitaker, 83 Cal. 147, 23 Pac. 285; Groome v. Almstead, 101 Cal. 425, 35 Pac. 1021; Stockwell v. Phelps, 34 N. Y. 366. Benson's entry upon the land in September, 1881, was made under his claim that by reason of the fraud perpetrated on him by Jones his conveyance to Jones was avoided, and that he still remained the owner of the land. Such an entry was not a mere trespass, but it was made under a claim of right adverse to the whole world, and constituted a disseisin of the real owners. The subsequent determination in the ejectment suit that the real owners of the land at that time (the defendants herein) were not affected by the fraud of Jones, for the reason that they were bona fide purchasers for value, does not change the character of Benson's entry, or the fact that it was an actual disseisin. The findings of fraud made by the court in the ejectment suit fully show that, as between Benson and Jones, he could successfully defend his possession of the land. While he thus held possession of the land, he had the right to dispose of its fruits, and any one dealing with him therefor became the owner of what he might purchase from him. He could either cultivate the land himself, or employ others to do it for him; and he could recompense those whom he employed either by giving them a definite quantity of the product of the land, or by an aliquot part of the whole. A person entering into a cropping contract with him would have the same right to the share agreed upon as his proportion as if he had purchased and paid for the same. The real owner of the land could not deprive him of this share, any more than he could take from him such portion of the crop as he had purchased from the occupant. The law gives to the plaintiff in ejectment the right to recover from the defendant, either in the same action or in another, the value of the use and occupation of the land, which is termed "damages for the withholding thereof"; but while the title to the land is undetermined the owner out of possession is not entitled to the fruits of the land, nor can he, after he has established his right to the possession, recover the fruits of the land from one who has purchased them from an occupant while such occupant was in the adverse possession. Such a rule would give to the real owner the gross product of the land, irrespective of the labor and expense required in its production. As was said in Page v. Fowler: "The very fact that he may recover the rents and profits of the land shows that he cannot recover the crops, for, as was well said in the case of Stockwell v. Phelps, 34 N. Y. 363, the owner of the land in such cases does not recover the value of the crops raised and harvested, but the value of the use and occupation of the land; and the annual crops of grain and grass, which contain both the value of the use of the land and the labor of the farmer, do not, under such circumstances, belong to the owner of the land. It would be an oppressive rule to require every one who, after years of litigation, perhaps, may be found to have a bad title, to pay the gross value of all the crops he has raised; and it would be an inconvenience to the public if the bad title of the farmer to his land attached to the crops he offered for sale, and rendered it necessary to have an abstract of his title to make it safe to purchase his produce." In Brothers v. Hurdle, 10 Ired. 490, the court said: "But when one who is in the adverse possession gathers a crop in the course of husbandry, or severs a tree or other thing from the land, the thing severed becomes a chattel, but it does not become the property of the owner of the land, for his title is divested. He is out of possession, and has no right to the immediate possession of the thing, nor can he bring any action until he regains possession. The owner of the land cannot sue for the thing severed in trover or detinue as a chattel, for it is not his chattel. It did not become so at the time it was severed, and the title to it as a chattel cannot pass to him afterwards, when he regains the possession, by force of the jus post liminii."

The fact that the plaintiff herein knew that the defendants claimed to be the owners of the land, as against Benson, does not impair his right of recovery. If, as against Benson, they had no right to the fruits of the land which he gathered while it was held adversely to them, they would have no right against his vendee, since Benson could give to his vendee as good a title as he himself possessed. And it is equally immaterial whether the hay cut from the land was a volunteer crop, or had been sown by the plaintiff. The right to the fruits of the land does not depend upon the amount of labor expended by the occupant in their production. The apples or strawberries picked by him belong to him as fully as the potatoes or corn which he may have planted; and the hay which he cuts is his whether it is an annual crop or whether the land was sown to hay for the first time while in his occupancy. The judgment against Benson for the possession of the hay in the action of claim and delivery against him does not aid the defendants herein. At the time that action was begun, Benson had no interest in the hay, the plaintiff herein being the owner of two-thirds thereof under the original contract, and having acquired the other third by purchase from Benson.

The evidence fully sustains the finding of the court that the value of the hay at the time it was taken by the defendants was $4,000. The defendants themselves alleged in the affidavit for its seizure in the claim and delivery action against Benson that it was of the value of $5,000, and its value is stated at that amount in the judgment recovered in that action in their favor. The judgment and order are affirmed.

ORDINANCE—DELEGATION OF AUTHORITY—BEATING DRUMS ON STREET—REGULATIONS.

An ordinance forbidding the beating of drums on the street, except on permit of the president of the board of trustees, which he may grant when, in his judgment, it will not conflict with the purposes of the ordinance,—the promotion of the safety and security of public travel,—is not void by reason of the authority given such officer to decide when permits shall be given. Harrison, De Haven, and Fitzgerald, JJ., dissenting.

In bank.

Application of John H. Flaherty for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

H. V. Morehouse, Hiram D. Tuttle, and J. E. Richards, for petitioner. C. C. Bennett, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The petitioner is under sentence of imprisonment for a violation of an ordinance of the city of Redlands, and seeks to be discharged on habeas corpus upon the ground that said ordinance is wholly invalid and void. The ordinance is entitled, "An ordinance to promote safety and security to public travel by prohibiting the beating of drums and certain other noises on the traveled streets or avenues of the city of Redlands without special permission therefor, and authorizing such permission in certain cases"; and in the body of the ordinance it is made an offense, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for any person to, among other things, "beat a drum" upon any traveled street of the city "without special permit in writing so to do first had and obtained from the president of the board of trustees of said city, which permit the president of said board may grant whenever, in his judgment, the issuance of the same shall not conflict with the aforesaid purposes of this ordinance, and not otherwise, provided that such permit shall specify the time when and the street or avenue where any of said instruments shall be so used as aforesaid." Petitioner was convicted of beating a drum on the traveled streets of said city without a permit, contrary to the said provisions of said ordinance. It appears from the petition that petitioner had been in the habit of beating a drum on the streets daily, and that, upon his application to the president of the board for a permit "to engage in beating a drum as he had been heretofore doing," the permit was refused; although, as appears from the petition, he was given a permit to beat his drum upon a certain occasion. He claims the right to beat his drum,—not on special occasions only, as other people, but every day, without a permit, and despite the ordinance.

There is no need of discussing the general power and right of a city to prohibit such noises on the streets as those made by the beating of drums. We do not understand counsel for petitioner as contesting such power. At all events, it certainly exists. But the point urged by petitioner is that the ordinance is void because it gives a certain officer authority to give permits to beat drums on special occasions; and this position is the only one which needs examination. It is contended that the clause authorizing a permit is partial and oppressive, because it gives too much power to the president of the board, and is violative of general constitutional principles against abridging the privileges of citizens, depriving a person of his rights without due process of law, denying him the equal protection of the law, etc. The continuous or daily beating of drums on the streets of a city would be an intolerable nuisance,—endangering the safety of teams and the occupants of vehicles drawn by animals, as well as of pedestrians liable to be injured by runaways, and stunning the ears with din so constant as to be almost insufferable. On the other hand, there is usually no objection to such noises on a few special occasions,—either when there are patriotic celebrations, generally participated in by all the people, or processions of a part of the people united in civic societies, political parties, etc. These occasions are comparatively few, and usually well known, so that people are prepared for them; and the processions and drums are generally preceded by policemen, who give notice of the approaching uproar. But how can these occasions be provided for? By an ordinance which shall anticipate and state in detail beforehand every occasion on which the noises may be made? Such a thing is practically impossible. No human foresight could conjure up all the circumstances under which the people might want a band (with a drum) on the streets. It would not do to name legal holidays alone; that, for obvious reasons, would be too narrow a provision. Neither would it do to single out, in addition to legal holidays, certain other enumerated days, as, for instance, the first Monday of every month; the president of the United States, or some other distinguished man whose advent should be celebrated with drums, might come on Tuesday. Neither would it be possible to schedule the kinds or characters of occasions of which drum-beats would be a necessary part. And so the practical result of petitioner's contention is that all persons must be allowed to beat drums on all occasions as they may choose, or no person must be allowed to beat a drum on any occasion whatever.

In dealing with this and similar questions,—such as repairs of wooden buildings within fire limits, carrying concealed weapons, using public buildings and grounds, ringing bells on buildings where many operatives are employed, haranguing on the streets by lecturers, preachers, etc., singing or playing on musical instruments on the streets, and the like,—our federal, state, and municipal governments have always recognized the practical impossibility of providing in advance for proper exceptional cases, and the necessity of giving to a public officer some discretion in the premises; and laws and ordinances based on that principle have nearly always been upheld when subjected to judicial test. Laws are not made upon the theory of the total depravity of those who are elected to administer them; and the presumption is that municipal officers will not use these small powers villainously and for purposes of oppression and mischief. Of course, it is impossible to state in terms the extent or the limitation of what is known as the "police power"; and courts have not attempted to do it. Whether or not that power has been exceeded in particular cases must be determined as the cases arise; and to find the law applicable to a particular case we must look to see what courts have held in similar cases. And we find that statutes and ordinances similar in character to the one in question in the case at bar have been sustained in most of the cases to which our attention has been called. We will notice a few of them. Statutes and ordinances have been sustained prohibiting awnings without the consent of the mayor and alderman (Pedrick v. Bailey, 12 Gray, 161); forbidding orations, harangues, etc., in a park, without the prior consent of the park commissioners (Com. v. Abrahams [Mass.] 30 N. E. 79), or upon the common or other grounds, except by the permission of the city government committee (Com. v. Davis [Mass.] 4 N. E. 577); "beating any drum or tambourine, or making any noise with any instrument for any purpose whatever, without written permission of the president of the village" on any street or sidewalk (Vance v. Hadfield [Sup.] 4 N. Y. Supp. 112); giving the right to manufacturers and others to ring bells and blow whistles in such manner and at such hours as the board of aldermen or selectmen may in writing designate (Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239); prohibiting the erecting or repairing of a wooden building without the permission of the board of aldermen (Hine v. City of New Haven, 40 Conn. 478); authorizing harbor masters to station vessels, and to assign to each its place (Vanderbilt v. Adams, 7 Cow. 349); forbidding the occupancy of a place on the street for a stand without the permission of the clerk of Faneuil Hall Market (In re Nightingale, 11 Pick. 168); forbidding the keeping of swine without a permit in writing from the board of health (Inhabitants of Quincy v. Kennard [Mass.] 24 N. E. 860); forbidding the erection of any kind of a building without a permit from the commissioners of the town through their clerk (Commissioners v. Covey [Md.] 22 Atl. 266); forbidding any person from remaining within the limits of the market more than 20 minutes unless permitted so to do by the superintendent or his deputy (Com. v. Brooks, 109 Mass. 355). In Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, the supreme court of the United States had under consideration an ordinance which, among other things, prohibited the carrying on of the business of a laundry without certificates from the health officer and the board of fire wardens; and, while that part of the ordinance was not directly involved, the court say as follows: "In the case before us, the provisions requiring certificates from the health officer and the board of fire wardens may, in some instances, be unnecessary, and the changes to be made to meet the conditions prescribed may be burdensome; but, as we have seen, this is a matter for the determination of the municipality in the execution of its police powers, and not the violation of any substantial right of the individual." Many other authorities to the same point as those above noticed might be collected outside of the decisions in our own state. In this state it was held in Ex parte Casinello, 62 Cal. 538, that an ordinance giving to the superintendent of public streets the power to determine where, either on a public street or on private premises, any person could deposit "any glass, broken ware, dirt, rubbish, garbage or filth," was a salutary and valid "police regulation." In the case of Guerrero, 69 Cal. 88, 10 Pac. 261, it was held that the city council had authority to make the issuance of a license for the sale of liquors conditional upon the appellant's obtaining a permit from the board of police commissioners. In Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 Pac. 933, an ordinance prohibiting the selling of pools on horse races, except within the inclosure of a race track where the race is to be run, was upheld, and it was declared not to be void because its effect might be "to confer a special privilege or benefit upon those who own or control the race courses." In Ex parte Fiske, 72 Cal. 125, 13 Pac. 310, an ordinance was upheld which prohibited the repair of a wooden building within certain fire limits without permission in writing signed by a majority of the fire wardens and approved by a majority of the committee on fire department and the mayor. In that case we said as follows: "It is clear, however, that a literal compliance with the regulation prohibiting the repairing of a wooden building might work, in some instances, useless hardships. The repair of a leaking roof or a broken window would be necessary to the comfort and health of a family, without enhancing the danger which the framers of the ordinance sought to provide against; and repairs of a more extensive character might be made to particular houses, standing in particular localities, without increasing the fire risks. And it is equally clear that no general rule could be established beforehand that would meet the emergencies of individual cases. Therefore the power to give relief in particular instances is conferred on certain officers; and it is not to be presumed that they will exercise it wantonly, or for purposes of profit or oppression." In Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. 747, this court upheld an ordinance prohibiting the business of a retail liquor dealer unless he procured the permission of a majority of the board of police commissioners, or, upon their refusal, the permission of 12 property owners in the block. The foregoing authorities, in our opinion, clearly establish the validity of the ordinance here in question.

Counsel for petitioner rely on some cases—particularly State v. Dering, 84 Wis. 585, 54 N. W. 1104, and Frazee's Case (Mich.) 30 N. W. 72—which, at first blush, seem to conflict with the general current of authorities as above presented. But upon closer examination they will be found to go upon a distinction or principle—whether sound or not—that is not applicable to the case at bar. They are based upon the theory that the lawful inherent rights of men cannot be entirely suppressed or destroyed by statute or ordinance, but can only be regulated; and that all regulations of such rights must be uniform, etc. The cases cited all deal with ordinances regulating the right of the people to have processions or parades in the streets; and it is this right that is discussed, although the accompaniment of music is mentioned in some of the ordinances. In the Wisconsin case, supra, the petitioner "was convicted of parading the streets." Now, the public have an undoubted right to travel on the street; that is what a street is for. And to march along a street in a procession is merely to exercise the right to travel on it. Therefore, if the cases under review be sound, this right can only be regulated, and cannot entirely be suppressed; and the regulation must be uniform,—although it is difficult to understand how the crowded streets of a city could be practically regulated in this respect without vesting some discretion in the police authorities. At all events, the cases referred to deal with a right. But the proposition that a man has a natural, ingrained, inviolate, common-law, or constitutional right to beat a drum on the traveled streets of a city has no foundation in reason or authority. As, therefore, it is not a right that may not be entirely suppressed, it may be regulated as the lawmaking power may determine. In Ex parte Tuttle, supra, it was held that, as betting on horse races was demoralizing in its tendencies, and an evil, it could be suppressed by ordinance; and that, as it could be suppressed, no one could be heard to complain of an ordinance regulating it because thereby special privileges accrued to particular persons. And in Ex parte Christensen this court distinctly declared that such is the rule. The court said: "The objection is that this makes the license depend upon the arbitrary will and pleasure of the board of fire commissioners. * * * But, whatever force this objection might have in reference to licenses to carry on the ordinary vocations of life, which are not supposed to have any injurious tendencies, it has no force in the present case. It is well settled that the governing power may prohibit the manufacture and traffic in liquor altogether, provided only it does not interfere with interstate commerce. And, if the governing power can prohibit a thing altogether, it can impose such conditions upon its existence as it pleases. * * * Even if it be conceded that the conditions were arbitrary, they were within the power of the board." In the ordinance involved in the case at bar, there is no attempt to suppress processions or parades. It does not interfere with travel, but seeks to promote the comfort, convenience, and safety of travelers by preventing that which makes traveling uncomfortable and dangerous. Its provisions do not affect private premises, but refer solely to public traveled streets. It prohibits no business which every one has a right to pursue. As the wants and comfort and pleasure of the public require that the thing prohibited, although in the abstract injuriously annoying, should on special occasions be allowed, the ordinance provides for permitting the thing to be done on such occasions; and the granting of such privileges is not taking away the right to do the thing from others, because they have no such right. When the public welfare requires it, a nuisance may, for special purposes, be permitted. Railroad Co. v. Brown, 67 Ind. 45; Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 239. As all such occasions cannot be foreseen and provided for by special enactment, some small discretion in the premises is granted to a certain officer; and that discretion to grant a permit is limited to instances where "the issuance of the same shall not conflict with the aforesaid purposes of this ordinance," viz. "to promote safety and security to public travel." The validity of such an ordinance is clearly established by the current of authorities, some of which are hereinafter cited. It is entirely within the reasoning of the supreme court of the United States in Crowley v. Christensen, 137 U. S. 86, 11 Sup. Ct. 13, which case also furnishes an answer to petitioner's claim of support from Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 373, 6 Sup. Ct. 1064.

In our opinion, the ordinance here involved is valid, and the petitioner should be remanded. The writ is dismissed, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the marshal.

HARRISON, J. (dissenting). The authority of the city to make police regulations is given by the constitution, and, although it is derived directly from the people, instead of mediately through the legislature, through the municipal government act, yet it is a legislative power, and, like any other legislative power, is to be exercised by the body to which the power has been intrusted. The power to make laws is a sovereign power, and its exercise by the legislative body of a municipality, being a delegated power, cannot be delegated to any other body or individual. Mr. Dillon says (Mun. Corp. 96): "The principle is a plain one that the public powers or trusts devolved by law or charter upon the council or governing body, to be exercised by it when and in such manner as it shall judge best, cannot be delegated to others." Mr. Cooley says (Const. Lim. p. 248): "So far as its functions are legislative, they rest in the discretion and judgment of the municipal body intrusted with them, and that body cannot refer the exercise of the power to the discretion and judgment of its subordinates, or of any other authority." This inhibition includes, not only the ordinance itself which is to be adopted, but also the individuals upon whom it is to operate, as well as the times and places in which it is to be in operation. The legislative body of the municipality cannot delegate to one of its members, or to any executive officer of the city, the power to determine whether an ordinance shall be operative upon certain individuals, or at certain times, any more than it can delegate to him the power to determine whether the ordinance shall be adopted, or shall have any operation; nor can it confer upon such officer the power to exempt any individual that he may choose from the operation of the ordinance. "No man's rights can be submitted, under a constitutional government, to the discretion of anybody." Robison v. Miner, 68 Mich. 556, 37 N. W. 21. Whenever the question has been presented for determination, it has been uniformly held that an ordinance which confers upon an executive officer of the city the right to determine by his own will whether it shall be in operation or not in the particular cases to which it is directed is invalid. If the act covered by the ordinance is one which the individual has no inherent right to perform, or which the municipality may prohibit altogether, a privilege to perform the act may be made to depend upon the compliance with certain conditions, or the previous approval of another officer. If, however, the act is lawful or proper in itself, and improper only as it may affect the public, the power of the municipality is limited to a regulation of its exercise, and such regulation must be indicated by fixed and definite rules, and cannot be left to the arbitrament of any officer. This rule is not to be confounded with the execution of the ordinance by the officers intrusted therewith. The enforcement of the ordinance by the executive officer of the city is entirely distinct from determining whether the ordinance, when adopted, shall be in force. The policeman may have a discretion to determine whether an obstruction of the streets by an individual is such a violation of an ordinance forbidding the obstruction as will warrant his arrest, but neither he nor any other officer can have the power to determine whether the ordinance itself shall be suspended for the benefit of that individual, or can give to such individual the right to disregard the ordinance. The right of the harbor master to station vessels at different points in the harbor, or of the policeman to prescribe the order of carriages at a theater, or of the superintendent of streets to designate a place for dumping garbage, is not the exercise of a legislative power, but rather the act of an executive officer to enforce the ordinance. Accordingly, it has been held that an ordinance conferring upon the mayor the right to determine whether a stationary steam engine should be removed was void, as conferring upon him a power which could only be exercised by the city council (Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Radecke, 49 Md. 217); that an ordinance providing that no person should erect any building within the city limits without having obtained permission from the board of aldermen is void, since it does not prescribe a uniform rule of action for governing the exercise of their discretion (State v. Tenant, 110 N. C. 609, 14 S. E. 387); that an ordinance forbidding the erection of livery stables in any block without the consent of the owners of land in the block is invalid (City of St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 22 S. W. 470); that an ordinance making it unlawful for persons to parade a public street, singing or beating drums, or playing upon musical instruments, without having obtained the consent of the mayor, is void upon the ground that it does not fix the conditions uniformly and impartially, and is unreasonable (Anderson v. City of Wellington, 40 Kan. 173, 19 Pac. 719; In re Frazee, 63 Mich. 396, 30 N. W. 72; Rich v. City of Naperville, 42 Ill. App. 222; State v. Dering, 84 Wis. 585, 54 N. W. 1104); that an ordinance that no parades or processions shall be allowed upon the streets without a permit from the police department is invalid, because it leaves the power of restraining processions to an unregulated official discretion, when the whole matter, if regulated at all, must be by permanent legal provisions operating generally and impartially (City of Chicago v. Trotter, 136 Ill. 430, 26 N. E. 359).

There are many cases in which ordinances containing such a provision have been upheld, but in these cases the effect of such a provision upon the ordinance was not considered by the court; the only question presented to it for its consideration being the validity or invalidity of the ordinance upon other grounds. In these cases the act of the court in sustaining the ordinance cannot be regarded as an affirmation of the power to include this provision. Ordinances relating to health and security from fire, which prohibit certain acts without a permit from officers in charge of those departments, have been sustained upon the ground that the safety of the citizen from disease and fire were of a peculiar character, demanding the supervision of officers particularly skilled in reference thereto, and to whose judgment the matter could be more appropriately referred. The principles applicable to these ordinances, and under which they may be upheld, have, however, no application to the ordinance under discussion. There is another line of cases in which ordinances have been upheld which reserved to the city council or to the legislative body itself the power to exempt individuals from their operation. This is, however, entirely consistent with the principle above laid down. It is not a delegation of legislative authority, but is an exercise of that authority by the legislative body itself. In the absence of any restrictions upon its exercise of the legislative power intrusted to it, the city council has the same power to enact ordinances applicable only to special portions of the city, or to designated classes or individuals, as would the legislature of the state in the absence of constitutional restrictions; and it may equally enact an ordinance exempting individuals or classes from the operation of an ordinance, or suspending the operation of the ordinance entirely. This rule also includes another class of cases in which an exemption from the ordinance is made by some particular branch of the city government. The entire legislative power which is delegated to a municipality is not always conferred upon the city council. It may be portioned out to the different departments of the city, and authority conferred upon those departments to legislate upon the matters peculiarly intrusted to their care. The park commissioners may have exclusive authority to determine the manner and times in which the parks shall be used. The health department may have the authority to enact sanitary regulations for the entire city. Similar powers may be intrusted to the school department, the harbor commissioners, the police commissioners, for the enactment of ordinances relating to certain subjects. The ordinance under consideration falls within the rule hereinbefore referred to, and should be declared invalid. It confers upon the president of the board of trustees the power to suspend its operation in favor of any individual, whenever he may elect, and to deny the same favor to another who may be equally entitled to its suspension. It, in fact, confers upon him the power to determine the extent to which the ordinance shall be operative, which is in reality the power to determine whether there shall be such an ordinance. The only limitation upon the exercise of this power is his own judgment that the permit will not conflict with the purposes of the ordinance. This is a pure and simple delegation to him of the legislative power which has been conferred upon the trustees themselves. It is not enough to say that it must be presumed that this officer will act properly. The question is not whether a power that has been conferred will be properly exercised, but whether there has been any authority given to confer the power. If there has not, it is no answer to say that it will not be abused. In a country under the government of laws, the conduct of its citizens cannot be subjected to the arbitrary will of any individual. The mildest despotism has no place in a constitutional government. Beating a drum is not a nuisance per se, or in violation of the rights of others, and it does not of necessity interfere with the usual and proper use of the public streets. The authority of the trustees of the city to regulate the use of the streets, or the beating of drums thereon, is not denied, but the "regulation" must be made by the city, and cannot be delegated by it to the president of the board of trustees.

In my opinion, the ordinance is invalid, and the prisoner should be discharged.

SANTA ROSA CITY R. CO. v. CENTRAL ST. RY. CO. (No. 15,202.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1895.)

STREET-RAILROAD FRANCHISE—VALIDITY OF GRANT—FORFEITURE—ESTOPPEL OF CITY—INJUNCTION—EVIDENCE.

1. Where for 14 years after the passage of an ordinance the city recognized its existence and validity, and treated it as duly adopted and published, it will be presumed to have been approved by the mayor and published as required by the city's charter.

2. Where a city charter requires that ordinances shall be published only by order of the council, and that the city clerk shall keep a book into which he shall copy each ordinance, with a certificate annexed to the copy stating, among other things, that it was published according to law, the certificate of the clerk that the ordinance was published is sufficient evidence that the order for publication was made.

3. The right to avoid a public grant for failure to perform a condition subsequent is confined to the government.

4. A public grant cannot be avoided for failure to perform a condition subsequent, except through a court's judgment, or a legislative declaration of forfeiture, unless the statute creating the condition expressly declares that a failure to perform it will, ipso facto, avoid the grant.

5. Under the Civil Code (section 502), providing that, where a franchise has been granted to a street railroad, work on the road must be commenced within one year from the date of the grant of right of way, and finished within three years thereafter, and that a failure to comply with such provision "works a forfeiture" of the right of way as well as of the franchise, when a street railroad fails to comply with that provision, its right of way and franchise continue to exist until declared forfeited by a court or by legislative authority, said section not being self-executing.

6. When a city railroad's franchise is liable to forfeiture for breach of condition subsequent, forfeiture thereof is not effected by the city's granting the same rights to another company.

7. Where a city granted a street-railroad franchise to two persons, who organized a corporation to operate a railroad thereunder, and thereafter the franchise became liable to forfeiture because the road was not constructed on certain streets within the specified time, but for 11 years after the breach, with full knowledge thereof, the city, in dealing with the company, by resolutions, orders, and ordinances, recognized the franchise as valid and in force, and took legal steps to enforce the obligations assumed by the company thereunder, and the company in consequence incurred expense in paving the streets on which its tracks were laid, and in paying taxes, the city and the public are estopped to claim a forfeiture of the franchise or deny the company's ownership thereof.

8. Where a street-railroad franchise was granted to two persons, and they thereupon organized a corporation for the express purpose of constructing and operating a railroad under the franchise, and so declared in the articles of incorporation, an assignment of the franchise by said persons to the corporation was not necessary to vest the latter with any right relating thereto.

9. In an action by a street-railroad company, operating its road under a franchise, to enjoin another railroad company, claiming the right to construct a road on the same street under a subsequent franchise, from tearing up plaintiff's tracks, plaintiff need not show ownership of the franchise under which it operates, its actual possession of the street being sufficient as against defendant.

10. Where a street-railroad company, claiming the right to construct its road over a street under a franchise, tears up the tracks and interferes with the operation of the road of another company already operating on said street under a prior franchise, the latter may bring an action to enjoin said acts, and recover its actual damages on account of them.

11. In an action by the company to enjoin the tearing up of its tracks, an ordinance passed after its franchise became liable to forfeiture, granting plaintiff the right to construct a switch, which right should "extend until the expiration of the term of the franchise" first granted, was admissible, as tending to show both the original existence of the franchise and a waiver of the forfeiture.

12. Testimony of a city clerk that after search he was unable to find among the city records any orders for the publication of certain ordinances is admissible to show the non-existence of those orders.

De Haven and Harrison, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by the Santa Rosa City Railroad Company against the Central Street-Railway Company for an injunction and damages. From a judgment for defendant, and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Barham & Bolton and Van R. Paterson, for appellant. W. F. Russell and Rutledge & Pressley, for respondent.

VAN FLEET, J. This is an action for an injunction to restrain defendant from tearing up the track of plaintiff's railroad, and from interfering with the running of plaintiff's cars, and for damages for acts of interference already committed. A preliminary injunction was granted; but, on the hearing, the injunction was dissolved, and judgment rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial.

On the trial the following facts were proved without any substantial conflict: On October 3, 1876, Mark L. McDonald and Jackson R. Meyers petitioned the common council of the city of Santa Rosa to grant to them and their assigns the privilege of constructing and operating a street railroad on certain streets of said city. On the same day the common council passed a resolution granting to the petitioners and their associates the privilege requested. On May 11, 1877, the petitioners and certain other persons incorporated the corporation plaintiff, for the express purpose of constructing and operating said street railroad, and it was so stated in the articles of incorporation. On June 5, 1877, the city council passed an ordinance, numbered 16, granting to said McDonald and Meyers, "their associates, successors, or assigns," authority to construct said railroad, and to maintain the same and propel cars thereon for the term of 50 years. This ordinance, among other things, provided that the tracks should be kept "flush and even with the street," and that the holders of the franchise should "plank, pave, or macadamize the entire length of the street used by the track, between the rails and for two feet on each side thereof." This ordinance is found, in regular order, in the official Book of Ordinances of the city, with the signatures of the mayor and clerk, but without the certificate required by section 19 of the act incorporating the city (St. 1875-76, p. 251); and there was no direct evidence of the publication or posting of said ordinance, as required by section 22 of that act. Plaintiff immediately commenced the construction of said road, and during the year 1877 completed the portion in controversy in this action, and has ever since continued to operate that portion; but on certain portions of the route named in the application and ordinance no railroad has ever been constructed or operated. In 1884 the city council undertook a revision of all the ordinances of the city then in force, and for that purpose, on July 15, 1884, passed an ordinance, numbered 59, which, among other things, contains the whole of said Ordinance 16. Ordinance 59 is found duly recorded in the Book of Ordinances, with the certificate of the clerk required by the charter. On January 6, 1886, the council adopted a resolution directing the street commissioner to notify McDonald "to place the street railroad on the proper grade, and have the same macadamized in accordance with the ordinance." On January 19, 1886, the council adopted a resolution authorizing the city engineer to furnish plaintiff with the grade "of the railroad track on Fourth street," which is the street now in controversy. On September 14, 1886, the council adopted a resolution requiring the plaintiff "to pave the space between the rails of its road, and for two feet on each side, with bituminous blocks" of a certain kind, and to substitute flat rails for "the rails now used," and to put and keep the track flush with the street; and directing the city attorney, in case of a failure of the plaintiff to comply with said requirements, to commence an action "to have said track declared a nuisance and removed, and the right to maintain a street railroad annulled and revoked." On September 21, 1886, the council directed the city attorney at once to commence the action provided for in the previous resolution. On December 27, 1886, the city attorney commenced said action in the name of the city, and filed a complaint in which, among other things, it was alleged that the plaintiff here (defendant in that action) was organized for the purpose of building, equipping, and operating said railroad, and had built and equipped the same about June 7, 1877, and had ever since operated the same; and that, before commencing said road, it had applied for and obtained from the city permission to lay down and operate said railroad for 50 years. A demurrer was interposed to that complaint, and sustained; and on November 16, 1888, the city attorney reported that fact to the council, and also reported that plaintiff had commenced the work of paving as required by the resolution, and was putting the road into excellent condition, and recommended the dismissal of the action. Pending that action, on May 4, 1888, the council passed a resolution granting to plaintiff the right to establish a certain switch. On March 3, 1891, the council passed a resolution declaring plaintiff's railway on Fourth street to be a nuisance, "except that portion of said railway already in repair, flush and even with the street, and with good crossings." Thereupon plaintiff proceeded to and did put said track in good repair, and so as to cover the objections made. From 1877 down to the commission, in 1891, of the acts complained of in this action, the plaintiff has been in the actual, continuous, and notorious occupation of this railroad, has operated the same, and collected fares thereon, and regularly paid taxes thereon, and neither its possession nor its right to operate its road was ever disputed by any one. On September 2, 1891, the city council passed an ordinance, numbered 132, granting to defendant the right to construct and operate a street railroad on certain streets in said city, including a portion of Fourth street, on which plaintiff's track was laid. Under authority of this ordinance defendant commenced the construction of its road, and, as a part of that work, commenced to tear up and remove plaintiff's track; whereupon this action was commenced. Defendant undertakes to justify its acts on the grounds that plaintiff never obtained any franchise whatever, or, if it did, that that franchise was forfeited by the failure of plaintiff to complete the whole of its road within the time prescribed by section 502 of the Civil Code; and that its track was therefore a public nuisance, which defendant could lawfully abate in the exercise of its own franchise. We think that under the evidence in the case plaintiff did obtain a valid franchise to construct and operate its road on Fourth street; that that franchise was never forfeited; and that plaintiff is therefore entitled to an injunction, and such damages as it has suffered by reason of the acts complained of.

1. Defendant contends that Ordinance 16, the original ordinance under which plaintiff claims, was never approved by the mayor, nor published or posted as required by law, and that it therefore never took effect. Section 22 of the city charter provides that "all ordinances shall be signed as nearly as may be in the following form: Approved this — day of —, —, Mayor of the City of Santa Rosa." The ordinance in question is signed by the mayor, but without any words of approval. Section 46 requires the mayor to sign such ordinances as he approves, and there was some parol evidence tending to show that the mayor did approve this ordinance, and signed his name with that intention. We are inclined to hold that that provision of section 22 is merely directory, and that the signature of the mayor, under the circumstances of the case, is sufficient evidence of his approval; but it is not necessary to decide that question. Section 22 also provides that every ordinance "shall be published in some newspaper in Santa Rosa at least one time, or posted in three public places in said city, and shall be in force ten days after such publication or posting." Section 19 provides that the city clerk "shall keep a book marked 'City Ordinances,' into which he shall copy all city ordinances, with his certificate annexed to said copy, stating the foregoing ordinance is a true and correct copy of an ordinance of the city of Santa Rosa, and giving the number and title of said ordinance, and stating that the same has been posted or published according to law. Said record copy shall be prima facie evidence of the contents of the ordinance and of the passage and publication of the same, and shall be admissible as evidence in any court or proceeding. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the proof of the passage and publication of ordinances in the usual way." Ordinance 16 was copied by the clerk into that book, but without any certificate, nor was there any direct evidence of its publication or posting. There can be no doubt that publication in a newspaper or by posting is made by that statute a condition precedent to the taking effect of any ordinance; but it does not follow that direct proof of that fact is essential in any case. The statute expressly allows the passage and publication of ordinances to be proved "in the usual way"; that is, by such proof as would be sufficient to prove such facts in any other case. In this case the proof is overwhelming that the city, from the time of the passage of this ordinance, has always recognized its existence and validity, has acted upon it, and, both by its action and its non-action, has treated it as duly adopted and published. As we shall show hereafter, the defendant has no rights in this action which the city would not have, and the case is to be treated precisely as if the city, instead of the present defendant, were the party to the record. The circumstances in proof raise, after the lapse of 14 years, a sufficient presumption of the existence of every fact necessary to the validity of the ordinance, including approval by the mayor and publication; certainly sufficient against the city and the defendant here. As was said in City of Atchison v. King, 9 Kan. 550, 556: "The city having passed the ordinance four or five years before it was offered in evidence, and having acted upon it as valid, will not now be allowed in such an action to deny its publication. Such a rule would be a great inducement to cities to disobey the law. They get the benefits and escape the inconveniences of the law by such a course, as it would in most cases be impossible for a stranger to prove a publication four or five years after the passage of the ordinance, when the publication is by posted notices. Nor would the difficulty be much less where it was published in a newspaper, in a country where newspaper changes are as frequent as they are in this state. It was the duty of the city authorities to publish the ordinance. As they acted on it, the presumption is that it was duly published; and at least this presumption is sufficient till the contrary appears." See, also, City of Quincy v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 92 Ill. 21. But, aside from this, Ordinance 16 was re-enacted in Ordinance 59, and the publication of that ordinance was proved by the statutory certificate of the clerk. The statute does not limit the time within which ordinances may be published; and the publication of the latter ordinance was a publication of the former, and therefore rendered it effective in 10 days from the time of such publication. For all the purposes of this action that is sufficient. It is contended by defendant that ordinances can be validly published only by order of the city council; and that, as no such order of publication can now be found in the minutes of the council, the publication of Ordinance 59 was ineffectual. But the charter does not, either in terms or by implication, require such an order, and the authorities relied on by defendant are inapplicable (County of San Luis Obispo v. Hendricks, 71 Cal. 242, 246, 11 Pac. 682); and, if such an order were necessary, the certificate of the clerk is sufficient evidence that it was made. These considerations render it unnecessary to decide whether, under section 497 of the Civil Code, this privilege might not have been granted by simple resolution without any publication. Neither the city charter, nor the section of the Code referred to, nor any general rule of law, requires an ordinance in such a case. Atchison Board of Ed. v. De Kay, 148 U. S. 591, 13 Sup. Ct. 591. Defendant relies on the use of the word "ordinance" in sections 498 and 502 of the Civil Code. The use of that word in those sections would hardly seem to be a sufficient reason for interpolating it into section 497; but, for the reason above stated, that question need not now be determined.

2. Defendant next contends that plaintiff, by its failure to construct its road on certain of the streets named in Ordinance 16, ipso facto forfeited its entire right of way and franchise, as well for those portions constructed as for those not constructed, and that all its rights thereby ceased and determined at the expiration of three years from the date of that ordinance. This contention is based on section 502 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "Work to construct the railroad must be commenced within one year from the date of the ordinance granting the right of way and the filing of articles of incorporation, and the same must be completed within three years thereafter. A failure to comply with these provisions works a forfeiture of the right of way as well as of the franchise, unless the uncompleted portion is abandoned by the corporation with the consent of the authorities granting the right of way, such abandonment and consent to be in writing." It is conceded that plaintiff did not complete the work of constructing its railroad within the period prescribed, and has never completed it; but it cannot be denied that it commenced that work within one year. Under the rule laid down in Railroad Co. v. Baldwin, 57 Cal. 160, it would seem that no forfeiture can occur unless the holder of the franchise is in default in both particulars,—in failing to commence the work within one year, and in failing to complete it within three years. But, as that question has not been argued by counsel, we do not pass upon it. Assuming, then, that a failure to complete the road within three years, though commenced in time, "works a forfeiture" within the meaning of section 502, the question to be determined is whether that statute is self-executing; that is, whether the right of way and franchise absolutely cease to exist at the end of that period, or whether a judicial or legislative declaration of forfeiture is necessary to produce that result. It is obvious that the requirement as to the completion of the work within a given time is a condition subsequent. It is a general rule that none but the grantor or his heirs can avoid a grant for failure to perform a condition subsequent; and in case of a public grant the right to avoid it on that ground is confined to the government, and can be exercised only through the judgment of a court, or by a legislative declaration of forfeiture. It follows that, where such condition is imposed by statute, a failure to perform it will not ipso facto avoid the grant, unless so declared by the statute creating the condition. Unless the statute, by express terms or by plain implication, so declares, no forfeiture will take place without a judicial, or at least a legislative, determination to that effect. Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44. The statute in question provides that a failure to comply with its provisions "works a forfeiture" of the right of way and franchise. This section, as shown by the note of the Code commissioners, was taken from section 8 of the street-railroad act of March 29, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 483), which provided that, upon such failure, "all rights of the grantee under the order or ordinance shall be forfeited and shall thenceforth cease and determine." The latter portion of the provision, according to some of the decisions in this state, evinced an intention on the part of the legislature to dispense with any further proceeding to declare a forfeiture, for the rights of the party were upon the default to "cease and determine." The omission of those words in the Code, an omission which we must presume to have been deliberate and intentional, indicates an intention to mitigate the former rule. The words "work a forfeiture," which are the only words used in the Code, are usually understood to mean merely that the default mentioned is a ground for forfeiture,—a ground for a judicial declaration of forfeiture (People v. Hillsdale, etc., Turnpike, 23 Wend. 256); and they do not appear to mean more in this case. The great weight of authority without this state establishes the rule that a statutory provision that in case of default a party shall forfeit his rights, or that a thing granted shall be forfeited or shall revert to the government, or the like, merely exposes the party to proceedings for forfeiture on behalf of the state, and does not of itself divest those rights. Such a provision will not be held self-executing, unless further words are used plainly implying such a legislative intent. The cases are too numerous to be reviewed, but a few of them may be noted. In re Brooklyn El. R. Co., 125 N. Y. 434, 26 N. E. 474; Schulenberg v. Harriman, 21 Wall. 44; In re Kings County

El. Ry. Co., 105 N. Y. 97, 119, 13 N. E. 18; Chesapeake & O. Canal Co. v. Ohio R. Co., 4 Gill & J. 1, 121; Briggs v. Cape Cod Co., 137 Mass. 71; Lock Co. v. Kittridge, 5 Sawy. 44; Frost v. Coal Co., 24 How. 283; Railroad Co. v. Johnson, 49 Mich. 148.¹ In this state the cases are not altogether consistent with each other, nor in harmony with the decisions elsewhere. In Borland v. Lewis, 43 Cal. 569, the words construed were: "Such neglect or failure shall work a forfeiture of such lands, and the same shall be resold as if no purchase had been made." This statute was held self-executing, on the ground that the last clause would be useless if the resale could not be made until the forfeiture had been pronounced by a court. In Oakland R. Co. v. Oakland, B. & F. V. R. Co., 45 Cal. 365, the words, "the franchises and privileges herein granted shall utterly cease and be forfeited," were held to accomplish the forfeiture without the necessity of judicial proceedings. In Upham v. Hosking, 62 Cal. 250, the same ruling was made as to the words, "the rights granted by this act shall become forfeited to the state." This was decided upon the supposed authority of the two preceding cases, and without any further reason stated. Those cases were clearly not authority for that ruling, for in each of them the decision was rested on language beyond the words of forfeiture—"shall be resold as if no purchase had been made"; "shall utterly cease." In People v. Railway Co., 91 Cal. 338, 27 Pac. 673, it was remarked that acts sufficient to cause a forfeiture do not per se produce a forfeiture, without proper proceedings in a proper court. In Town of Arcata v. Arcata & M. R. R. Co., 92 Cal. 639, 28 Pac. 678, it was said: "Where the statute provides that a failure to complete the contemplated work within a certain time shall work a forfeiture, no action is necessary to enforce the forfeiture. In such a case, upon the happening of the event of the commission of the offense which is the statutory basis of forfeiture, the title to the thing forfeited immediately vests in the state." It was, however, expressly held that that question did not arise in the case, and the language quoted must therefore be considered obiter dictum.

We think that the true rule on this subject is that laid down in the cases cited above from other courts, and that the case of Upham v. Hosking and the dictum in the Town of Arcata Case cannot be supported upon principle. If this statute ex proprio vigore produces a forfeiture without further legislative or judicial action, it does so absolutely and unconditionally. If the grantee of the franchise should commence the work within the year, and thereafter diligently prosecute it, and should, within the three years, complete it with the exception of a single block, its entire road would be forfeited, even though its failure to complete that block should be caused by the occupation of the city by hostile troops, or by a destructive pestilence, or any other cause entirely beyond its control. If, on the very next day after the expiration of the three years, it should complete its road, and thereafter operate it for 10 years, it might then be ousted without redress. It might happen that such a road, in a small place, could be operated for many years only at a loss; yet the moment it became profitable a rival might step in and avail itself of a forfeiture occurring many years before, and never thought of by any one. The injustice that might be done in such cases would be avoided, and private as well as public rights protected, if resort must be had to legal proceedings. It is therefore reasonable to suppose that the legislature in general intends that a forfeiture shall be enforced only by judicial action, or, in a proper case, by express legislative declaration; and that, when it intends otherwise, it will use apt and plain language to that effect. The language used in the section under consideration evinces no such intention; and, until a judgment of forfeiture is obtained or the forfeiture is declared by legislative authority, the franchise and right of way continue to exist. It is not necessary, for the purposes of this case, to decide whether, in a case like the present, a mere legislative declaration of forfeiture would be sufficient. The authorities do not agree as to when, if ever, a forfeiture can be enforced in that way. It is sufficient to say that, in this case, no such legislative declaration was ever made by the city council or any other body. It is well settled that a mere grant to a third party will not, of itself, effect the forfeiture; and the ordinance granting the franchise to defendant expresses no such intention, and is not in any way inconsistent with the continuance of plaintiff's franchise.

From the principles above laid down, it follows that no one but the government can avail itself of a ground of forfeiture of a public grant; and that the government, being the sole judge of the propriety of such action, may waive the right to enforce or declare a forfeiture. Such waiver may be by express legislative action, or may be inferred from other acts of the governmental authority. Accordingly, when the state, or any subordinate governmental body to whose charge the matter has been committed, after knowledge of the act or omission constituting a ground of forfeiture, does any act which unequivocally recognizes the franchise as still existing and in force, a waiver of the forfeiture will be inferred. And if such act of recognition has the effect of causing the holder of the franchise to incur expense which he would not have incurred had the forfeiture been insisted on, or otherwise to change his position, the inference of a waiver er becomes conclusive, on the ground of estoppel. These propositions are supported by an overwhelming weight of authority; indeed, no case to the contrary has been brought to our attention. New Orleans, C. & L. R. Co. v. City of New Orleans, 44 La. Ann. 748, 11 South. 77; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. City of Joliet, 79 Ill. 23, 37; City of Atlanta v. Gate City Gaslight Co., 71 Ga. 106, 125; State v. Fourth N. H. Turnpike, 15 N. H. 162; Martel v. East St. Louis, 94 Ill. 67; Trustees of McIntire Poor School v. Zanesville C. & M. Co., 9 Ohio, 203, 290; State v. Mississippi, O. & R. R. Co., 20 Ark. 495; In re New York El. R. Co., 70 N. Y. 338; State v. Taylor, 28 La. Ann. 460. In the present case the acts of recognition by the city council of the continued existence of plaintiff's franchise have been numerous and unequivocal. For 14 years, of which at least 11 years were after the alleged ground of forfeiture had occurred, the city in every possible way, by direct dealing with plaintiff, by its public resolutions, orders, and ordinances, and by its pleadings in a judicial proceeding, recognized plaintiff's franchise as valid and in force, and insisted upon and took steps to enforce the obligations assumed by plaintiff by its acceptance of that franchise. In consequence of those official acts, plaintiff incurred expense in paving the public street, in paying taxes, and in other ways, which it would certainly not have incurred had the alleged forfeiture been insisted upon. As the fact that plaintiff had not constructed its railway on certain streets was necessarily one of public notoriety, it must be presumed that the city council had knowledge of it; and its acts, in view of that knowledge, conclusively import a waiver of the right to insist upon a forfeiture, and estop the city from ever claiming that a forfeiture has occurred. As the city is by law the agent of the public for this purpose, this estoppel extends to the whole public, and binds the defendant and all other persons. People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 54. It is therefore clear that the failure of plaintiff to complete its road afforded no justification to defendant for any interference with plaintiff's track. Whether, in any case, a private individual or corporation has the right to remove from a public highway a railroad track in actual use therein, though laid without authority, where such track does not amount to a complete obstruction of the highway, we need not decide; but see Market St. Ry. Co. v. Central Ry. Co., 51 Cal. 583.

3. Defendant contends that, no assignment having been proved from McDonald and Meyers to plaintiff, plaintiff cannot maintain this action. But as McDonald and Meyers were two of the original incorporators of plaintiff, and as plaintiff was incorporated for the express purpose of building and operating this railroad, no assignment was necessary. Besides, the acts of the city council referred to recognize plaintiff as the owner of the franchise, and estop the city and the defendant from claiming the contrary. Moreover, as against defendant, which is a mere trespasser, plaintiff's actual possession is sufficient.

4. The acts of defendant, complained of in this action, would amount to a complete destruction of plaintiff's property, and a permanent obstruction to its right of way. As they were committed under a claim of right, injunction is the proper remedy (Moore v. Waterworks, 68 Cal. 146, 8 Pac. 816); and plaintiff may also, in this action, recover its actual damages.

5. On the trial plaintiff offered in evidence an ordinance of the city, duly passed July 10, 1889, and numbered 110, granting to plaintiff the right to construct on Fourth street a switch, to be "connected with the main track of the Santa Rosa Street Railroad, now laid and constructed on said Fourth street." In that ordinance it was provided that the term of the franchise thereby granted should "extend until the expiration of the term of the franchise for laying, etc., the main track of the Santa Rosa Street Railroad." This ordinance was excluded by the court on defendant's objection that it was "irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent." From what has been said above, it follows that this ruling of the court was error. The ordinance contained an unequivocal recognition of plaintiff's franchise, and therefore tended to show both the original existence of the franchise and a waiver of the alleged forfeiture.

6. The court did not err in admitting the testimony of the city clerk, Jordan, to the effect that, after search, he had been unable to find among the city records any order for the publication of Ordinances 16 and 59. That is a well-recognized method, and often the only available method, of proving the loss or nonexistence of a record. This testimony was, however, unimportant for the reasons before stated. The findings and conclusions of the court below are in conflict with the views herein expressed; and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; FITZGERALD, J.

GAROUTTE, J. I concur in the judgment, and also concur in the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Justice VAN FLEET upon the first and second propositions discussed by him. But, by reason of the conclusions there reached, I think the matter of an estoppel as against the city becomes immaterial, and therefore the city should not be foreclosed from litigating that question in the future by some proper action, if it deem such course advisable.

DE HAVEN and HARRISON, JJ. We dissent from the judgment. The failure of the plaintiff to complete the whole of its road, for the construction of which its franchise was granted, within the time prescribed by section 502 of the Civil Code, worked a forfeiture of the franchise; and the subsequent action of the city of Santa Rosa in granting to defendant the right to construct and operate its road over a portion of the same streets named in plaintiff's forfeited franchise gave to defendant the right to enforce and insist upon such forfeiture in this action.

PEOPLE v. COLBURN. (No. 21,178.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 19, 1895.)

CRIMINAL PROSECUTION — HEARSAY EVIDENCE — LETTER FOUND ON DEFENDANT.

A letter found on the person of defendant when arrested for robbery, containing damaging statements and warnings to keep out of reach of the officers, and identified by a witness as having been written by him to defendant, is inadmissible in the absence of evidence that defendant answered it or acted on the information contained therein.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; John F. Davis, Judge.

John Hervey Colburn was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed.

Wm. J. McGee, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. Defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, perpetrated in the county of Amador on the 17th day of March, 1893. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The information is in conformity with the provisions of the Penal Code, is direct and certain as to the offense charged, and states the facts in ordinary and concise language; so that a person of common understanding cannot but know from its perusal what is intended and charged therein. It was not therefore subject to the demurrer interposed against it, and such demurrer was properly overruled.

At the trial the prosecution introduced evidence tending to show that in the evening of the 17th day of March, 1893, at the store of the Clinton Consolidated Gold-Mining Company, a robbery was committed by two masked men. One of them, a man named Robert Masterson, was recognized by W. H. Dunn, the man in charge of the store when robbed; and, upon being arrested, said Masterson pleaded guilty, and implicated the defendant, John Hervey Colburn, and Alie Knox as having been assistants in the robbery; Knox, as he stated, having acted as watchman on the outside, while he and defendant perpetrated the robbery. Defendant and Knox disappeared after the arrest of Masterson. Defendant was arrested in Arizona some months later, and in his possession a letter was found, which letter, upon proof by one Moore that it was written by him, that he did not know where defendant and Knox were, but was desirous of ascertaining that fact, and wrote the letter, and gave it to the sister of Knox, who he supposed would manage to have it conveyed to defendant and Knox, the prosecution offered in evidence, to the introduction of which counsel for defendant objected. The objection was overruled, and the letter admitted and read to the jury. Defendant assigns the ruling of the court admitting such letter as error.

The following is a copy of the letter, omitting such portions only as relate to personal matters not pertinent to the case. The witness explained that the letters H. C. in the address, stood for Herb Colburn, the defendant. "Modesto, Cala., June 9, 1893. H. C.—Dear Friend: It has been a long time I heard anything from you boys. I began to think you had forgotten me. We had the officers hunting in the bottom for a month after you left. They know how you boys got away, as they everything guarded. The horse is gone. They come after her in a few days after you left. Bill is watched. I don't think it would do to write to him, as he is watched. I have heard it whispered around that, if they caught you boys, it would go hard with Bill. They are still hot after you, and Sam Embra come down from San Diego. He has told everybody that he seen Alic. Boys, if you are there, be on your guard. I am afraid they will git you boys before you get this. I will send your trunk as soon as I can, but Purvis has it in charge now. They hunting just as hard as the day you left. Purvis has sent word to the San Diego officers that A. was seen there, and Sam Embra came back from down there with his moustache shaved off. * * * I will give you some of the news. Was down to see your brother. Was favorably impressed with. I think he would be a good one in your business. Boys, look for me after harvest if I don't git a good crop, and I don't think I will. Boys, you can write to with danger as stand in with the officers, but write. Don't write to Bill, as they have got an eye on him. Be on your guard, boys, and don't get caught. Tell A. to write me and his mother. A Friend." That the letter contained damaging evidence against the defendant is quite apparent. It does not in direct terms state his guilt, but the fact that the writer regarded defendant and A. (Alic Knox) as being guilty is plainly inferable from his solicitude and caution to them to avoid discovery of their whereabouts. All this was well calculated to impress a jury with the belief that defendant was guilty. This letter was clearly hearsay. Were such evidence admissible against a defendant charged with crime, there would be no limit to the power of designing persons to manufacture testimony against their neighbors. It will not do to say that Moore was a friend of the defendant, and hence that the evidence was admissible. It would be quite easy for an enemy, under the guise of friendship, to indict the most damaging epistles to a victim whose destruction he was seeking to encompass. The question of friendship or enmity does not properly constitute a factor in the problem. The letter was a statement of a third party, in no wise connected with defendant; was not made under the sanction of an oath; and not admissible. The possession of unanswered letters is not such evidence of acquiescence in their contents as to make them admissible in a civil case, and a letter found upon a prisoner when arrested has been held to be no evidence of the facts stated in it. Rap. Cr. Law, § 283; Whart. Cr. Ev. § 682; People v. Green, 1 Parker, Cr. R. 11; Com. v. Edgerly, 10 Allen, 184; Smith v. Shoemaker, 17 Wall. 630. There are exceptions to the rule,—as, for instance, where it is shown that the defendant has acted upon the information contained in the letter; or where he has answered it, in which case so much of the letter as is explanatory of his answer is admissible; or where the party receiving the letter has by his acts or conduct invited the sending of it to him. There was no sufficient showing to render the letter admissible under any of these exceptions. The most that can be said is that Moore received more than one letter which he believed came from defendant; that he did not know defendant's handwriting, and the letters were not signed. He did not know from whom they came, and had lost or destroyed them. This was not sufficient evidence of their authenticity to warrant proof of their contents. Deeming, as we do, the evidence of the letter from the witness to defendant detrimental to the rights of the latter, the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

MASTERSON v. MUNRO et al. (No. 15,533.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1895.)
DESCRIPTION OF LAND IN DEED—CONFLICT—OFFICIAL MAP—METES AND BOUNDS.

Where one buys land at public auction, having before him an official map showing the size of each parcel sold, and the deed to him describes the land as a certain numbered lot, shown on the map, and also by metes and bounds, and the two descriptions do not agree as to the size of the lot, the dimensions shown in the map control.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action of ejectment by William Masterson against Margaret Munro and others. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

W. C. Burnett, L. G. Burnett, and R. H. Taylor, for appellants. Naphtaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action in ejectment, the land in controversy consisting of a strip 10 feet by 25 feet. Both parties claim through deeds from Ottinger and Brooks. The deed to respondent and the deed to the predecessor of appellant Margaret were each dated and acknowledged September 30, 1862. Respondent and appellants bought their respective lots at an auction sale, and the particular tract in dispute is included in both deeds. Ottinger and Brooks were the owners of 100-vara lot No. 149, situated at the corner of Second and Townsend streets in San Francisco, and for the purpose of selling the same to advantage made a plan or map of the lot, subdividing the same into smaller lots, numbered consecutively from 1 upwards, and caused this map to be filed in the office of the county recorder. After the map had been filed, the property was offered for sale at public auction at the auction rooms of John Middleton & Son, where there was an enlarged copy of the map, and the lots were sold by reference to said map. Upon this map a street called "Stanford Street" was laid out parallel with Second street, and 160 feet distant therefrom. At this auction sale the plaintiff purchased lot No. 25, and the defendants' grantor purchased lot 22; and, as is stated in appellants' brief, "lots 22 and 25 comprised an area of 25 feet by 160 feet, running through from the east line of Stanford street to the west line of Second street, the south line of each lot being 125 feet north of Townsend street." The conveyance to the defendants' grantor describes the land by metes and bounds, with a depth of 80 feet, and also describes it as "being subdivision No. 22 of the 100-vara lot known upon the official map of said city as 'No. 149,'" and the conveyance to the plaintiff describes the land purchased by him as subdivisions 24 and 25, as represented upon the same map, with a depth of 90 feet. Under the foregoing circumstances, the contradiction of the descriptions in appellants' deed must be resolved in favor of the description which refers to the official plat or map. Appellants' predecessor purchased subdivision 22 of a certain tract of land, as shown by the official map. He bought at public auction, with the map before him, and it is clearly evident that the description by courses and distances was intended to describe subdivision 22. If a party purchases a certain numbered block of land according to the official map of the city, and his purchase is so described in the deed, a further description of the block by metes and bounds or courses and distances would be subordinate to the description of the block by its number, and would have to give way in case of conflict. The present case involves the same principle. We might further suggest, if other grounds were necessary to sustain the judgment, that the acts of the respondent in and about the premises in the exercise of his possession are strongly indicative of the creation of a title by prescription; but we do not find it necessary to enter into a discussion of that question in detail. The order denying the motion for a new trial is affirmed.

CHINETTE v. CONKLIN, Judge. (No. 19,473.)

INSOLVENCY—APPOINTMENT OF ASSIGNEE.

Where an insolvent files a petition in insolvency, it is no objection to the appointment of an assignee that the only testimony as to the insolvency was that of a creditor, who was the insolvent's son-in-law.

In bank.

Application of J. P. Chinette for a writ of prohibition against J. R. Conklin, judge of the superior court of Kern county. Denied.

Wells & Jamison, for applicant.

HARRISON, J. On the 19th of December, 1893, a petition in insolvency was filed in the superior court of Kern county by the firm of Pourry, Freres & Co., and on the same day the respondent made an order adjudging the said firm insolvent, and appointed a day on which to choose an assignee of their estate. In the schedules annexed to the petition the firm of Ardizzi & Olcese were named as creditors of the insolvent firm; and, on the day fixed for choosing an assignee, Olcese appeared, and made proof of the claim of said firm, and by his evidence alone an assignee of the insolvent estate was chosen. Olcese is the son-in-law of the respondent; and, after the assignee had been chosen, the petitioner herein, who is also a creditor of the insolvent firm, moved the court to vacate the orders of December 19th, on the ground that, by reason of the relationship of Olcese to the respondent, he was disqualified to act in the proceedings in insolvency, and that the orders are void. This motion was denied, and thereafter the respondent made an order directing the sheriff to sell the property of the insolvent firm, which was accordingly done. Subsequently the present application was made for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent from acting or making any order in the insolvency proceedings.

The insolvent act (section 2) declares that the filing of the petition by the insolvent firm is itself an act of insolvency, "and thereupon the petitioner shall be adjudged an insolvent debtor." There are no "parties" to proceedings in insolvency other than the insolvent himself, at the time of the adjudication, or until after one or more creditors shall have made and filed proofs of their claims against the insolvent; and the order of the judge fixing the time for choosing an assignee is but a regulation of the order of business. At the time fixed for choosing the assignee there is no judicial function to be performed by the judge of the court, since the election of the assignee is made by a vote of the creditors, of which the clerk keeps a minute, and enters the result upon the records of the court. As the assignee has sold the property of the insolvent, there is no office for the writ of prohibition to perform in reference thereto.

We are of the opinion that the respondent, in making the order of adjudication, and in fixing the day for choosing the assignee, did not act in contravention of section 170, Code Civ. Proc. If, in the course of the proceedings, any matter requiring judicial action shall arise, it is not to be assumed that the respondent will violate his judicial obligations. The application is denied.

MERRIMAN v. WALTON et al. (No. 15,519.)

FRAUDULENT JUDGMENT—RELIEF IN EQUITY—PARTIES.

1. Where a justice of the peace refuses to vacate a judgment obtained in his court through fraud, and no right of appeal lies, the judgment debtor is entitled to relief in equity.

2. Where one of several joint judgment debtors sues to restrain the enforcement of the judgment against himself alone, he need not join the others as parties plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Action by one Merriman against one Walton and others to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gesford & Thompson, for appellants.
Coghlan & Hutchinson, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant Walton commenced an action against the plaintiff and another in a justice's court, and, after the defendants therein had answered the complaint, the justice set the case for trial on the 28th of February; but on the morning of that day it was agreed between the attorneys for the respective parties that the trial should be postponed and that the cause should be transferred to another township. On the next day the attorneys for the plaintiff herein received a letter from the justice, purporting to have been written the previous day, in which he stated that the case was to be transferred to another township, and thereupon the attorneys for Walton agreed to take such steps as would be necessary to effect the transfer. Instead of so doing, however, they had on the previous day, without any knowledge on the part of the plaintiff herein or of his attorneys, appeared before the justice, and caused judgment by default to be entered by the justice against the defendants therein for the full amount asked for in the complaint. At the time that the justice wrote the above letter, and at the time of the agreement on the part of Walton's attorneys to effect the transfer to another township, it was known to them that such judgment had been entered. Other interviews were subsequently had between the attorneys for the respective parties regarding the transfer of the cause, in which Walton's attorneys, for the purpose of misleading and deceiving the attorneys of the plaintiff herein, represented that they were seeking to effect the transfer of the cause, and in which they concealed the fact that the judgment had been entered; and by reason of their statements and deceptions the plaintiff herein did not learn that the judgment had been entered until more than 30 days after its entry, and when the time for an appeal therefrom had expired. Upon learning this fact, the plaintiff herein moved the justice to set aside the judgment, and recall an execution that had been issued thereon; and on the 18th of April this motion was granted, but on the next day the justice, without any notice to the plaintiff herein or his attorneys, vacated this order. Thereupon the plaintiff brought this action to perpetually enjoin Walton from enforcing the said judgment against him or his property. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and, the defendants declining to answer, judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which this appeal has been taken.

The complaint shows that the judgment in the justice's court was obtained by a fraud practiced upon the plaintiff herein by the attorneys of Walton, with the assistance of the justice, in a manner which entitles the plaintiff to the equitable relief sought; and the appellant does not attempt to controvert the power of a court of equity to afford the relief sought by the plaintiff, but rests his defense upon the proposition that the plaintiff is not entitled to equitable relief if he could obtain the same relief at law. It is a familiar rule that a separate action to restrain the enforcement of a judgment will not be sustained when the same relief can be obtained through a motion or other proceeding in the action in which the judgment was obtained; and, in a jurisdiction in which legal and equitable relief is dispensed in different tribunals, a court of equity will not grant relief against a judgment when the same relief can be obtained by the aid of the court that rendered the judgment. But under the system of procedure which obtains in this state, where the various kinds of relief are administered by the same tribunal, and where there is but one form of civil action for the enforcement or protection of civil rights (Code Civ. Proc. § 307), a party who presents a complaint showing his right to the relief asked is not to be denied that relief because he might have sought it under a different form of action. See Thompson v. Laughlin, 91 Cal. 313, 27 Pac. 752.

When the plaintiff learned that the judgment had been entered against him, the time for an appeal had expired; and, even if the justice had the power to grant his motion to open the judgment, his subsequent action vacating this order was equivalent to a denial of the motion, and from this order there was no appeal to the superior court. The rule under which a court of equity declines to interfere until after the application for relief has been made to the court in which the judgment was rendered has no application when relief has been sought and denied in that court. The denial of that court to grant relief gives to the court of equity the same authority to interfere as if the other court was powerless to render aid. Even if the plaintiff could have had the judgment annulled upon certiorari, he was not compelled to resort to that remedy; especially where he would not thereby obtain as effective relief as by the course herein pursued.

The objection that the codefendant of the plaintiff is not a party to this action is without merit. The judgment in the justice's court is restrained only so far as it affects the plaintiff herein and his property, leaving the judgment against his codefendant in full effect, to be enforced at any time. The judgment is affirmed.

WORKS et al. v. MERITT. (No. 19,385.) (Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1895.) MORTGAGE OF OPEN ACCOUNT—RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE—SUBSEQUENT ASSIGNMENT.

1. Where an open account is assigned in writing to secure a debt, the assignor cannot, by collecting the account, or assigning it to another, who has notice of the previous assignment, defeat the legal right of the assignee to collect it.

2. Civ. Code, § 2924, providing that "every transfer of an interest in property other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage," does not limit an owner's right to mortgage his personal property to the articles enumerated in section 2955.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by one Works and others against one Meritt on an account. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Luce & McDonald, for appellant. M. S. Babcock and Works & Works, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. On the 5th of February, 1891, the defendant was indebted to the Story & Isham Commercial Company, a corporation, in the sum of $525, for merchandise sold and delivered to him by it, and on that day the corporation, by an instrument of writing, assigned the indebtedness to Mrs. Adella B. Story as security for money paid and by said instrument agreed to be paid by her for the benefit and account of the corporation. This instrument is set out at length in the case of Commercial Co. v. Story, 100 Cal. 30, 34 Pac. 671. After this assignment the defendant gave to Mrs. Story his promissory note for the amount, which she accepted in full payment for the account, and gave to the defendant a receipt acknowledging its payment. Prior to giving this note the corporation executed an assignment of the claim to one Miller, who afterwards assigned it to the plaintiffs, which assignment was for a valuable consideration, and the defendant had notice thereof at the time that he executed the note to Mrs. Story. The plaintiffs and their assignor had notice also of the assignment in February to Mrs. Story. This action was brought to recover from the defendant the amount of said indebtedness. The court below held that there had been no assignment to Mrs. Story, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant has appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The respondents seek to sustain the decision upon the ground that as the account was assigned to Mrs. Story only as a security, the title still remained in the corporation (Civ. Code, § 2888), and that the corporation still had the power of disposing of the account. It is also claimed by the respondents that the account was not "pledged" to Mrs. Story, for the reason that she did not take possession of it, and that, as the assignment was not executed with the formalities required for a chattel mortgage, no lien was created in her favor. There can be no physical possession of an open account, but its assignment by an instrument of writing will vest the assignee with the legal right to collect the same, whether such assignment be in absolute ownership or for the mere purpose of collection, either as agent of the assignor, or as security for the performance of an obligation from the assignor to the assignee; and in the latter case the power of collection will be so coupled with an interest in the account as to prevent the assignor from doing any act to impair the rights of the assignee to collect the account. At the time that the account of the defendant was assigned to Mrs. Story the corporation was indebted to her, and as a further consideration for the assignment she obligated herself to pay the indebtedness of the corporation, and thereby acquired the right to collect the accounts assigned to her as security therefor. After thus conferring upon her an interest in these accounts, and the right to collect them for her own reimbursement, it was not competent for the corporation to deprive her of this right, either by collecting the account itself, or by an assignment to another, who had knowledge of the previous assignment to her. The provision in section 2924, Civ. Code, that "every transfer of an interest in property other than in trust, made only as a security for the performance of another act, is to be deemed a mortgage," does not limit the right of the owner of personal property to transfer the same by way of mortgage to the articles enumerated in section 2955, Id. The right to deal with property, and to make a qualified or absolute transfer of it, is an essential element of ownership, and may be exercised to the fullest extent, unless there is some statutory restriction of such right. Id. § 679. There is no express restriction in the statutes of this state against making a mortgage upon any kind of personal property, and the comprehensive provision in section 2924 indicates that the term "mortgage" embraces "every transfer made only as a security for the performance of another act," whether the transfers are those for which specific provision is made in other parts of the Code, or such as rest upon the natural right of individuals to deal with their property as they choose. Section 2955, in which provision is made for mortgages upon personal property, does not, in terms, restrict the right to make such mortgage upon the property therein enumerated; and the general provision in section 2957 that "a mortgage of personal property [that is, any mortgage of personal property] is void as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers in good faith," unless certain formalities are complied with, is of universal application, and is not limited to mortgages upon property, enumerated in section 2955. See, also, Gilman v. Curtis, 66 Cal. 116, 4 Pac. 1094; Tregear v. Water Co., 76 Cal. 537, 18 Pac. 658; Chittenden v. Pratt, 89 Cal. 178, 26 Pac. 626.

It was incumbent upon the plaintiffs, and not the defendant, to show that the corporation had not collected the $2,000 which it had reserved the right to use in its business. The assignment to Mrs. Story included all the accounts, and it was for the plaintiffs to show that this was within the exception. The reservation of $2,000 was, moreover, limited to moneys that might be collected by it, and did not confer the right to make an assignment of the accounts. The order is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BORDA. (No. 21,134.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 17, 1895.)

POLLUTION OF CITY WATER SUPPLY—PROSECUTION —CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—PENNING AND CORRALING SHEEP.

1. Error in the admission of testimony is cured by an order striking it out.

2. On a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 374, as amended by Act March 3, 1893, making it a misdemeanor to corral sheep over and on the banks of a stream from which a city's water supply is drawn, thereby causing a pollution of the water, evidence of the meaning of the word "corral," as accepted by usage among stockmen, is admissible.

3. Evidence showing how and to what extent the water was polluted was admissible.

4. The words "penned" and "corralled," as used in Pen. Code, § 374, as amended by Act March 3, 1893, making it a misdemeanor to keep sheep "penned, corralled, or housed on, over, or on the borders" of any stream used for a city water supply, means confined in a small inclosure or narrow place, either by means of an artificial structure, or through the agency of men and dogs, without such structure.

Commissioners' decision. In banc. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Domingo Borda was convicted of polluting the waters of a stream used for a city water supply, by corraling sheep over such stream and on its banks, and appeals. Affirmed.

Paris & Allison, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

BELCHER, C. The information charges that the defendant "on the 27th day of June, 1893, at the county of San Bernardino, state of California, did willfully and unlawfully keep a large number of sheep, to wit, about two thousand sheep, penned and corralled in, over, and on the banks of that certain stream of water known as the 'East Fork of the Mojave River,' so that, by reason of keeping said sheep so penned and corralled as aforesaid, the waters of said stream then and there became polluted; and from which said stream water was then and there, ever since has been, and now is, drawn for the supply of the inhabitants of the town of Hesperia, said Hesperia being then and there a town in the state of California." The charge was made under section 374 of the Penal Code, as amended March 3, 1893, which makes it a misdemeanor to keep any sheep or other live stock penned, corralled, or housed on, over, or on the borders of any stream, the waters of which are thereby polluted, and are drawn for the supply of the inhabitants of any city or town in this state. The defendant was convicted, and has appealed from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It was proved that the town of Hesperia had a population of three or four hundred people, who were supplied with water taken from the East fork of the Mojave river, and conducted through an open ditch about four miles, and then through a 14-inch pipe about eight miles, and that the water, in its normal condition, was very clear and pure, but that in June, 1893, it was so fouled with sheep manure as to be badly discolored, and made entirely unfit for use. It was also proved that in May and June, 1893, the defendant had a band of 2,000 or more sheep, which he daily drove to the banks of the said stream, a little above the head of the Hesperia ditch, and there, by the aid of men and dogs, herded them together in, along, and upon the stream for a considerable part of each day, and that the bed and banks of the stream were covered with manure dropped by the sheep.

J. F. Pike was called as a witness for the prosecution, and testified that he was on the East fork of the Mojave river on the 14th of July, and saw a large band of sheep there, which the defendant claimed. He was then asked, "Did you, when you were there, notice any corrals or structures along the eastern fork of the Mojave river?" The defendant objected to the question on the ground that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, because the time was subsequent to any act charged in the information. The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. The witness then testified that he saw a place which sheepmen call a "corral," and went on to describe it. On cross-examination the witness stated that the corral which he had described was not on the East fork of the river, but on a tributary; and thereupon, on motion of defendant, the testimony as to the corral was stricken out. The order overruling defendant's objection to the question propounded by the plaintiff is assigned as error, but, conceding that the ruling was erroneous, still it was rendered harmless by the subsequent order striking the evidence out.

Perry Blackburn was a witness for the prosecution, and stated that he was present when the defendant was arrested, that it was on the East fork of the Mojave river, and that defendant was there with a band of about 2,000 sheep. He also stated that he had seen the defendant with the sheep there before in May and the early part of June. The witness was then asked to explain how he saw the sheep in and along and on the stream; and said: "They come in the stream about ten o'clock, and the sheep, as a rule, drink and lay down. They don't have to be herded. If they commence to start away on any point, they send their dogs after them, and the dogs bunch them up. The men hardly ever leave the camps; and the men, as a general rule, sleep in the middle of the day, and in the afternoon, about 4 o'clock, they start the sheep out, and they come back just at night, dark, and their sheep is so trained that they don't have any manufactured corrals. They stand themselves, with herders sleeping around them, and their dogs." The witness was next asked: "Where a band of sheep are kept bunched together that way and watched by men and dogs, isn't that understood among stockmen as 'corralling'?" The defendant objected to the question on the ground that it called for an opinion, and was a question for the jury to determine. The objection was overruled, and this ruling is assigned as error. We see no prejudicial error in the action of the court complained of. The objection was not, as claimed, that the witness was not shown to be an expert, and hence not qualified to answer the question. And the answer sought was simply as to what stockmen understand constitutes the corralling of sheep. The word "corral" comes from the Spanish language, and is to be construed according to its approved usage. Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 16. It was proper, therefore, to show what that usage is among stockmen.

Henry Johnson was a witness for the prosecution, and testified that he had had charge of the Hesperia waterworks for two years. He was asked: "How is the discoloration and impurity in that water compared this season with what it was last season, prior to the 27th day of last June?" This question was objected to by defendant as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and the objection was overruled. It is urged that this ruling was erroneous, but we think it clearly correct. It was entirely competent to show how, and to what extent, the water had been polluted. The witness said: "The natural condition of that water is perfectly clear,—clear as crystal. In the last three or four months, May, June, and July, and up to now, it has been pretty bad. It is very bad,—colored brown. The discoloration is caused by sheep manure. We scraped it up by the bushel,—wagon load,—up at the head of the ditch, and two or three miles in the bed of the river and on the sides.”

The court instructed the jury “that ‘to pen’ means to confine in a small inclosure or narrow place, and that ‘to corral’ means to surround or inclose; to coop up; to put into a close place. This need not necessarily be done by means of an artificial structure, but may also be done by means of, or through the agency of, men and dogs, either alone or in conjunction with natural or artificial barriers of an inanimate nature.” The appellant contends that this instruction was erroneous, and it is said, “The vice of this instruction is that the words ‘pen’ and ‘corral’ are given a definition that is unusual and figurative, and not according to the context either of the statute or of the information.” The language of the statute is, “penned, corralled, or housed on, over, or on the borders of any such stream.” This plainly implies that, within the meaning of the statute, the animals may be inclosed by means other than an ordinary pen or corral, as such structures are not usually built on or over a stream. And such use of the words “pen” and corral” is authorized. See Cent. Dict. The instruction was proper, and the appellant has no valid ground of complaint. The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: SEARLS, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. UN DONG. (No. 21,104.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 7, 1895.)

ASSAULT WITH DEADLY WEAPON — EVIDENCE — IDENTITY OF DEFENDANT—TESTIMONY AS TO CHARACTER—OCCUPATION OF WITNESS.

1. On a trial for assault with a deadly weapon, a number of witnesses testified that defendant and one B. laid in wait at a street corner until the prosecuting witness came along, when defendant pointed him out, and told B. to shoot him, which B. did. Defendant was positively identified by the witnesses. A peace officer testified that he was present just after the shot was fired, and that he recognized the assailants, and that defendant was not one of them. A doorkeeper at a theater testified that defendant was in the theater when the shooting occurred, and several witnesses testified that the prosecuting witness accused another person of doing the shooting. There was evidence that the trouble grew out of rival societies, and that defendant was the head of one of them, and that his prosecution was an afterthought. Held, that a conviction would not be disturbed.

2. On a trial for assault with a deadly weapon, where the prosecuting witness, on direct examination, testified that the only reason he could give for the shooting was that he had once notified the authorities that defendant was one of a number who had assaulted a person, it was error to exclude, on cross-examination, a question as to what part defendant took in such assault.

3. On a trial for assault, it is error to allow the prosecuting attorney to question defendant as to whether he lived in a house of prostitution; and the fact that his answers are in the negative, or objections to the questions are sustained, does not cure the error.

4. It is error to allow the prosecution to ask one of defendant's witnesses whether he is connected with a gambling house, when the question is not called for by anything the witness has testified to.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Un Dong was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Reversed.

C. D. Wright and D. W. Burchard, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant, a Chinese, was convicted of an assault with a deadly weapon upon a fellow countryman, and sentenced to the state prison for the term of two years. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial.

It is strongly urged that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, but we do not think this contention can be sustained. The evidence of the prosecution tended to show that the alleged assault was committed between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, upon a public street in a quarter of the city of San José known as "Chinatown"; that defendant and an associate, one Ah Wei, lay in wait at a street corner, outside a restaurant, until the prosecuting witness, one Ah Bong, came out, when defendant pointed out Bong to Ah Wei, and told the latter to shoot; that Ah Wei immediately fired two shots at Ah Bong, one of which hit the latter in the back; that, immediately following the shots by Ah Wei, several other shots were fired by a party or parties from across the street. But by whom the latter shots were fired, or whom they were fired at, was not disclosed. These facts, in substance, were testified to by a number of Chinese witnesses, several of whom positively identified defendant as one of the assailants. On the part of defendant, a large number of Chinese witnesses, and some white witnesses, gave testimony tending strongly to show that defendant was not present at the time of the assault, and did not participate therein. One Wheeler, a peace officer or watchman in Chinatown, testified that he was in a restaurant near the place of the shooting, and ran out on the sidewalk, where he could see the parties before the second shot was fired; that he saw Ah Bong's assailants, and recognized them, and that defendant was not one of them, but that one Toi Soon did the shooting. Another white witness, Jones, who was the doorkeeper at the Chinese theater, testified that he had seen defendant enter the theater earlier in the evening, and that defendant was still in the theater when the shooting occurred. Other witnesses, including some police officers, testified that the prosecuting witness, immediately after the shooting, accused another party than defendant of doing the shooting. There was also evidence tending to show that the trouble grew out of differences between members of rival tongs or societies; that the arrest and prosecution of defendant, who it appeared was the grand master or headman of one of the rival tongs, was an afterthought prompted by a desire on the part of the wounded man and his friends to make defendant suffer vicariously for the wrong of the real assailant, who had escaped and could not be apprehended.

The evidence is exceedingly contradictory and conflicting throughout, and there are many things calculated to cast discredit upon the case of the prosecution. But, while the evidence is not, to our minds, by any means satisfactory, we cannot say that it was not sufficient to sustain the verdict. But we think the court committed error in its ruling on the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, Ah Bong, which, under the circumstances, was manifestly prejudicial to defendant. The only evidence tending to show motive for the alleged assault was that given by the witness Ah Bong, the party assaulted. He testified in his direct examination by the prosecution that the only cause of the assault upon him, so far as he knew, was that he was present on a previous occasion when the defendant, with several other Chinese, came to the theater, and assaulted the white doorkeeper by beating him with revolvers; that he (Ah Bong) witnessed the affair and subsequently gave the names of those engaged in it to the officers, which resulted in the arrest of the assailants. That previous to this he and the defendant were on friendly terms and had never had any difficulty. Upon cross-examination the witness was asked, "Was this defendant, Un Dong, among the parties who assaulted that doorkeeper?" to which he answered, "Yes, sir; he had something to do with it, too." The defendant's counsel then asked, "What did he do?" to which question the district attorney objected. The objection was sustained, and defendant was not permitted to cross-examine the witness upon the subject. The record does not disclose the ground of the objection, but the question was plainly in the line of proper cross-examination, and upon a point of vital importance to the defendant. The witness having assigned the result of the affair at the theater as the sole ground for the defendant's malice towards himself, and the only motive for the subsequent assault upon him, it was very material for the defendant to rebut the statements of the witness in this regard, and to show, if he could, by the cross-examination of the witness, that the latter was mistaken, and that defendant had in truth no participation in that affair, as defendant himself claimed was the fact. This he might have been able to accomplish, if permitted to properly cross-examine the witness, or at least have so shaken the statements of the latter as to have turned the scales of justice in his favor.

The defendant was examined as a witness in his own behalf. His examination in chief was confined to a denial of any participation in the assault upon the prosecuting witness, Ah Bong, or that he was present on the occasion, and a statement that he was in the theater at the time; and a further denial of having taken part in the assault upon the doorkeeper of the theater. In cross-examination he was asked these questions by the prosecution: "Q. Who lives in that house with you, where you live? Defendant's Attorney: We object to that as irrelevant and immaterial. (Objection overruled. Defendant excepts.) A. I had servants that attend to my household matters. Q. Some women live in that house? (Objected to and sustained.) Prosecuting Attorney: I think the prosecution has a right to show what this man is engaged in, or his occupation or business. The Court: Why don't you? Prosecuting Attorney: Q. Isn't it a fact that you live in a house of prostitution?" To this defendant objected, but the objection was overruled, and defendant answered: "No; it ain't a house of prostitution. It is a house where they rent rooms for boarding purposes." He was also asked: "Are there any Chinese prostitutes in that house?" and "Are there any Chinese women in that house?" to which latter questions objections were sustained. This whole course of examination by the prosecution was improper, in the highest degree. The questions asked were not only in large part violative of the defendant's right to have his cross-examination confined to the subject-matter of his testimony in chief (People v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 603, 6 Pac. 695; People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. 687), but the obvious purpose and undoubted effect of such course of examination were to degrade and injure defendant in the estimation of the jury. Its allowance was therefore erroneous, and clearly prejudicial. People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078. Nor was the error cured or the prejudicial effect removed by the negative answers to the questions allowed, or the sustaining of defendant's objection to others where, as here, the manifest purpose and inevitable tendency of the questions were to injuriously affect the verdict. The error in such case lies in permitting an examination of that character. People v. Wells, supra. It was likewise error to allow the question, "Aren't you connected with a gambling house with Yen Yick?" put by the prosecution, on cross-examination, to Chee Ying, a witness for defendant. It was not in response to anything called out on his direct examination, and could have been intended but for one purpose,—that of discrediting the witness with the jury by a method wholly unsanctioned in law. This character of examination appears to have been several times indulged in by the prosecution. We have had frequent occasions to animadvert upon similar conduct in criminal cases, and it has been uniformly held to be improper. Its repetition is not only wholly inexcusable, but it is not in keeping with a proper appreciation by the prosecuting officer of the functions of his office.

It is contended that the court invaded the province of the jury in charging them that there was an "irreconcilable conflict" in the evidence, as between the prosecution and defense. While it is a dangerous practice to undertake to characterize the effect of the evidence, in the sense in which the language of the court was here used, we are not prepared to say, in view of the evidence in the case, that the charge was prejudicially erroneous. For the errors above pointed out, the judgment and order are reversed.

CHAPMAN v. PENNIE. (No. 15,520.)¹

DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT IN FORECLOSURE—ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY.

1. An action cannot be maintained against an administrator for a deficiency judgment on foreclosure, where the decedent, the mortgagor, was a nonresident at the time of commencement of the action to foreclose, remained away from the state until after the sale thereunder, and never appeared in the action.

2. On the same day that a discharge in bankruptcy was granted to B., the maker of a note and mortgage, "from all debts and claims which are made provable against his estate," a stipulation was entered into between B. and C., the owner of the note, whereby it was agreed that the interest should be reduced, that the note should be extended, and that proceedings to enforce its payment should be dismissed. Held that, as it did not appear that the agreement to pay the note was made after the discharge, the parties did not intend to make a new contract on which the bankrupt could be held, but only to extend the time and reduce the interest of the note and mortgage.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Wm. T. Wallace, Judge.

Action brought by E. W. Chapman against James C. Pennie, administrator of the estate of John Bensley, deceased, to compel him to pay a deficiency judgment on the mortgage note of his decedent. Judgment rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. Osmont, for appellant. Naphtaly, Friedenreich & Ackerman, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The deceased, John Bensley, made his promissory note to the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, November 24, 1875, for the sum of $80,000, payable one year thereafter, at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month, and to secure the same executed to the Nevada Bank a mortgage upon certain real estate in the city and county of San Francisco. January 19, 1881, the Nevada Bank commenced an action upon the promissory note against Bensley and others for the foreclosure of the mortgage given as security for the payment therefor. Bensley was absent from the state, and service upon him was had by the publication of summons. Judgment was rendered in that action, January 5, 1882, for the foreclosure of the mortgage and the sale of the premises, and providing that in case of a deficiency in the proceeds of the sale the judgment for such deficiency should be docketed against the defendant, Bensley. Under this judgment an order of sale was issued to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco; and on the 10th of August, 1882, he returned the order of sale, from which it appeared that, after applying the proceeds of the sale upon the judgment, there was a deficiency of $37,721.51. Judgment for this deficiency was then docketed by the clerk against Bensley. December 10, 1889, the Nevada Bank assigned the said promissory note to T. M. Osmont, and on the 21st of May, 1890, Osmont assigned the same to the plaintiff. The plaintiff has brought this action upon the aforesaid promissory note, setting forth in his complaint that the sum of $37,721.51, with interest, is unpaid thereon, and alleging that on the 26th of May, 1890, he presented his claim for the said deficiency to the defendant, as the administrator of Bensley's estate, for allowance, and that it was by him rejected. Judgment was rendered for the defendant in the court below, and the plaintiff has appealed directly therefrom upon the judgment roll alone, without any statement or bill of exceptions.

In his brief herein counsel for appellant states: "The sole question involved in the case—assuming that such defense may be made without pleading—is whether an action can be maintained against an administrator for a deficiency arising upon the sale of mortgaged premises pursuant to a decree of foreclosure against the decedent in his lifetime, in a case where the decedent, the mortgagor, was a nonresident of this state at the time of the commencement of the action to foreclose, remained absent from the state until after the foreclosure and sale thereunder, and until his death, and never appeared in the action, no jurisdiction having been acquired except by publication of summons." This precise question was determined in accordance with the contention of appellant in Blumberg v. Birch, 99 Cal. 416, 34 Pac. 102, and in the more recent case of Felton v. West, 102 Cal. 266, 36 Pac. 676, both of which decisions were, however, rendered after the appeal had been taken in the present case. February 27, 1877, Bensley was adjudged a bankrupt by the district court of the United States for the district of California, and on March 20, 1878, that court rendered its judgment granting Bensley a discharge in bankruptcy, by which it ordered that he be "forever discharged from all debts and claims which are made provable against his estate, and which existed on the 5th day of February, 1877, on which day the petition for adjudication was filed against him, excepting such debts, if any, as are by law exempted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy." The note in the present action was provable against Bensley's estate, and by the terms of the decree he was discharged therefrom. Counsel for appellant in his brief contends that this decreed is not available by reason of the fact that his discharge was based upon an agreement reserving the creditors' rights against him. The decree itself is, however, absolute and without limitation. We cannot in this action look into the agreement for the purpose of determining whether the decree is in accordance with that agreement. If for any reason the decree is other than should have been rendered, the parties affected thereby should have applied for its correction to the court which pronounced it. Upon a collateral attack we can only look at the language in which it is expressed. It is not impossible that the agreement referred to, and which was made in July, 1877, was vacated and annulled by the parties themselves prior to the entry of the decree of discharge. For the purpose of sustaining the action of the court we are to so hold, if necessary.

It is contended, however, that if it must be held that Bensley was released from his liability on this note by the discharge in bankruptcy, yet he is liable for the debt under the agreement made March 20, 1878. The agreement, as averred and found, is as follows: "That on the 20th day of March, 1878, the said John Bensley and the said James Coffin, while the said Coffin was the owner and holder of said promissory note, entered into an agreement in writing by which it is covenanted and agreed that the interest of said promissory note should be reduced to eight (8) per cent. per annum, and that said interest should be punctually paid, and that the time of the payment of said promissory note should be extended to the 1st day of November, 1880, and that said note should be punctually paid; and, furthermore, that said certain proceedings theretofore instituted by the said James Coffin to enforce the payment of said promissory note should be dismissed, which said proceedings were accordingly dismissed." It is plain, we think, that this stipulation was not understood or intended by the parties to have the effect now claimed for it. The note was secured by a mortgage, and no one supposed that as to the security the debt was discharged by the proceedings in bankruptcy. The parties believed the debt preserved by the previous agreement. The motive of Bensley doubtless was to procure time to pay off and discharge the mortgage, and the agreement could have had no other purpose than to afford Bensley this privilege. It does not appear that it was made after the discharge. It bears the same date. As it was shown that the debt had been discharged, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that the bankrupt had agreed, after the discharge, to pay the debt, and the action should have been based on the new agreement. The parties did not intend to make a new contract which should supersede the note and mortgage. It merely extended the time and reduced the interest stipulated in the note and mortgage. The judgment is affirmed.

ROUNTREE v. I. X. L. LIME CO. (No. 15-745.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1895.)

APPEAL—TRIFLING ERROR.

An appeal from a judgment, upon a trivial error in the computation of interest, is without merit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; J. H. Logan, Judge.

Action by Rountree against I. X. L. Lime Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Z. N. Goldsby, for appellant. L. F. Smith, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appeal in this case is without merit, and was evidently taken for delay. It is brought here upon the judgment roll alone, without any exception to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of fact, and the judgment as entered follows the conclusions of law found by the court. In these conclusions of law the court finds that the plaintiff "is entitled to judgment for the sum of $638.55, with interest thereon from the 1st day of September, 1893, to this date (February 17, 1894), and now amounting to $23.70, with costs of suit." Upon a proper computation the interest upon the principal sum of the judgment would amount to $20.70 instead of $23.70, and the latter sum is manifestly a clerical error, which would have been corrected by the court below upon having its attention called to the matter. To appeal from a judgment upon a trivial error in the computation of interest, when the entire relief sought could have been obtained upon a mere application to the trial court, is essentially frivolous, and merits reproof. The superior court is directed to make the proper correction in its computation of interest, and thereupon the judgment will stand affirmed. The costs of this appeal are to be paid by the appellant, and the respondent is allowed the sum of $100 damages as a part of the costs of the appeal.

Ex parte COOK et al. (No. 21,197.)

JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE.

A justice of the peace has no jurisdiction of the crime of embezzlement committed in another county.

Petition by Joseph E. Cook and Thomas E. Langley for habeas corpus and release from commitment by a justice of the peace. Writ granted.

Myrick & Deering and Wm. S. Wells, for petitioners. C. Y. Brown, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Habeas corpus. Petitioners have been held to answer, after examination before a committing magistrate, for the crime of embezzlement, and ask to be discharged upon the ground that they were committed without reasonable or probable cause. The specific charge is that they embezzled certain fruit which was received by them in the county of Contra Costa under a contract by which they agreed to incur certain expenses for packing, shipping, etc., and to sell the fruit in Eastern markets for account of the growers on commission. The evidence in the deposition shows that they did with the fruit precisely what they contracted to do, but they failed to pay over to the growers the whole amount of their share of the proceeds. It is clear from the evidence that there was no embezzlement of the fruit. If any embezzlement has been committed it was of the proceeds, and was committed in San Francisco, and not in Contra Costa. The magistrate who issued this commitment (a justice of the peace of Contra Costa county) had no jurisdiction of the only offense which the evidence has the slightest tendency to establish. Prisoners discharged.

PEOPLE v. COLLINS. (No. 21,129.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1895.)

INFORMATION—NEGATING FEDERAL JURISDICTION
—IMPANELING JURY—QUALIFICATION—IMPEACHING WITNESS.

1. Since the jurisdiction of a state over crimes committed within its territory is general, and that of the United States exceptional, depending on the fact of purchase of land with the consent of the state legislature for forts, arsenals, and other needful buildings, it is not necessary to negative, in an indictment or information in the state courts, the jurisdiction of the federal courts.

2. The absence of a venireman, when his name is called in a criminal case, does not necessitate a suspension of proceedings until an attachment can be served, but the court may fill the panel from the veniremen present.

3. An opinion as to the guilt of a defendant in a criminal case, based on newspaper statements, does not disqualify one from acting as a juror, where he testifies that the opinion will not prevent him from acting impartially.

4. A prejudice against the defense of insanity in criminal cases does not disqualify a juror, where no such defense is made or contemplated.

5. The fact that jurors summoned on a special venire fail to answer when called in the morning does not render it erroneous to put their names in the box in the afternoon when they appear, though the names of those put in the box in the morning are not exhausted.

6. Where a juror on a murder trial testifies that he has conscientious scruples against the infliction of the death penalty, and a challenge by the people on this ground is sustained, the court does not abuse its discretion in refusing permission to the defendant's counsel to further examine the juror.

7. In a murder trial, evidence is not admissible to contradict a witness who has testified, on cross-examination, that he executed a bond for certain Chinamen under the internal revenue law, but denied that he had been paid for it.

8. Where the bill of exceptions does not show that defendant was absent when the case was set for trial, it will be presumed that he was present.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Edward A. Belcher, Judge.

Patrick J. Collins was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

G. E. Colwell and P. C. Harlan, for appellant. William S. Barnes, for the People.

HAYNES, C. Appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree. His motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, respectively, were denied, and he was duly sentenced to be hanged. He now appeals from the said judgment and the orders denying said motions.

The first question presented goes to the sufficiency of the information. The information charges the defendant with a felony, "to wit, murder, committed as follows: The said Patrick J. Collins on the 9th day of October, A. D. eighteen hundred and ninety-three, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, did then and there willfully," etc., kill and murder one Sarah Collins. It is argued on behalf of appellant that this information does not show that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the superior court of said city and county, because that court has not jurisdiction over all the territory embraced therein, but that the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction of portions thereof, and that, therefore, the general allegation that the offense was committed "at the city and county of San Francisco" is not sufficient. This objection concedes the jurisdiction of the superior court over all places within the limits of the city and county, except as to such parts, if any, over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction. This exception is created by the constitution of the United States, which provides: "Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of congress, become the seat of the government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards and other needful buildings." Article 1, § 8. Section 37 of our Political Code provides: "The state has the following rights over persons within its limits, to be exercised in the cases and in the manner provided by law: (1) To punish for crime." Both the general and state governments assume the jurisdiction of the state over all the territory within its borders, the cases provided for in the constitution of the United States being regarded as exceptions merely, the exceptions depending upon the fact of purchase with the consent of the legislature. The jurisdiction of the state being general, and that of the United States exceptional, it is not necessary to negative, in an indictment or information in the state courts, the jurisdiction of the federal courts. It is like an exception in an act creating or defining a public offense, in which case it is held that if the exception is not necessary to the description of the offense it need not be alleged or negatived, but is matter of defense simply. The mere ownership by the United States of land or property within the county does not show any federal jurisdiction over crimes committed upon it, as that fact does not oust the jurisdiction of the state; but the ownership must be acquired by purchase with the consent of the legislature, which is held to include the acquisition of property by eminent domain when that proceeding is authorized by the legislature. U. S. v. Cornell, 2 Mason, 60, Fed. Cas. No. 14,867; U. S. v. Jones, 109 U. S. 513, 3 Sup. Ct. 346. The federal jurisdiction, therefore, involves a question of fact, viz. a purchase by the United States, or the acquisition of property by a proceeding to condemn it, and of such questions courts will not take judicial notice. It is a matter of common knowledge that the United States occupies buildings for customhouse, post office, and other purposes; but whether such buildings have been purchased by the United States, or whether they are occupied under leases from private owners, is a matter to be proved by the record of the conveyances. The information in question conforms to the statutory precedent given in section 951 of the Penal Code, in the particular under discussion, and as this court cannot, as matter of law, say that the federal courts have exclusive jurisdiction over any part of the city and county of San Francisco, the jurisdiction of the court is sufficiently alleged; and the objection here urged is not based on any evidence tending to show that the court did not, in fact, have jurisdiction. The exceptional character of the federal jurisdiction is further shown by the precedents used in the federal courts, which allege, not only that the place where the offense was committed was within the jurisdiction of such court, but that it was not within the jurisdiction of any state. What has been said points out the distinction between this case and the case of People v. Wong Wang, 92 Cal. 281, 28 Pac. 270. There the offense was a misdemeanor, over which, if committed in the city of Los Angeles, the police court had exclusive jurisdiction, and as such jurisdiction was given by law, and therefore must be judicially noticed, it did not appear upon the face of the information that the superior court had jurisdiction, since its jurisdiction depended upon a fact which did not appear, namely, that it was committed in that part of the county outside of the city. The motion in arrest of judgment in the case at bar was properly denied.

During the formation of the jury one of the veniremen failed to respond to his name when called by the clerk, whereupon defendant's attorney moved that an attachment issue for him, and that proceedings be stayed until he could be brought into court and examined touching his qualifications to serve as a juror; but, it appearing to the court that there was then present more than enough veniremen to fill the panel, the motion was denied. Like motions were made as to other jurors who failed to answer. This ruling was not erroneous. If the court were required to suspend proceedings until an attachment could be served and the juror's presence secured, the impanelment of a jury in a murder case would often prove almost interminable. The power of the court to excuse a qualified juror who is present is undoubted, and no reason is perceived why the court may not assume that the failure of the juror to answer is based upon a sufficient reason, and refuse to issue an attachment. Whether an attachment shall issue is within the discretion of the court. Section 238, Code Civ. Proc., provides that "any juror summoned, who willfully and without reasonable excuse fails to attend, may be attached and compelled to attend." In People v. Arceo, 32 Cal. 40, it was said: "But a qualified juror may be rejected, and still a jury of lawful men, against whom there is no objection, may be obtained. A party is entitled to a lawful jury, but no decision has been brought to our notice to the effect that under all circumstances he is, as a matter of absolute right, entitled to have the first juror called who has all the statutory qualifications." Unless the defendant has an "absolute right" under the law to have the first juror called present to be examined before he is required to proceed, it must appear that he has been prejudiced in order to make the error, if it is one, available, and no prejudice appears.

Defendant objected to the panel, "to lay the foundation for another motion," but what motion he intended to make, or what objection he made to the panel, does not appear. It was said by counsel that "in impaneling and drawing of special jurors the Code was not followed"; but in what respect is not stated, and does not appear. We have carefully gone over the proceeding relating to the securing of a jury, and find nothing to which the objection could properly apply.

Several objections were taken by the defendant to the disallowance of challenges for actual bias. The examination of these jurors disclosed the fact that, so far as any of them had formed an opinion as to the guilt of the defendant, such opinion was based upon newspaper statements, and that it would not prevent them from acting fairly and impartially as jurors. The rulings of the court upon these challenges were clearly within the law as stated in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 227, 34 Pac. 718. See Pen. Code, § 1076.

A juror, under examination touching his qualifications, said, in reply to a question, that he was a juror in the Goldenson Case. He was then asked: "You don't believe in the plea of insanity, do you? A. No, sir. Q. You don't believe in the plea of insanity in any case? A. Ordinarily not. No, sir." Counsel for defendant thereupon challenged the juror, and his challenge was denied. No defense based on insanity was made or contemplated. The challenge was properly denied.

Certain jurors summoned on a special venire failed to answer when called in the morning. At 2 o'clock they were present, and their names were then put in the box, though the names of those put in the box in the morning were not exhausted. Defendant's objection thereto was properly overruled. They did not cease to be of the venire, because they did not appear in time to answer in the morning, nor could their names be properly placed in the box until they did appear.

The special venires ordered on December 27, 1893, and January 3, 1894, respectively, appear to have been in all respects regular. Besides, the challenge did not point out any supposed irregularity, nor is any ground of challenge shown in appellant's brief.

The juror Rudolph Jordan, on examination by the prosecution, testified that he had conscientious scruples against the infliction of the death penalty, and was challenged on behalf of the people upon that ground, and the challenge was allowed under subdivision 8, § 1074, Pen. Code. Counsel for defendant then asked permission to further examine the juror. The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing the request.

Counsel says in his brief that "placing names, once drawn and disposed of, in the box to be drawn again, is irregular and erroneous." We are not referred to any part of the record in which it appears that it was done, and we are unable to find any basis in the record for the point stated.

A witness for the prosecution, called in rebuttal, was asked upon cross-examination whether he executed a bond for certain Chinamen under the internal revenue laws, and whether he had not been paid for doing so. He answered that he had executed the bonds, but denied that he was paid for it. When the prosecution rested, counsel for defendant asked for time to get a witness by whom he stated he could prove that Kelly (the people's witness) was paid for going upon these bonds, and this for the purpose of discrediting Kelly as a witness. The evidence proposed was inadmissible.

It is said by counsel for defendant that the case should not have been set for trial during the absence of defendant. The minutes of the court show that on the day set for the defendant to plead he entered his plea, and the case was set for December 9, 1893, and the minutes of December 9th show that the case was continued until the 27th. The bill of exceptions does not show that the defendant was not present, and it must therefore be presumed that he was.

Certain instructions asked by defendant were refused because already given in the instructions prepared by the court. Such refusal was proper. The instructions given were concise, clear, and in no respect subject to the remark of counsel that in effect the court charged "the jury with respect to matters of fact," in violation of the constitution.

It is not necessary to notice at length the remark of counsel as to the general effect of the rulings of the court, being prejudicial to the defendant, while conceding that the several rulings, separately considered, were not prejudicially erroneous. If such rulings become so frequent as to possibly create a prejudice in the minds of the jury, the cause thereof is not chargeable to the court.

The jury were amply justified in finding the defense of an alibi not proven, and in finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree.

We find no error of which the appellant can complain. The trial seems to have been conducted with great care and fairness by the court below, and we have given the record such careful examination as the great gravity of the case demands. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

STEWART v. KYSER. (No. 15,521).¹

RESIDENCE OF VOTERS—INMATE OF VETERANS' HOME.

1. An inmate of the veterans' home, whose intention is to stay there as long as he lives, is a resident of the precinct in which the home is located, and qualified to vote as such, though he became an inmate of the home solely because of his indigent circumstances.

2. Where a veteran becomes an inmate of the veterans' home with the intention of making it his permanent residence, the fact that he is supported at public expense does not prevent him from voting in the precinct where the home is located, though Const. art. 2, § 4, provides that for the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense. People v. Holden, 28 Cal. 137, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Election contest by William Stewart against R. M. Kyser to determine the title to the office of public administrator of Napa county.

From a judgment for defendant, the contestant appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Johnston and Henry Hogan (Garrett W. McEnerney, of counsel), for appellant. H. M. Barstow and T. B. Hutchinson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding by which the plaintiff contested the election of the defendant to the office of public administrator of the county of Napa, on the ground that a number of votes cast and counted for defendant, more than equal to the majority by which he had been declared elected, were illegal, solely because the persons who cast them were not residents of the precincts in which they voted. The court found that defendant had received 1,671 legal votes, and that the contestant had received only 1,656 votes, and thereupon adjudged that the defendant had been duly elected. The contestant, within 60 days after the entry of the judgment, appealed therefrom on the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions as to matters of law and fact. The bill of exceptions shows that a number of the inmates of the veterans' home and inmates of the county infirmary and certain students of the Napa College voted at the election in the precincts of said county in which those institutions are respectively situated, and appellant contends that such inmates and students had not been residents of the county and of the precincts in which they respectively voted during the period of 30 days immediately prior to the election, and therefore that they were not qualified electors. Counsel for appellant have taken the testimony of their witness Killalee as a sample of that of some 16 other inmates of the veterans' home who were called and testified at the instance of plaintiff, and correctly represents it as follows: "Killalee came to the county and to the precinct and entered the home as an inmate on November 14, 1891. For some time prior to this date he was living on the charity of relatives and friends in the city and county of San Francisco, where he was an elector. He made and subscribed the usual application, and obtained a permit to enter the home. He says that: 'The reason I went there was because I was in indigent circumstances. Circumstances compelled me to go, and I would not have gone there had it not been for those circumstances. I had no desire to become a resident of the veterans' home or the precinct, other than as induced by my indigent circumstances. Since I have been there, I have been maintained and supported by the home. At the time I went there I did not have any fixed intention with respect to the length of time I should stay there. It was my intention to stop there as long as I lived. I have no other interests in the precinct except my relations with the home. I went there with the expectation of living and dying there,—making it my permanent home the balance of my life. I have no relatives or property interests in the Veterans' Home precinct. I have no other home. At the time I went here, it was my intention to make the home my permanent home. I made it as a home to live and die,—as a refuge." And counsel for appellant further say: "There is no claim made that the witness was not a citizen of the United States, of lawful age, and having been in the state, county, and precinct a sufficient length of time to entitle him to vote; but the claim is that he was not a resident of the precinct and county in which he claimed his vote and voted, within the meaning of section 4 of article 2 of the constitution. The question presented is whether or not Killalee was a legal resident of the Veterans' Home precinct, and entitled to vote at the last general election." It being thus properly conceded that the witness had all the requisite qualifications of an elector of the Veterans' Home precinct, except the intention to abandon his former residence, and to adopt and make the veterans' home his place of residence, the controversy is still further reduced to the simple question of fact as to whether or not he went to the veterans' home and remained there with such intention. And upon this issue the uncontradicted testimony of the witness that such was his intention is abundantly sufficient to justify the finding of the court to that effect. The circumstances and motives by which he was induced to change his residence, so far as disclosed, are immaterial. The evidence upon the issue as to the qualifications of Killalee is, substantially, a fair sample of that applicable to each of the other inmates of the veterans' home, the infirmary, and the college, whose votes were adjudged by the court to have been legal. In other words, if Killalee was a qualified elector of the precinct in which he voted, the judgment is right.

It is contended for appellant, however, that Killalee could not have gained a residence for the purpose of voting at the veterans' home while there as a beneficiary at public expense, for the reason that the gaining of such residence is prohibited by the fourth section of the second article of the constitution of this state, which is as follows: "For the purpose of voting no person shall be deemed to have gained or lost a residence by reason of his presence or absence while employed in the service of the United States, nor while engaged in the navigation of the waters of this state or of the United States, or of the high seas; nor while a student at any seminary of learning; nor while kept at any almshouse or other asylum at public expense; nor while confined in any public prison." As construed by our supreme court in the case of People v. Holden, 28 Cal. 137, this section does not have the effect claimed for it by counsel for appellant. In that case the qualification of soldiers to vote while employed in the service of the United States was questioned, and it was decided that their presence in Mendocino county, while thus employed in the service of the United States, did not "preclude them from acquiring a residence in Mendocino, if disposed to do so." The court further said: "That it was their intention to acquire a domicile in Mendocino county sufficiently appears from the evidence. Such being the case, there is nothing in the constitutional provision in question (which is merely declaratory of the common law) which stands in the way of their doing so." Thus their residence for the purpose of voting in Mendocino county was made to depend upon proof of their intention to make that county their place of residence while they were there present in the service of the United States; there being no question that they had all other requisite qualifications of electors. Whatever may be said of some portions of the language used arguendo in the opinion of Chief Justice Sanderson in that case, the decision is clearly in point for the respondent in this case, and upon the authority of that decision the judgment of the trial court in this case is affirmed.

TREWEEK v. HOWARD et al. (No. 15,-215.)

SURETIES—DEMAND—JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—LIABILITY ON EXECUTOR'S BOND.

1. Civ. Code, § 2844, which confers on a surety all the rights of a guarantor, does not render demand or notice necessary to fix the liability of surety, unless expressly required by the contract, since section 2807 provides that a guarantor of payment or performance is liable to the guarantee immediately upon the default of the principal without demand or notice.

2. Where a complaint joins several causes of action, it is not necessary to repeat at length the allegations of the first count in the succeeding counts, but it is necessary to refer to such allegations specifically, and state that they are to be taken as part of the cause of action alleged in such succeeding counts.

3. A decree of distribution, rendered after final accounting by an executor, is, in the absence of fraud, binding on the executor and his sureties, though the latter are not parties to the proceeding.

4. The fact that an executor had, during the lifetime of the testator, and while acting as his agent, embezzled money of the testator, and that the sureties on his bond were ignorant thereof, as well as of his insolvency, does not relieve them from liability under a decree of distribution treating the amount so embezzled as money of the estate in the executor's hands, since Code Civ. Proc. § 1447, expressly renders an executor liable for a debt due to the testator as for so much money in his hands belonging to the estate.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. Hoge, Judge.

Action by George Treweek against William H. Howard, H. J. Brittan, and Arthur W. Bowman on the bond of Howard, as executor of Nicholas Treweek, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry P. Bowle, for appellant Wm. H. Howard. James L. Crittenden, for appellant H. J. Brittan. C. Bartlett, Stanly & Hayes, and McEnerney & Bradley, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover from the defendants the sum of $10,000 upon the official bond of defendant Bowman, executed by him as principal, and by the other defendants as sureties, for the faithful discharge of the duties of said Bowman as executor of the last will of Nicholas Treweek, deceased. The cause was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and written findings filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for $10,260.60, interest and costs. The sureties, Howard and Brittan, appeal from the final judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. Defendant Bowman made default.

There were four counts in the second amended complaint. Defendants Howard and Brittan demurred to each of said several counts separately, upon various grounds, among which were, as to each and every of them, that they failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, as to the second, third, and fourth counts, that said complaint failed to allege a demand by the plaintiff or his assignor upon the defendant Bowman, and the default of said Bowman prior to a demand upon the defendants Howard and Brittan, the sureties of said Bowman. The following synopsis of the complaint will serve to an understanding of the points made on demurrer. The first count thereof alleges in apt terms the death of the testator, Nicholas Treweek; the admission of his will to probate; the grant of letters testamentary to the defendant Bowman upon his taking the oath required by law and filing a bond with sufficient sureties in the sum of $34,000; the filing of the bond (which is set out in full in the complaint, and is in the ordinary form), with the defendants Howard and Brittan as sureties thereon; the taking of the oath of office by Bowman, as required by law; issue of letters testamentary, etc., to said Bowman, which remain unrevoked, etc. That Bowman, as such executor, immediately after the issuance of such letters, received, and has in his possession as executor, more than $16,000 of money belonging to the estate. That on or about January 3, 1884, the executor presented and filed his final account, with a petition for the distribution of said estate, in which account he charged himself with $18,305.23, less expenses and commissions, leaving a balance of $15,000 subject to distribution. January 15, 1884, by an order and decree of the superior court, the final account was allowed and settled, and the executor adjudged to have in his hands and be chargeable as such for said $15,000, which, by said decree, was distributed, and the executor adjudged to pay to plaintiff $2,500. That thereafter plaintiff demand payment thereof from the executor, which he has neglected and refused to pay. That thereafter plaintiff informed the other defendants of such demand and refusal, and demanded from them, and each of them, payment, which they have neglected and refused to make, etc. The remaining three counts of the complaint are based on the demands of John Treweek, Jane Pender, and Elizabeth West, respectively, who were legatees and distributees of like amounts under the will and decree of distribution, and who had assigned their claims to plaintiff before suit brought. In said last three counts the pleader, instead of stating at length the several proceedings had up to the decree of distribution, made use of the following language, repeating the same substantially in each count, viz.: "The plaintiff here repeats and alleges all the matters and things set forth and alleged in the subdivisions of this second amended complaint, numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and prays that the same be taken and deemed a part of this cause of action, the same as though herein set out at length." The several counts then contain averments as to the decree of distribution to the legatees severally of $2,500 each, as in the first count, except as to the names of the several legatees; that defendant Bowman has not, nor have the other defendants, paid the same, or any part thereof; that demand of payment of said sum has been made from the defendants, and each of them, and that they still fail and refuse to pay. The several counts then aver an assignment of the demands by the several legatees and distributees to plaintiff.

The contention of appellants in support of the demurrer to the complaint is twofold: (1) That the complaint failed to allege a demand by plaintiff or his assigns upon Bowman, and the default of said Bowman prior to a demand upon or notice to the defendants, Howard and Brittan, who were merely sureties of said Bowman, and only liable in the event of his default. (2) That the second, third, and fourth counts of the complaint were each defective, in not stating the essential facts constituting the causes of action otherwise than by a mere reference to paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4 of the first count.

As to the first point, it may be said that much of the difficulty and confusion involved in the proposition arises from grouping together guarantors and sureties, and attempting the difficult task of a general definition applicable to both. Baylies, in his work on Sureties and Guarantors, at section 1, says: "In fact, it is impossible to frame a definition of either term which will clearly distinguish the one contract from the other, and still be in harmony with the dicta in the many cases in which courts have attempted, by the application of some general rule to bring a contract which might equally well be classed with either," etc. The words "surety" and "guarantor" are often used as synonymous terms, but they are not so in fact. Both are bound for another person. A surety is, however, usually bound with his principal by the same instrument, executed at the same time and on the same consideration. Our Civil Code (section 2831) defines a surety as follows: "A surety is one who, at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor." The same Code also provides (section 2844) that "a surety has all the rights of a guarantor, whether he becomes personally responsible or not." This cannot include the right to demand or notice, for the reason that under section 2807 "a guarantor of payment or performance is liable to the guarantee immediately upon the default of the principal, and without demand or notice." Cases often occur in which it is difficult to determine whether a given contract is one of surety or of guaranty, and it is believed the object of the Code was to place the contract of guaranty on the same plane with that of surety by dispensing with the necessity of demand and notice in the former, as the courts, in a majority of instances, have in the latter. Coburn v. Brooks, 78 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 2, and Chafoin v. Rich, 77 Cal. 476, 19 Pac. 882, have settled the doctrine in this state that no demand or notice is necessary to fix the liability of a surety, except in cases where such demand and notice are expressly required by the language of the contract. It follows that, conceding that the complaint failed to properly aver demand and notice, it was immaterial, and hence that the first contention of appellants cannot be maintained.

2. It was unnecessary to repeat at length in each of the succeeding counts of the complaint the facts stated in the first count and leading up to the decree of distribution. By the language used in each count, and the prayer that they be deemed and taken a part of the cause of action, they were made a part thereof (as is often done in the case of exhibits) as effectually as though restated in full. The practice has become quite prevalent, and where the reference to a preceding count is definite and certain, as in this case, there seems no serious objection to it. In the cases cited by appellant there was, with one exception, no reference to or adoption of the previous allegations, and hence the counts were held defective. In one of them (Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262) it was said, after referring to the fact that marriage, residence, etc., were not alleged in the second count of the complaint: "Nor is there any reference in it to the allegations in the first count as to such marriage or residence;" and again: "Treating the allegations in the first count as to marriage and residence as mere matters of inducement, they should have been repeated or referred to in the subsequent count, and the omission to either repeat or refer to them is fatal." In Pennie v. Hildreth, 81 Cal. 127, 22 Pac. 398, which is the exception referred to, there is language deprecating this method of pleading, but it was not necessary to the determination of the case, and may be regarded as obiter dicta. We think the rule enunciated by McFarland, J., in his dissenting opinion in the same case, and in the later case of Green v. Clifford, 94 Cal. 49, 29 Pac. 331, to be the correct one.

The other objections to the complaint are unimportant, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

It is further contended by appellants that the court erred in sustaining plaintiff's demurrer to the defendants' cross complaint, and in refusing to allow and in excluding any and all evidence to sustain defendants' fifth defense. These errors are assigned separately, but, as they involve the same question, and as the fifth defense set out in the answer and the cross complaint are substantially the same, we shall consider them together, as appellants have argued them. Briefly stated, the allegations of the fifth answer and cross complaint are: (1) Bowman, as executor, never received any moneys belonging to the estate of Nicholas Treweek. (2) That Bowman, as agent of Treweek during the lifetime of the latter, received, appropriated, and embezzled the moneys which he fraudulently returned in his inventory. (3) Said Bowman was insolvent from the time of such embezzlement up to suit brought. (4) The money pretended to be accounted for by Bowman and included in decree of distribution was embezzled by him in 1878, while agent of testator, and he was insolvent, and by reason thereof never able to repay it. (5) Treweek died more than four years after the embezzlement. (6) Bowman induced the sureties to go upon his bond by false and fraudulent statements, whereby they were induced so to do; and to cover up his embezzlement, and to promote the interest of plaintiff and his assignors at the expense of defendants, and to deceive the court, and to have made and entered a fraudulent decree of distribution, filed a false account, stating he had $15,010 in his hands as executor, which he knew was false, whereby the court was imposed upon, and induced thereby to approve the same, and decree a distribution. (7) Defendants here knew nothing of these facts, or of any fraud of Bowman, or of his objects or purposes. (8) The plaintiff and his assignors knew all of the foregoing facts and of all the fraudulent acts of Bowman in 1885. (9) Plaintiff and his assignors, with intent to defraud the defendants, pretend and claim that said defendants are sureties on the bond, and liable to pay said $15,000, by virtue of the decree of distribution; and that the assignments to plaintiff were with a view to defraud defendants. (10) The time for modifying or setting aside the decree of distribution or to appeal therefrom has expired, and defendants were not parties thereto. (11) Defendants received no money or consideration for becoming sureties, and believed Bowman to be honest, and acting in good faith, and that no money ever came into Bowman's hands as executor. The testator had no money at the time of his death, and the executor imposed upon them, the court, and the community; pretended to have funds of the estate, when in fact there were no funds in such estate, and he had none, either of his own or belonging to such estate. (12) Plaintiff is seeking by this action at law to fraudulently avail himself of Bowman's wrongful acts, and recover from them. (13) Defendants had no knowledge or means of knowledge of Bowman's wrongful acts until 1885, when they communicated all the facts to plaintiff and his assignors. (14) That by reason of the matters stated plaintiff is guilty of fraud in seeking to recover. (15) Bowman was not, as executor, accountable to the estate or to plaintiff for the $15,000 so embezzled by him, and it was not collectible by him, by reason of his insolvency before, at the time of, and after the death of said Nicholas Treweek, by reason whereof, without any fault in him as executor, he could not collect it from himself as an individual. Sureties are entitled to stand upon the precise terms of their contract, and in the present case the bond is limited to the duties cast upon the principal, and the liabilities of the sureties cannot be extended. Lacoste v. Splivalo, 64 Cal. 35, 30 Pac. 571; City of San Jose v. Welch, 65 Cal. 358, 4 Pac. 207; Brown v. Lattimore, 17 Cal. 93; U. S. v. Cheeseman, 3 Sawy. 425, Fed. Cas. No. 14,790. The condition of the bond in this case is as follows: "Now, therefore, if the said Arthur W. Bowman, as such executor, shall faithfully execute the duties of the trust according to law, then this obligation shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect." The decree of distribution entered in the superior court, and the order of such court in passing upon and approving the account of the executor, were, in the absence of fraud, binding upon the executor and his sureties, although the latter were not parties to the proceeding. Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214; McClellan v. Downey, 63 Cal. 520; Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 595; Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 112; Murdock v. Brooks, 38 Cal. 596; Brodrib v. Brodrib, 56 Cal. 563.

The question remains, is there any such fraud charged in the fifth defense and cross complaint as entitled the defendants here to attack the decree of distribution? The gravamen of the charge of fraud is: That Bowman, the executor, had the money in his hands; had embezzled it in the lifetime of the testator; concealed this fact from the sureties; led them to believe, and they did believe until May, 1885, that he was solvent. That they knew nothing of the facts as to such indebtedness or embezzlement until the last-named date, and that plaintiff and his assignors have been cognizant of all the facts since said date. This was subsequent to the decree of distribution, which was entered January 15, 1884. The facts charged do not constitute such fraud as entitles the sureties to attack the decree of distribution. Much controversy had existed as to the extent of the liability of an executor and his sureties for debts and demands due or to become due from him to the testator of the estate which he represented. Our Code of Civil Procedure, with a view, as may be supposed, of settling all such questions at rest, has provided (section 1447) as follows: "The naming of a person as executor does not thereby discharge him from any just claim which the testator has against him, but the claim must be included in the inventory, and the executor is liable for the same, as for so much money in his hands, when the debt or demand becomes due." Thus it will be seen the law treats a debt or demand due from the executor, from the time it becomes due, as so much money in his hands. This debt was due, as is shown by the pleading, long before the death of the testator, and hence was properly included in the inventory as money in the hands of the executor. The law required him to so report it, and, had he failed to do so, and taken the oath required of him by section 1449, he would have been guilty of perjury. The sureties are presumed to have signed the bond in view of the law as it existed, and are as liable as they would have been had section 1447 been incorporated in the bond. This debt was as money in the hands of the executor, and as such was a part of the estate for the due administration of which the sureties became liable, just as they did for the residue thereof. The poverty or riches of their principal—the condition of the estate, where and how invested—were proper subjects of inquiry for the sureties in determining whether or not to become responsible, but cannot be urged as reasons to excuse them from the liability which they assumed. Nor can the representations of their principal as to his financial position, or his failure so to do, avail the sureties. Should such circumstances prevail to release sureties, it is apprehended few would be bound. The executor was liable, under the law, as for money in his hands, and the sureties must be presumed to have known it. Beyond this, and stripped of verbiage and accessories which cannot control in the decision, and the simple fact remains that Bowman was insolvent, and the sureties were not aware of that fact nor of his indebtedness to the estate. The case serves to illustrate the wisdom of Solomon, where he says (Prov. xi. 15): "He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it, and he that hateth suretyship is sure."

The other errors assigned are not important, and do not call for a reversal. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LEARY. (No. 21,123.)¹

CRIMINAL LAW—MISCONDUCT OF JURY—ORAL INSTRUCTIONS—PARTIAL INSANITY.

1. The reading by a jury, during a murder trial, of newspaper accounts correctly reporting the proceedings, and containing nothing of an unfair or prejudicial character, is not such misconduct as will require the granting of a new trial.

2. The fact that several half-pint flasks filled with intoxicating liquor were introduced into the jury room by jurors during the early stages of the trial, and that some of them drank therefrom, is not such misconduct as necessitates a new trial, where none of the jurors were affected by the liquor, and none was drunk during the deliberations of the jury.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 190, which provides that one found guilty of murder in the first degree shall suffer death or imprisonment for life, "at the discretion of the jury," the court has no power to review the action of the jury in fixing the penalty.

4. On a murder trial, the jury returned into court for further instructions, in the absence of the official reporter, but all the other officers of the court and defendant and his counsel were present. Questions were asked of the court, some of which were answered orally without being reduced to writing, and some by reading instructions previously given. The language of the court was, however, preserved in the bill of exceptions, and it appeared that nothing whatever was said to the jury except what in substance and more in detail had been told them before in the charge of the court. Held, that there was no violation of Pen. Code, § 1093, which requires the charge of the court to be in writing or taken down by the official reporter.

5. On a murder trial it appeared that the killing was done under the influence of anger not caused by any adequate provocation, and after the lapse of a sufficient cooling time. There was evidence that defendant was to some extent mentally unsound as a result of long-continued abuse of intoxicating liquors, though not insane to the extent of not knowing what he was doing, or that his act was a crime. Held, that it was not error to instruct that any partial defect of understanding, which might cause defendant more readily to give away to passion than a man ordinarily reasonable, cannot be considered for any purpose. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; N. A. Dorn, Judge.

William Leary was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Kearney and C. F. Lacey, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VAN FLEET, J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hanged. He appeals from the judgment and an order overruling his motion for a new trial. Several grounds are urged for a reversal, which we shall notice in the order in which they are presented and discussed by appellant, though not in the logical sequence in which they arise on the record.

1. It is claimed that the jury were guilty of such misconduct as to entitle defendant to a new trial. The first assignment under this head is that the jury read published accounts of the trial in a newspaper, to the prejudice of defendant's rights. It appeared on behalf of defendant on the motion that the Salinas Daily Journal, published at Salinas City, where the trial was had, printed, from day to day, a synopsis or résumé of the evidence in the case, and that on various occasions during the progress of the trial, but prior to their retiring for deliberation, copies of the paper fell into the hands of the jury, and were read by some of them, including the matter therein relating to the trial; and that on one occasion one of the jurors made a suggestion that "they got that mighty straight," or some such remark,—referring to an account of the trial in the paper. In rebuttal of this showing, the prosecution were permitted to put in the testimony of the members of the jury to the effect that they were not influenced in any manner whatever in considering the case or rendering their verdict by anything they read in the paper in question. This evidence was inadmissible for such purpose (People v. Stokes [Cal.] 37 Pac. 208); but, in the view we take of the question, this was immaterial. It is not claimed by defendant that the matter published contained anything of an essentially prejudicial character, or that the evidence or proceedings were in any manner garbled, unfair, or even incorrectly reported, or in any instance intended or necessarily calculated to improperly influence or prejudice the minds of the jury. To the contrary, counsel for defendant in his brief refers to the statements in the paper as "prepared by a person apparently fair and impartial," and frankly admits that he does not base his claim for a reversal upon the ground that the jury had imperfect or inaccurate reports of the trial; but his contention would seem to be, substantially, that the mere fact that the jury has been permitted to read matter in a newspaper referring to the trial, which might possibly in some manner injuriously affect their minds, immediately raises a presumption of improper influence which affords ground for a new trial. This, we think, is carrying the doctrine beyond a point where it can be sustained on reason or authority. Certainly counsel has referred us to no case going to such length. The rule upon the subject is correctly stated, we think, in People v. McCoy, 71 Cal. 397, 12 Pac. 272, one of the cases cited by defendant, where it is said: "The reading of newspapers by jurors while engaged in the trial of a cause is an act of inattention to duty which ought to be promptly corrected, and, if the newspaper contains any matter in connection with the subject-matter of the trial which would be at all likely to influence jurors in the performance of duty, the act would constitute ground for a motion for a new trial." If the matter, in other words, be such as would from its character, or the manner or connection in which it is stated, be calculated to prejudice or injuriously affect the minds of the jury, a presumption of improper influence arises, and a new trial will be granted, without requiring defendant to show that harm has in fact been done his cause. But the application of this rule does not help defendant. The several articles complained of are found in the transcript, and we have taken pains, not only to examine them at length, but to carefully compare the statements of the evidence therein with the evidence in the case as presented in the record, and find nothing therein calculated to mislead or improperly affect the minds of the jury. The matter is exceptionally free from objectionable features, such as expressions of opinion or misleading statements. In fact, we may add that, if all newspaper reports of criminal proceedings were as fair, impartial, and circumspect as would seem to have been the desire here, there would be few instances in which verdicts would have to be set aside by reason of improper influence through the press.

A second ground urged under this head is that the jury were guilty of misconduct in the use of intoxicating drink. The jury were kept in charge of the sheriff during the trial, and not permitted to separate, and, when not engaged in the trial or going to and from their meals, they were kept in a room by themselves, under the care of an officer, and not permitted to go about town. It appears that during the trial, which lasted some five or six days, and more particularly, as the evidence shows, in the early stages of the trial, including the time before the jury was entirely completed, several pocket flasks of whisky were introduced into their room by members of the jury, without the knowledge of the court or parties, and some of the jurors would now and then take a drink "on the sly," as expressed by one juror, and "surreptitiously," as put by another; although it does not appear from the showing that there was any studied effort upon the part of those who had the liquor to conceal the fact. There is some disparity in the statements as to the number of flasks that were had in the jury room in all; the majority of the jurors putting the number they saw at different times at not more than two or three, while one put it as high as five or six. All who mentioned the character of the bottles, however, described them as half-pint pocket flasks or bottles; and the strong preponderance of the showing, in fact the general consensus, was that there was little, if any, liquor drank in the room after the first day or two of the trial, and none after the jury retired for deliberation. One juror said he saw one bottle of "something red" in the room while the jury were deliberating, but this was shown by another juror to have been medicine prescribed for him by a doctor, and procured by permission of the court. The evidence is not such as to make the impression that there was any frequent or considerable drinking by any of the jurors at any time, and a number of them drank none at all. As one or two of the jurors expressed it, "the liquor was drank in little swallows just before going to meals." There is no pretense on the part of any one that any member of the jury became in the least intoxicated or affected by the liquor so as to impair his faculties, or in the least interfere with the proper discharge of his duties; in fact, the evidence shows clearly to the contrary. Under these facts, it is contended that there is disclosed such misconduct upon the part of the jury as to render a new trial necessary. But we cannot agree with this contention. The cases of People v. Gray, 61 Cal. 164, and People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 20 Pac. 719, relied upon by defendant, involved an essentially different state of facts from those presented here. In both of those cases the evidence tended to establish that the jurors had drank liquor or were under its influence after the jury had retired for deliberation upon their verdict. In the Gray Case, while the evidence disclosed that the jury had drank large quantities of malt and spirituous liquors during the antecedent stages of the trial, the reversal is rested upon the ground that the evidence afforded "strong reason to suspect that one of the jurors drank so much while deliberating on the verdict as to unfit him for the proper discharge of his duty." In People v. Lee Chuck, Mr. Justice Works, who wrote the opinion, went further, and held, in effect, that, where it appeared that the jurors drank liquor while deliberating on their verdict, the question as to whether it had any effect on their minds was immaterial, as injury would be presumed, and a new trial granted. This view of the law, however, was concurred in by but two other justices, the chief justice expressly dissenting from it, while concurring in the judgment. As the case was in bank, it is doubtful if the opinion can be regarded as authority on this point. This is merely by the way, however, as neither of those cases supports the defendant's position, the essential element upon which they rest being lacking in the facts of this case. Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is now well settled in this state that the mere fact that a member or members of the jury have been guilty of using strong drink during the trial is not of itself sufficient ground for a new trial, where the evidence is such as to rebut the presumption of injury flowing therefrom to the defendant. In the case of People v. Deegan, 88 Cal. 602, 26 Pac. 500, it is held that the fact that a juror drank intoxicating liquors out of court, and that at the noon recess on the day the verdict was rendered he was for a time under its influence, does not vitiate the verdict, if it appears that the juror, while sitting or deliberating as a juror, was sober, intelligent, and in a fit condition to understand and deliberate upon the evidence, and render a proper verdict. In the case of People v. Sansome, 98 Cal. 239, 33 Pac. 202, where it appeared that after the submission of the case, when the jury were taken to dinner, two of their number drank whisky, but not to an extent to intoxicate them, it is said: "It is argued that the admitted indulgence in intoxicating liquor by two of the jurors constituted misconduct on the part of the jury sufficient to reverse the judgment. We do not think this position can be maintained. If the two jurors who drank a little liquor were not affected by it,—and, in view of the conflicting affidavits and the action of the court below, it must be assumed they were not,—then it would seem that neither law nor sound reason would require the judgment to be reversed on this ground." See, also, People v. Williams, 24 Cal. 31; People v. Brannigan, 21 Cal. 339; People v. Dennis, 39 Cal. 625; People v. Symonds, 22 Cal. 349; People v. Bemmerly, 98 Cal. 299, 33 Pac. 263.

But it is contended by defendant that "smuggling" the liquor into the jury room without the knowledge of the court or parties evinces such a total misconception by the jurors of the importance of their duties and obligations as of itself to cast grave suspicion on the verdict, and warrant a new trial. The act of carrying liquor to the jury room clandestinely is undoubtedly a very reprehensible dereliction of duty on the part of a juror, if done willfully or wantonly, and, upon coming to the knowledge of the trial court, should be severely punished, and cause the verdict to be jealously scrutinized. But that it should necessarily vitiate the verdict we cannot concede. It might well happen that investigation in a given instance would disclose that the liquor had been procured innocently or under a supposed or actual necessity, with no intent to drink it for the mere love of it. It is a matter of common knowledge that many men require daily a certain quantity of artificial stimulant to maintain their physical, if not mental, equilibrium,—some by reason of physical ailment, others because of long years of habit,—and to be deprived of it is to be unfitted for their usual functions to perhaps as great a degree as another might through over-indulgence. Such a man upon a jury might, if locked up for days, feel, without thought of impropriety, that it was necessary and justifiable for him to take a small quantity of liquor to his jury room. Such an instance, in no way affecting the juror's capacity, should not necessarily set aside a verdict free from all other legal exception. After all, the act, if wrongfully done, is but an act of misconduct, differing only in degree from any other, and the pertinent question is whether it has resulted in injury to the defendant. In this instance that question was involved in the ruling of the lower court denying the motion for new trial, and we cannot upon the facts say that it was wrong. If every relaxation from the strict line of duty on the part of jurors, irrespective of its effect upon their verdict, were to furnish ground for retrial, very few verdicts could be sustained, and the administration of criminal justice would be rendered difficult indeed.

2. It is next objected that "the verdict is against law and evidence." We do not understand counsel as attacking, under this head, the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the jury in finding the defendant guilty of murder, but the contention seems to be that the facts of the case were not such as to warrant the infliction of the death penalty. We confess to some cloudiness of apprehension of this point, and are at a loss to understand exactly upon what ground counsel expects us to review the action of the jury in this respect. The law submits to the jury, under the instruction of the court, the question as to the degree of murder, if any, of which the defendant is guilty in any instance; and section 190 of the Penal Code further provides that one found guilty of murder in the first degree "shall suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life, at the discretion of the jury." Whatever may have been the actuating consideration in the minds of the legislature in enacting section 190,—whether because they believed there are instances of murder falling within the definition of murder of the first degree, which, because characterized by a less degree of atrocity or other mitigating circumstances, call for a milder punishment than that of death, or whether their reason was something else,—the fact remains that they have confided the power to affix the punishment within these two alternatives to the absolute discretion of the jury, with no power reserved to the court to review their action in that respect.

3. It is contended that the court committed error in giving the jury certain instructions orally, which were neither reduced to writing nor taken down by the shorthand reporter. The facts with reference to this point are recited in the bill of exceptions, from which it appears that after the jury had retired for deliberation they returned into court for further instruction. The defendant and his counsel, and all the officers of the court, except the official reporter, were present when the following proceedings took place: "The court said to the jury: 'Have you agreed on a verdict?' The foreman answered: 'We have not.' The foreman then handed to the court the form of verdict theretofore given to the jury to use if they found him guilty of murder in the first degree, and fixed his punishment for life, and said to the court: 'Can we bring in that verdict?' The court orally answered, without reducing the same to writing: 'Yes; if it is your verdict. If you agree to that, it can be returned.' Some jurymen then asked: 'Can we bring in that verdict on the same evidence as the other one?' The court made no answer to that question, except by reading from the written instructions as follows: 'Should the verdict of the jury convict the defendant of murder in the first degree, the law permits the jury to award the penalty. This may be death or imprisonment for life in the state's prison.' Some other questions were asked by the jury relating to the grades of the offense, and the court said, orally, without reducing it to writing: 'I will read the instructions as to grades of the offense;' and thereupon read to the jury the written instructions theretofore read to them, defining the grade of the offense, but gave no oral instructions. One of the jurymen then asked this question: 'Can we bring any one of the six verdicts given us we agree on?' The court answered, 'Yes'; which answer was not reduced to writing. The court then asked the defendant if he had any suggestions to make or desired anything further, and his counsel answered: 'No; nothing.' None of the questions asked by the jurors were reduced to writing. The jury then retired for further deliberation." Conceding that this amounted to an oral instruction, we cannot perceive wherein the defendant could be in any wise injured by what took place. The language of the court has been preserved, and it appears that nothing whatever was said to the jury except what in substance, and more in detail, had been told them before in the charge of the court. They were instructed upon no new point, and what was said in no way qualified what had been theretofore given them. It was held in People v. Cox, 76 Cal. 281, 18 Pac. 332, that, although it is error to charge a jury in a criminal case orally, yet, where the record shows that the language used, which was not taken by the reporter, merely led up to an instruction which was properly taken down, and did not affect nor in any way qualify the charge which was taken down, it is not ground for reversal. There is no distinction in principle between the effect of what was done in that case and what occurred here. If any more absolute rule was intended to be announced in People v. Hersey, 53 Cal. 574, it is to be taken as modified by what is held in the Cox Case. In this connection we have carefully examined the complaint made as to several instructions of the court, and are unable to discover error in any of them. The criticism in appellant's closing brief as to the effect of certain instructions is not justified. The charge is to be considered as a whole, and, so regarded, we do not think it open to the construction put upon it. The charge seems to cover the whole case very fairly and correctly, and in a manner to leave no misapprehension in the minds of the jury arising from any particular or isolated part.

4. A considerable number of other points are urged in the able and ingenious brief of appellant, based upon objections to the mode of securing the jury, alleged improper conduct of the prosecuting attorney, and rulings of the court on questions of evidence, and some others. To discuss each one of these in detail would unnecessarily extend this opinion and serve no useful purpose. Having in view the gravity of the case, we have examined each point made with the most earnest and zealous scrutiny, and we are unable after such examination to discover any error affecting the substantial rights of the defendant or warranting a reversal of the case. The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. As to the irregularities and misconduct of the jury, they were probably not sufficient to justify the superior court in granting a new trial. What drinking of intoxicating liquors was done occurred during the various recesses and adjournments of the court prior to the submission of the cause. It was slight in amount, and seems to have produced no perceptible effect. The worst feature of it was the secrecy with which it was done, the efforts at concealment manifesting a consciousness on the part of the offending jurors that they were violating their duty. But since it does not appear that any juror was intoxicated or sensibly affected by what he had taken during the trial, or that there was any drinking after the cause had been submitted to the jury, the court was justified in holding that the defendant had not been prejudiced. The reading of the newspaper reports of the trial was a violation of the admonition which the judge is required to give to the jury at each recess or adjournment of the court, not only by the offending jurors but by the officer in charge. As to this irregularity, however, as well as the other, it may be safely concluded that the defendant was not prejudiced because the reports so read consisted merely of a fair and truthful statement of the evidence given in court and of the line of defense. It was, nevertheless, serious misconduct on the part of the jurors to disregard the admonition of the court, and it is no merit in them that what they read happened to be of a character which the court can hold to have been harmless. If, as well might have happened, it had been of a different character, their misconduct would have necessitated a new trial.

Neither do I think that the judgment or order appealed from should be reversed because of the oral instructions to the jury given by the court in the absence of the official reporter. But my views upon that point differ radically from those stated in the opinion of the court, and because I think the decision, as it stands, will lead to mischievous consequences, I feel bound to state the reasons for my dissent. It is, to my mind, clear from the record in this case, and that part of it copied into the opinion of the court, that the trial judge did orally instruct the jury in the absence of the official reporter. The jury came into court, and by several questions sought information for their guidance in finding a verdict. These questions were answered, and the answers so given, taken in connection with the questions, were instructions. It is true these instructions as set forth in the bill of exceptions were correct and proper. But this does not cure the error. The error consists, and is complete, in giving the oral instructions in the absence of the official reporter. People v. Hersey, 53 Cal. 575. The object of the statute in requiring the instructions of the court, if not in writing, to be taken down by the reporter, is to insure defendant the means of getting a correct statement of the charge really given; and this object would be completely frustrated if the judge, who has orally charged the jury in the absence of the reporter, could cure the error by putting into the bill of exceptions a correct charge. The case of People v. Cox, 76 Cal. 281, does not overrule People v. Hersey. There the reporter was present and engaged in taking down the charge while it was being delivered. And the bill of exceptions showed that he had taken down the whole charge, omitting only a few words "leading up to and in no way touching upon" the charge which was given. The substance of the decision is that the court does not err in giving an oral charge when the reporter is present, and that if the reporter fails to perform his duty to take it down fully and correctly the judge may, nevertheless, put into the bill of exceptions what was actually said, and that the fault of the reporter will not be imputed as an error to the court. But there is a vast difference between the case in which the reporter is present, with the opportunity of performing his duty and apparently engaged in its performance, and the case where he is absent, and necessarily unable to take down the charge. In delivering an oral charge in the absence of the reporter, the court, by its own act, makes it impossible that the defendant shall be secured in his rights; and this is necessarily an error of the court. In the other case the reporter alone is at fault. In the Cox Case it was merely held that such a fault on the part of the reporter is not necessarily fatal, but it is not questioned that it would have been fatal if the court had committed the error disclosed in People v. Hersey. If it be said that this is a distinction without a difference, that a defendant may be as greatly prejudiced by the incompetence or inattention of a reporter who is present as by the fallible recollection of a judge, I answer that, while such a thing is possible, it is not probable. In the vast majority of cases the court, with the aid of the reporter's notes, however imperfect, will be able to restate his oral charge correctly. Without any such notes, it would rarely happen that it could be restated at the time of settling the bill of exceptions with substantial accuracy. The chance that a defendant may be prejudiced when the law is complied with is no reason for depriving him altogether of its protection. I cannot, therefore, concur in the views of the court upon this point. But, for a different reason, I do not think the defendant should be allowed to avail himself of this objection here. He was present with his counsel when the jury came into court for further instructions. He knew as well as the judge, and possibly better, that the reporter was not present, but he failed to call the fact to the attention of the court, or to make any objection, or take any exception at the time to what was said. If he had done so, the court could have reduced its charge to writing, or could have sent for the reporter, and had the questions and answers reported, and by him taken down, together with an instruction to the jury to regard only what was said in presence of the reporter. This course would have secured to the defendant all the rights which the statute was designed to secure him. Having failed to object then, I think he should not be heard to object now. I am not unaware that many of the former decisions of this court, made under the old statute before the adoption of the Code, held that the giving of oral instructions, although unobjected to at the time, was fatal error on appeal; but I conceive that these rulings were based upon the mandatory terms of the statute as quoted in People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 35. Since the adoption of the Codes, I think the law as thereby amended (Pen. Code, § 1093) does not require so strict a construction, if it ever did. At all events, while I am willing to go to the extent of holding that a defendant cannot assign error upon the giving of an oral instruction in the absence of the reporter, unless it appears that he objected at the time and reserved his exception, I am not willing to say that such disregard of the statute by the court, when objected to, can be remedied by making it appear in the bill of exceptions that the charge so given was a very small matter and in fact correct; for this defeats the whole object of the statute.

There is a point, however, upon which I not only dissent from the reasoning of the court, but also from the conclusions and the judgment. The defendant was tried upon a charge of murder, convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. In every charge of murder the distinction which the law makes between murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree is in the highest degree material, and an instruction to the jury to disregard evidence which ought to be considered in determining the degree of the crime is necessarily erroneous; and, if the instruction is to disregard evidence tending to prove the lesser degree, such an instruction is not only erroneous, but is also prejudicial to a defendant who has been found guilty of the higher degree. In this case all the evidence went to show that the killing was done under the influence of anger caused by insulting language addressed by the deceased to the defendant in the presence and hearing of female members of his family. The provocation was not in law sufficient to mitigate the offense to manslaughter, and the time elapsing between the provocation given and the fatal blow was probably sufficient to have cooled the passion of a reasonable man, for which reason also the crime was not mitigated to manslaughter. But when an unlawful killing is actually the result of that sudden and violent impulse of passion which is supposed to exclude deliberation, it cannot be murder of the first degree, notwithstanding the inadequacy of the provocation or the lapse of cooling time. These are merely grounds for implying the malice essential to the second degree of murder, while in murder of the first degree (except when perpetrated in the commission or attempt to commit arson, robbery, etc.) there must be that express malice which consists only in the deliberate purpose unlawfully to take away the life of a human being. For this reason it is everywhere held that the voluntary intoxication of the slayer may be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining whether, under the circumstances, the killing was deliberate and premeditated, and this notwithstanding such intoxication is not an excuse for any crime. Although not an excuse for the commission of a criminal act, the character of which is not dependent upon the state of mind of the perpetrator, it is admissible where such state of mind is an element of the offense, for the reason that it has a tendency to disprove the necessary state of mind. If this is true as to voluntary intoxication, it must be true a fortiori as to partial insanity. A person may fall far short of that degree of insanity which exempts him from criminal responsibility, and may yet be in a condition mentally which a jury ought to consider in determining whether he has committed a homicide with express and deliberate malice. This, in my opinion, is precisely such a case. There was much evidence as to the defendant's sanity, the result of which was to show that, while he was not insane to the extent of not knowing what he was doing or that his act was a crime, he was nevertheless to some extent mentally unsound as the result of long continued abuse of intoxicating drinks, that he was easily excited to violent anger, and in short that he was not in that respect a reasonable man. In view of this evidence, I think the giving of the following instruction was manifest error: "If the defendant was so far in the possession of his mental faculties as to be capable of knowing that the act of killing was wrong, any partial defect of understanding, which might cause him more readily to give away to passion than a man ordinarily reasonable, cannot be considered for any purpose." And, the defendant having been convicted of murder in the first degree, the error is as manifestly injurious. For this reason I think the judgment and order should be reversed.

PEOPLE v. NAPTHALY. (No. 21,132.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — RIGHT TO EMPLOY COUNSEL.

The fact that one accused of crime is a lawyer does not deprive him of the right to be represented by counsel, as guaranteed by Const. art. 1, §§ 8, 13, and the statutes enacted in pursuance thereof; and the refusal of the committing magistrate to continue the hearing to enable the accused to employ counsel is ground for setting aside the information.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

B. F. Napthaly was convicted of the crime of assisting a prisoner to escape, and appeals. Reversed.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant was accused by information of the crime of assisting a prisoner to escape. It is averred in the information that on the 23d day of February, 1892, at the city and county of San Francisco, one Adam Stroh, alias Johnson, had been arrested for vagrancy, and was then and there confined in the city prison of the city and county of San Francisco, and was then and there in the legal and lawful custody of the chief of police of said city and county, pending an examination upon said charge; that on said 23d day of February, 1892, in said city and county, defendant knowingly, willfully, and feloniously presented to one John Parrot, the acting keeper of said prison, an order of discharge, purporting to be a legal and lawful discharge, from custody of said Adam Stroh, alias Johnson, on said charge of vagrancy. The order of discharge is set out in full, and purports to show that said Stroh, alias Johnson, on charge of vagrancy, has deposited a bail bond "with me [the clerk] in the sum of $300, for his appearance to answer said charge," and is dated February 23, 1892, and signed as follows: "A. A. Watson, Clerk Police Court, per N." It is then charged that said Stroh, alias Johnson, was thereupon discharged by the jailer, who believed the order was genuine, but that in fact it was not a legal and lawful order of discharge, as the defendant well knew, whereby said prisoner, through the unlawful acts and contrivance of defendant, did escape from prison, and go at large, etc. Before pleading to the information, defendant moved to set aside the information upon the ground that he had not been legally committed by any magistrate before the filing of the information, and upon the ground that he had been committed without reasonable or probable cause. The motion was heard upon the evidence taken before the magistrate, which the bill of exceptions certifies was the same as that taken at the trial on behalf of the prosecution, and which is included in the bill of exceptions; and (2) also upon the record of the magistrate, which "showed that, at his preliminary examination before said magistrate, he was not represented by any counsel; that the magistrate refused to continue the examination for the purpose of enabling him to employ counsel; and that said magistrate entirely failed to inform said defendant of his rights, as required by sections 858-860 of the Penal Code of the State of California. The motion was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error.

Our constitution (article 1, § 13) guarantees the right of every person charged with crime, in any court whatever, "to appear and defend in person and with counsel." In obedience to this constitutional guaranty, section 858 of the Penal Code provides that when a defendant is brought before a magistrate, under arrest on a charge of having committed a public offense, the magistrate must at once inform him of the charge against him, and his right to the aid of counsel. Section 659 is as follows: "He must also allow the defendant a reasonable time to send for counsel, and postpone the examination for that purpose; and must, upon the request of the defendant, require a peace officer to take a message to any counsel in the township or city the defendant may name. The officer must without delay and without fee perform that duty." Under section 8 of article 1 of the constitution, "offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment with or without such examination and commitment as may be prescribed by law." It will be observed that, under this provision of our constitution, an offense can be prosecuted by information only after an examination and commitment by a magistrate. Among the causes for setting aside an information is "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." The necessity of such examination and commitment was recognized and upheld in People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 Pac. 1061, and in Ex parte Baker, 88 Cal. 84, 25 Pac. 966. An examination which denied to defendant the right guaranteed him alike by the constitution and statute, of being defended by counsel, was in no sense a legal examination. It was a plain and palpable violation of a fundamental right of the defendant, which rendered the commitment illegal.

It is said defendant is a lawyer, and there was no need of informing him of his right to have counsel, or of continuing the case to permit him to procure such counsel. There is some evidence in the record tending to show that defendant was a lawyer. The very fact that the defendant asked for a continuance to procure counsel is evidence of his knowledge of his right thereto, and obviated the necessity of his being informed thereof. Thus far, and no more. Under the constitution and law, a lawyer who is accused of crime is equally entitled, in every stage of his trial, to the presence and aid of counsel ("to appear and defend, in person and with counsel"), with other persons. The rights of individuals in this respect are not to be gauged by their profession or occupation. The evidence shows that defendant was in custody and imprisoned on a charge of felony. Suppose, however, it did not. Whatever the rule may have been at common law, under our law every person accused of a felony is entitled to the aid of counsel, whether imprisoned or admitted to bail; and a refusal of an opportunity to procure such counsel amounts to the deprivation of an important right, essential to his safety. The court below erred in refusing to set aside the information, for which error the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the court below directed to set aside the information against the defendant.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the court below directed to set aside the information against the defendant.

In re LI PO TAI'S ESTATE. (No. 15,746.) ¹

LI TAI WING v. FREESE, Public Administrator.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1895.)
ADMINISTRATOR WITH WILL ANNEXED—RIGHT TO REMOVE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1383, providing that when letters of administration have been granted to any other than the surviving wife, child, etc., of the intestate, any one of them may obtain the revocation of the letters, and become entitled to the administration, does not apply to letters of administration with the will annexed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Petition by Li Tai Wing for the removal of A. C. Freese, public administrator, as administrator with the will annexed of Li Po Tai, and that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to petitioner. From an order denying the application, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander D. Keyes and Philip Teare, for appellant. J. D. Sullivan, R. H. Countryman, and Wm. Willett, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. On the 28th of February, A. D. 1894, appellant, Li Tai Wing, filed a petition in the probate court of the city and county of San Francisco, in which, with other allegations, he stated that Li Po Tai died in said city and county March 20, 1893, testate; that by his will he nominated petitioner and his mother executor and executrix of the will; that at the time of the death of Li Po Tai, and when the will was probated and letters testamentary were issued to his mother, petitioner was a minor, and was absent from the state of California; that his mother, Lee See, was appointed executrix April 11, 1893, and duly qualified; that afterwards, on the 27th day of October, 1893, said Lee See was removed from office, and her said letters revoked, and afterwards, on the 15th day of November, 1893, A. C. Freese, public administrator, was appointed administrator with the will annexed to take charge of the estate, and said Freese duly qualified, and is still acting as such administrator; that said Freese was not the husband or wife, child, father, mother, brother, or sister of said Li Po Tai, deceased. Petitioner is the eldest son of said Li Po Tai, is over the age of 21 years, and a resident of the city and county of San Francisco; wherefore, he asked that the letters of administration issued to A. C. Freese be revoked, and letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to petitioner. Freese was duly cited to appear and answer. He filed no answer, but did appear, and was allowed to contest the right of the petitioner. Petitioner bases his claims upon the language of section 1383, Code Civ. Proc., and succeeding sections. He contends that under these provisions his right to relief asked is absolute, provided only that he be found to possess the statutory competency. Section 1383¹ is expressly limited to the estates of those who died intestate, and section 1354 is made applicable to the estates in which a will has been probated and an administrator with the will annexed has been appointed. The last section, however, does not provide that the administrator with the will annexed may be removed to permit a relative or a person entitled to administer to be appointed; but only one who has been named as executor. In section 1350 it is provided that, if it becomes necessary to appoint an administrator with the will annexed, they must be issued as designated and provided for in the grant of letters in case of intestacy. Section 1426 provides that, if the administrator with the will annexed become incapable or die, "letters of administration with the will annexed may be issued to the widow, or next of kin, or others, in the same order and manner as directed in relation to original letters of administration." Appellant contends that a fair construction of these sections indicates that the legislature intended that the rules for the issue of letters of administration with the will annexed shall be the same as the rules for the issuance of letters of administration where the decedent has died intestate. Inasmuch as the statute in regard to the requirement that an administrator may be required to give way to the claims of another expressly limits its operation to estates of those who died intestate, this would not be to construe a statute, but to add to it. Section 1354 only provides that an administrator with the will annexed shall be removed in favor of one who has been named executor, and leaves that to the discretion of the court. Under section 1383, the right of the relative possessing the statutory competency seems to be absolute. Is there any reason in the nature of the two offices for this difference? I think there is, though, without such reason, the law, being unambiguous, must prevail. In the first place, where there is a will, the next of kin may have no interest in the estate, and there may be no reason why he should be put in charge of it. But there is, I think, a better reason in the case of an administrator with the will annexed,—the matter should be left to the sound discretion of the court. Under section 1356, Code Civ. Proc., administrators with the will annexed have the same authority over estates which executors named in the will would have. Executors often have to execute trusts reposed in them by the testator very different from those which administrators assume under the statute. These trusts vary greatly. They may require time and delicate management to perform. While in the performance of such a trust it might be very unfortunate for the estate if at any time one near of kin could stop the proceeding, and have a change in the administration. But, whether the reason suffices or not, the statute seems plain. Appellant applied to have respondent removed, and to be himself appointed executor. That application the probate judge had already refused. Appellant immediately made this application to be appointed administrator with the will annexed. Is the court now compelled to give him the same office, under another name, which it had already refused, using a discretion expressly conferred upon it by statute? It is obvious that the statute has not given appellant any such privilege. Estate of Pacheco, 23 Cal. 476, is cited as an authority for appellant's proposition. When that decision was made, there was no provision such as is now found in section 1354, Code Civ. Proc., giving a discretion to the probate judge. The different policies as to the removal of administrators with the will annexed and ordinary administrators was not as marked then as now. The order appealed from is affirmed.

¹ Code Civ. Proc. § 1383, provides that when letters of administration have been granted to any other than the surviving wife, child, etc., of the intestate, any one of them may obtain the revocation of the letters, and become entitled to the administration.

PEOPLE v. HERTZ et al. (No. 21,152.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 24, 1895.)
CRIMINAL LAW—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS AS TO FACTS.

1. While it is proper to instruct that, in weighing the testimony of a defendant in a criminal case, the jury may consider his peculiar situation and relationship to the case, the rule cannot be extended beyond defendant, so as to include his relatives.

2. In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, it appeared that defendant had purchased them from the thief for $12, and the state's evidence showed them to be worth from $90 to $140, while defendant's witnesses testified that they were worth only from $18 to $21. Held, that an instruction which stated the lowest value of the goods to be $90, and that defendant consequently purchased them at less than one-seventh of their value, violated Const. art. 6, § 19, which prohibits the judge from charging the jury as to matters of fact.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; William T. Wallace, Judge.

Dora Hertz was convicted of the crime of receiving stolen goods, and appeals. Reversed.

Robert Ferral and Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. Defendants were informed against by the district attorney for the crime of receiving stolen goods. Defendant Dora Hertz demanded a separate trial, which was duly accorded her, and, being found guilty, was sentenced by the court to serve a term of four years in the state prison located at San Quentin. This appeal is taken from the final judgment, and also from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial. It is claimed by the prosecution that defendants bought and received the goods, consisting of pants, coats, and vests, of one McClellan, and that McClellan stole these articles of clothing from one Hornburg, a tailor. At the trial, McClellan himself took the stand as a witness, and stated that he was the thief, and that he sold the goods to defendants. We think the defendant has not had a fair trial, and the judgment of conviction must be reversed upon various grounds.

1. The daughters of defendant were important witnesses in her behalf, and the court gave the following instruction to the jury, bearing upon their credibility: "In judging the credibility of witnesses, I know that gentlemen of your intelligence need not be told that you are to look to the witness himself or herself; observe their method of testifying; see what their motive is, if they have any, in the case. In this connection, you have heard the testimony of parties near akin or related to the accused woman. Now, of course, as men of common sense, you must recognize the interest that they certainly feel in the outcome of this case; and you certainly would comprehend the proposition that they would not say anything unfavorable to her, that they could well avoid saying, or properly avoid, and that they certainly would not take the trouble to volunteer anything against her case." This instruction is erroneous. While this court has often sustained instructions to the effect that the jury, in weighing the testimony of a defendant, are justified in taking into consideration his peculiar situation and relationship to the case, and the grave consequences to him, depending upon the verdict of the jury, still the court has never gone to the length of holding that such an instruction would be proper, applied to the testimony of the relatives of the defendant. Neither have the people cited a single authority from any other state supporting such a doctrine. If the rule is to be extended beyond the defendant, and include the relatives of the defendant, there is no reason why it should not equally apply to the friends of the defendant. The result would be that the evidence offered in defendant's behalf, in many cases, would be so distrusted and suspicioned as to go to the jury handicapped out of all practical usefulness. An instruction to the jury, bearing upon the credibility of a defendant's testimony, is not looked upon with favor by this court. We have repeatedly frowned upon the doctrine, and said that it would be limited within the strictest lines. To now apply the principle to the relatives of a defendant would be giving it an elasticity which we cannot for a moment sanction.

2. The value of the stolen goods was a material element of fact in the case, as bearing upon the presence of a guilty knowledge in the mind of the defendant when she purchased the articles. Considerable evidence was introduced at the trial upon this question of fact, and in treating of this subject, to the jury, the court said, referring to evidence offered by the people: "There are estimates of this value which have been made before you by men of experience in the clothing business, and in the value of such clothes as these, going all the way, as I understand it, from $90 to $140; but the owner of the goods himself, who, perhaps, is a competent judge of the value of the goods, or should be, has estimated them at the sum of $90, which is the lowest estimate of those gentlemen tailors who came here, as I understand it. * * * Assuming that the value of these goods was $90, which is the lowest estimate, the offer of the seller to her was to take just exactly one-sixth of their value. He offered to throw off five-sixths of their value if she would purchase. She, having failed to obtain from him, according to her statement, any information as to where or how he got the goods, offered him a sum, $12, which still further reduced the price, and in the acceptance of which the seller actually threw off from the value of the goods, estimated at $90, over six-sevenths." In view of the fact that the defendant placed three or four witnesses upon the stand who testified that the goods were only worth from $18 to $21, the statement of the court to the jury upon a matter of fact as to the value cannot be sustained. The value of this property, as we have seen, was pre-eminently and essentially a question of fact, for the jury, and in no sense a question of law, for the court. It was for the jury alone to say whether the witnesses of the people or the witnesses of the defendant told the truth in this respect. And, while, under the constitution (article 6, § 19), the judge may state the testimony to the jury, yet the same section positively forbids the judge from charging the jury with respect to matters of fact. The portion of the charge we have quoted, as to the value of the property, embraces no element of law, but is confined solely to matters of fact, and is therefore violative of the provision of the constitution of this state.

3. The circumstances tending to show defendant's guilt were taken up by the court seriatim, and reviewed argumentatively by the court in its charge to the jury. That review of the evidence, we at least can safely say, did the prosecution's cause no harm, and the defendant's cause no good. In this regard, we quote from People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 147, approved in People v. Gordon, 83 Cal. 426, 26 Pac. 502, wherein Justice Baldwin used the following language in a criminal case: "The experience of every lawyer shows the readiness with which a jury frequently will catch at intimations of the court, and the great deference which jurors pay to the opinions and suggestions of the presiding judge, especially in a closely-balanced case, when they can thus shift the responsibility of a decision of the issue from themselves to the court. A word, a look, or a tone may sometimes, in such cases, be of great or even controlling influence. A judge cannot be too cautious, in a criminal trial, in avoiding all interference with the conclusions of the jury upon the facts." For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. WARD. (No. 21,166.)

CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—TRANSCRIPT OF TESTIMONY—SUFFICIENCY OF CERTIFICATE—LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 869, making the transcript of the testimony on preliminary examination, when certified by the reporter to be a "correct statement" of such testimony, prima facie evidence thereof, a certificate reciting that the transcript is a "true copy" is insufficient.

2. The certified transcript of the testimony at the preliminary examination, in order to be admissible at the trial, must show affirmatively that the testimony therein set out was taken at the examination of the accused, and the defect cannot be cured by oral testimony.

3. On trial for larceny of a cow, where there was no direct evidence of a taking by defendant, and he testified that he obtained the animal by a trade made on a certain day in January, with one who testified that no such trade took place, and that defendant was not at his place during that month, defendant, after stating that he was at such place during that month, should be allowed to state whether such witness was then there, since the statement would affect the credibility of such witness' testimony.

4. An instruction that if defendant took possession of the animal, with the larceny of which he was charged, by virtue of a trade with one then having possession, and such trade was made by defendant in good faith, he was not guilty, though the other party to the trade had stolen the animal, is erroneous, the good faith of the trade being immaterial.

5. Such instruction is inconsistent with an instruction that, if defendant had no connection with the original fraudulent taking, he could not be convicted, and that his subsequent taking of possession, whether in good or bad faith, would not be larceny.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. Towner, Judge.

Richard Ward was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Ballard, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HARRISON, J. The appellant was convicted of having stolen a cow, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of two years.

1. At the preliminary examination of the defendant before the committing magistrate, one Bane was a witness; and at the trial in the superior court the prosecution, not being able to produce Bane before the jury, offered to read in evidence what was claimed to be a transcript of the testimony given by him at that examination. This transcript was filed with the papers in the case against the defendant that had been sent up by the committing magistrate, and had the following indorsement: "I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the testimony and the proceedings in the within-entitled action. Anna Grooms, Reporter." It was shown at the trial that the magistrate had appointed Miss Grooms, a shorthand reporter, to take the testimony at the examination; and she testified that the indorsement had been made by her, and that the document from which they proposed to read had been prepared by her in the case against the defendant before the examining magistrate. The document itself did not, however, have the title of any court or cause in which the testimony was taken, nor the time at which it was taken. The defendant objected to the reading of the proposed testimony upon the ground that the document itself did not show when or where or before whom it had been given, or that it had been taken in any court, and that it was not properly certified. The court overruled the objection, and allowed the evidence to be read, to which ruling defendant excepted. The right of the defendant in a criminal prosecution to be confronted with the witnesses against him, in the presence of the court, is one of the fundamental principles of the common law, and can be taken from him only by the provisions of some express statute. As this is a right clearly connected with his personal liberty, any statute purporting to impair the right is to be liberally construed in his favor; and whenever the state, in its prosecution for a crime, would offer against the accused the testimony of witnesses, not given in the presence of the court, it must point to a statute which authorizes such procedure, and bring itself clearly within the provisions of that statute. People v. Mitchell, 64 Cal. 85, 27 Pac. 862. This rule has been established in this state in section 686 of the Penal Code, and in the same section there is created, as an exception to the rule: "Where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate, and the testimony taken down by question and answer, in the presence of the defendant, who has either in person or by counsel cross-examined, or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state." The manner of taking this testimony is prescribed in section 869 of the same Code, and the two sections are to be taken together. People v. Morine, 54 Cal. 575. Section 869 provides that the examining magistrate may appoint a shorthand reporter, who may take down the testimony in shorthand, and that "the reporter shall within ten days after the close of the examination transcribe into longhand writing his said shorthand notes, and certify and file the same with the county clerk of the county, or city and county, in which the defendant was examined, and shall in all cases file his original notes with said clerk," and that the transcript of the reporter, "when written out in longhand, and certified as being a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings in the case, shall be prima facie a correct statement of such testimony and proceedings." The requirement that the reporter shall certify to his transcript that it is "a correct statement of such testimony" is essential to its competency as evidence against the accused, and is not satisfied by his certificate that it is "a true copy of the testimony." When the testimony is taken in shorthand, and is afterwards written out in longhand by the reporter, the statute does not require it to be signed by the witness, but, as a substitute, requires the reporter to certify that it is a correct "statement" of the testimony. The testimony thus written out by the reporter is the original testimony of the witness, and his certificate gives it the same authentication as does the subscription by the witness himself when the testimony is originally taken in longhand. The reporter is no more at liberty to substitute a copy of this testimony for the original statement, which he is required to write out in longhand, than would be the magistrate to substitute a copy of the testimony taken by him. The transcript of the testimony should, moreover, be so authenticated that an inspection of it will show that it is testimony which was taken at the preliminary examination of the accused who is then on trial, and must not depend upon the memory of the magistrate or of the reporter. To allow oral proof at the trial for the purpose of showing against what defendant, or upon what charge, or at what time the testimony was taken, reduces the proceeding from a record required by the statute to the memory of the reporter,—shadowy or clear, according to the length of intervening time or the number of examinations that he may have reported. See People v. Carty, 77 Cal. 215, 19 Pac. 490. In the present case the reference in the certificate of the reporter to the "within-entrued action" has no effect in identifying the "copy of the testimony" with the examination of the defendant, since it appears by the bill of exceptions that the copy so certified does not contain the name of any court or cause.

2. The appellant claimed in his defense that on the 21st of January he had received the cow from Bane in a trade with him for a pasture bill, while Bane, in the testimony which was read to the jury, stated that he had not traded any cow to the defendant at any time in January. Upon his cross-examination, Bane stated: "I cannot remember of seeing defendant, Ward, at any place in San Bernardino county, during January. He was not at my place in San Bernardino county." The defendant testified in his own behalf that he went to Bane's ranch on Tuesday, the 23d of January, and arrived there about 4 o'clock in the evening. He was then asked, "Was Bane there at the ranch when you got there?" Upon the objection of the prosecution to this question as irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, the court refused to allow the defendant to answer. This was error. The main issue before the jury was whether the defendant took the cow from the pasture himself, or whether it was taken by some one else, from whom he received it. There was no direct evidence to connect the defendant with the taking, and his statement that he took the cow in a trade with Bane would, in the absence of other evidence, have justified the jury in acquitting him. Bane's statement, however, that he had not traded with him, if believed, showed the falsity of the defendant's claim, and placed him in the position of having the possession of the stolen cow without accounting for such possession. The respective credibility of Bane and the defendant became important. If Bane's statement that the defendant was not at his ranch in January was false, the jury might have distrusted his other testimony. If Bane was at the ranch when the defendant got there, the jury might have believed that Bane had testified falsely in stating that the defendant was not at his place in January. Hence, the defendant should have been permitted to answer the question.

The court gave to the jury the following instruction: "If you believe, gentlemen, from the evidence, that the defendant traded for the said cow from one John M. Bane, and that he took and had possession of the same by reason of such purchase, although you may believe from the evidence that it had been stolen by the said Bane, you are instructed that such a taking, if in good faith, would not constitute larceny by this defendant, and in that case you will find the defendant not guilty." This instruction was in the form requested by the defendant, except that the words "if in good faith" were inserted by the court, and the defendant claims that such modification of the instruction made it erroneous. The effect of this modification was to tell the jury that it was incumbent upon the defendant to establish his good faith in trading with Bane for the cow, even if they should believe that he had not been connected with the original taking, and had not known of the theft until after it had been completed. If the defendant had no connection with the taking of the cow, and did not know that it had been stolen until the time of his trade with Bane, the question of good or bad faith in making this contract would be immaterial. Curlin v. State, 23 Tex. App. 683, 5 S. W. 186; Boyd v. State, 24 Tex. App. 570, 6 S. W. 853. The crime of larceny is distinct from that of receiving stolen goods, and proof of the latter crime is insufficient to convict a person who is accused of the former. The instruction thus given is also inconsistent with the following instruction given by the court: "Before you can convict defendant you must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of, or in complicity with, the original fraudulent taking, and any subsequent connection after the taking would not be larceny in him, either in good or bad faith; and if you believe that the defendant traded for the cow from Bane, or any other party, after the felonious taking, either in good or bad faith, he is not guilty of larceny, and you must acquit him." By this instruction the jury were told that, if the defendant had no connection with the original taking, the question of good or bad faith in receiving the cow from Bane was immaterial, whereas in the other instruction they were told that it was essential that he should have received it in good faith. The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. DEMASTERS. (No. 21,170.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT MAYHEM — CHARGE ON SIMPLE ASSAULT—ERRONEOUS REFUSAL.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1127, requiring the court to state to the jury all matters of law necessary for their information, and section 1159, providing that "the jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged," it was error for the court, on a trial for assault with intent to commit mayhem, to refuse to charge on simple assault, though a request therefor was not made till after argument, and a rule of court provided that requests to instruct should be presented before argument.

2. The word "bite" is not equivalent to the word "slit," as used in Pen. Code, § 203, defining "mayhem."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

W. F. Demasters was convicted of an assault with intent to commit mayhem, and appeals. Reversed.

Roth & McFadzean, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HAYNES, C. The information charged that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously assault one James Crawford with intent to commit mayhem." At the conclusion of the evidence certain written requests to instruct the jury were submitted by counsel for defendant, and at the conclusion of the argument these and also certain instructions prepared by counsel for the people were given, and following these the court gave certain other instructions of its own motion, and was proceeding to instruct the jury as to the form of their verdict, when counsel for defendant, Mr. Roth, said: "If the court please, have you forgotten an instruction as to the degrees? There are two degrees. The Court: You have offered no instruction on that subject. Mr. Roth: I thought it customary for the court to give those instructions. The Court: I was going to instruct them as to the form of the verdict. Mr. Roth: Very well, the form may give it." Thereupon the court instructed the jury that, if they found the defendant guilty of an assault with intent to commit mayhem, their "verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of an assault with intent to commit mayhem.' Should you find the defendant not guilty, the form of your verdict should be, 'We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty.'" "Mr. Roth: I would like to ask, can we have an instruction as to the degree of this crime? I think the charge includes the charge of simple assault." The court replied, in substance, that a rule of that court required a party who desired instructions given to present them to the court before the argument; that it did not like to take chances on giving an instruction on the spur of the moment, and declined to instruct the jury upon that subject.

The court erred in not instructing the jury as requested. Section 1127, Pen. Code, provides: "In charging the jury the court must state to them all matters of law necessary for their information. Either party may present to the court any written charge, and request that it be given. If the court thinks it correct and pertinent, it must be given; if not, it must be refused." Section 1159, Pen. Code, provides: "The jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense;" and a charge of an assault with intent to commit mayhem, murder, robbery, or any offense involving violence to the person, necessarily includes the assault. The rule of court referred to may be proper and beneficial as a general rule, and, when applied to doubtful and controverted questions of law, ought to be usually adhered to; but, as was said in Pickett v. Wallace, 54 Cal. 148: "Rules of court are but a means to accomplish the ends of justice, and it is always in the power of the court to suspend its own rules, or except a particular case from their operation, whenever the purposes of justice require it." The instruction desired by the defendant was one usually given by courts of their own motion. If the court had overlooked it, and counsel had not called the attention of the court to the omission, a different question would be presented; but in this case the observance of the rule operated to subvert its object, viz. to promote the purposes of justice. Having made the ruling, the defendant's motion for a new trial should have been granted upon that ground. Respondent's contention that the omission or refusal of the court to instruct the jury that they might find the defendant guilty of assault was proper, because "the crime was the greater one or none at all," is without merit. Cases for murder, where the court refused to instruct that a verdict for manslaughter might be found, are broadly distinguishable from the case at bar, since here an assault is directly charged; and, if no assault was made, the higher offense could not be committed. See People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 Pac. 642.

The words "or bite the lip," used in the third instruction given at the request of the prosecution, is not the equivalent of the word "slit," used in section 203 of the Penal Code. If this injury to the lip was such as to constitute mayhem, the defendant should have been charged with that offense; but, as it is not claimed that the bite amounted to mayhem, the instruction should have followed the statutory definition, and used the word

"slit." Since the case itself proves that the lip may be bitten in such a manner as not to amount to mayhem, it follows that the intent to "bite" is not necessarily the equivalent of an intent to "slit." The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; SEARLS, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

JOHNSON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF NAPA COUNTY. (No. 15,982.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1895.)

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATE — NOTICE TO CREDITORS — MANDAMUS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1490, providing that in the administration of a decedent's estate notice to creditors shall be published as often as the court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks, and that the court may direct additional notice, the court cannot, after due publication of the notice as ordered, and after the time for the presentation of claims has elapsed, order additional notice to be given, and thereby extend the time for the presentation of claims.

2. Where the court recognizes the publication already given as notice, but refuses to sign an order stating that due proof of publication had been given until additional notice has been given the time for the presentation of claims having already expired, mandamus will lie to compel him to do so.

In Bank.

Petition by F. E. Johnson, administrator of the estate of James Riley, deceased, against the superior court of Napa county for a writ of mandamus. Granted.

Stanley, Hayes, McEnerney & Bradley, for petitioner. T. B. Hutchinson, for respondent.

TEMPLE, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court of Napa county to make a decree showing that due notice to creditors has been given in the above estate. The order for the publication of the notice was made June 11, 1894, and directed its publication once a week for four weeks. The paper in which it was to be published was not designated. The publication was made as directed in the Napa Daily Journal, the first publication being on July 12, 1894. The value of the estate was less than $10,000, and accordingly creditors were required in the notice to present their claims within four months after the first publication. December 3, 1894, due proof of publication was filed in the probate court of Napa county, and presented to the court, which was asked to decree that due publication of the notice to creditors had been made. The court refused to make the order, not, however, objecting that the proof was insufficient, but because the judge thought the publication in the newspaper selected did not give sufficient notice. In his answer to the petition herein the respondent makes the following statement as to his action in the matter: "That upon such showing the court was not satisfied that due notice had been given to the creditors of said James Riley, deceased, and therefore announced that it believed it was its duty to cause additional notice to be given to the creditors of said deceased, especially any creditor who might live or reside in Pope Valley. That said administrator was then and there questioned by the court concerning the place of residence of said deceased prior to and at the time of his death, and where he did business, and where his creditors would likely be; and the court, from said examination, was of the opinion that the creditors of said deceased, if any, would be residents of Pope Valley and St. Helena. The court further believed, and so stated to said administrator, that, in the opinion of the court, said notice thus published in the Napa Daily Journal was a notice in form only, and did not give due notice to the creditors of said deceased; and the court believed that it was its duty to require additional notice to be given in the case, especially to any creditor who might live in Pope Valley. The court then and there in open court made an order in said case that said administrator give four weeks' additional notice to the creditors of said estate by posting a copy of the notice published in said Napa Daily Journal for four weeks in two public places in Pope Valley (naming the places), and directed the administrator to prepare the order. That it is the usual practice in the said superior court, under and in accordance with the rules of said court in all probate matters, for an attorney representing the estate to prepare all formal orders in probate for the court, and the court on that occasion believed that the administrator herein would do so, petitioner herein acting as his own attorney in said estate. That said order gave the creditors but four weeks' additional time in which to present their claims from the date of posting said notice, and said administrator was informed by the court that at the expiration of such time the court would sign an order declaring that due notice to creditors in said estate had been given." A demurrer was interposed to the petition, but we understand that it is not insisted upon or is submitted to be decided after a consideration of the whole case. The petitioner, on the other hand, does not desire to introduce any evidence, but the case is submitted on the facts stated in the answer.

Section 1490 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires the notice to be published in "some newspaper of the county, * * * as often as the judge or court shall direct, but not less than once a week for four weeks;" and provides that "the court or judge may also direct additional notice by publication or posting." The notice must require all persons having claims against the estate to present them to the executor or administrator. Section 1491 provides that the time expressed in the notice for the presentation of claims must be ten months after its first publication when the estate exceeds in value $10,000, and four months when it does not. Under these provisions we think the judge, when he made the order for the publication of notice, might have also directed additional notice, and that he could have done so afterwards within the period allowed for the presentation of claims. So, too, when proof was made, the judge could have determined that the publication did not give notice to the creditors. Had he so determined, his action could not have been reviewed in a proceeding of this character. Upon so determining it would have been his duty to direct notice to be given as though there had been no previous attempt to do so, and the time for the presentation of claims would begin to run only from the giving of the new notice. But, recognizing the publication already made as notice, though, in the opinion of the judge, not the best notice, he could not extend the time for the presentation of claims by then ordering additional notice. This is precisely what the respondent attempted to do, for he says that at the expiration of the four weeks he would have signed the order, and that, when he refused to sign the order presented to him, he so informed the petitioner. The demurrer is overruled, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ issue as prayed for.

In re CLISHAM. (No. 21,179.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — SELLING WITHOUT LICENSE—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT.

A complaint which merely charges defendant with carrying on "the business of selling liquor" without a license does not charge a violation of an ordinance which requires a license for "keeping or conducting a bar-room, saloon or other place where vinous, spirituous or malt liquors are sold * * * to be drank upon the premises."

In bank.

Petition by William Clisham for a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of obtaining his discharge from the custody of the authorities of the city of San Luis Obispo, Cal., to which he was committed on conviction for violation of a city ordinance. Petitioner discharged.

E. P. Cole and Graves & Graves, for appellant. W. H. Spencer, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The prisoner asks to be discharged upon habeas corpus, and his petition shows facts entitling him to such discharge. An ordinance of the city of San Luis Obispo provides as follows:

"Sec. 14. A license must be procured from the city tax-collector, * * * and a license tax must be paid therefor for engaging in carrying on or pursuing every business or occupation mentioned hereinafter in this ordinance, within the corporate limits of the city of San Luis Obispo, as follows: * * *.

"Sec. 26. For each bar-room, saloon or other place where vinous, spirituous or malt liquors are sold by the glass, bottle or otherwise, to be drank upon the premises where sold, twenty-five dollars per quarter."

The petitioner was prosecuted and convicted for a violation of the foregoing ordinance, and is now held a prisoner by virtue of a commitment based upon such conviction. The complaint does not state a cause of action. It is fatally defective in not bringing the acts of petitioner within the prohibitions found in the ordinance. A license is required for keeping or conducting a bar-room, saloon, or other place where vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors are sold, to be drank upon the premises. The complaint charges the prisoner with carrying on "the business of selling liquor." Upon the slightest inspection of the ordinance, it will be perceived that it does not forbid "the business of selling liquor." No reference is made in the complaint to that part of the ordinance referring to "a saloon or bar-room or other place"; and, conceding the term "liquor" to be broad enough to include "vinous, spirituous or malt liquors," still the complaint contains no allegation that the liquors were to be drank upon the premises where sold; and this element of the ordinance is certainly a most material one, and must necessarily form a material element in the case. The allegations of the complaint are broad enough to include a dealer who sells liquor by wholesale, and not to be drank upon the premises, yet the ordinance covers no such case. The allegations of the complaint are sufficiently broad to include a retail vendor who travels about the country selling liquors, and who has no "bar, or saloon or other place"; yet the ordinance does not cover that case. The prisoner is committed for the offense "charged in the complaint," and the commitment necessarily falls with the complaint. We conclude that the allegations of the complaint charge no violation of any ordinance of the city of San Luis Obispo to which our attention has been directed. For the foregoing reasons the prisoner is discharged.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An instruction to the jury that "their opinion of the guilt of the defendant, based upon the evidence in this case, must nearly approach absolute certainty; that is, a condition of their minds so perfect, complete, and unconditional as to exclude the possibility of a doubt"—is properly refused, as belief beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused is alone required.

2. An instruction in regard to making one a principal in a crime who aids in its commission is presumably injurious, where there is no evidence to base it upon, but this presumption may be rebutted by an affirmative showing that the error was harmless.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

The defendant, George B. Smith, was convicted of manslaughter. From an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Ridge and C. W. Cross, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

VAN CLIEF, C. Upon an information accusing him of the crime of murder, the defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of five years, and has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Counsel for appellant contends that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence. No particular in which the verdict is claimed to be contrary to the evidence is specified either in the brief of counsel for appellant or in the bill of exception; and, though the evidence is wholly circumstantial, it strongly tends to prove that the defendant committed the crime of which he was found guilty, and appears to be sufficient to justify the verdict.

2. It is contended that the court erred in refusing to give to the jury the following instruction: "(2) The jury are directed that their opinion of the guilt of the defendant, based upon the evidence in this case, must nearly approach absolute certainty; that is, a condition in their minds so perfect, complete, and unconditional as to exclude the possibility of a doubt." This requested instruction is obviously erroneous, in that it requires a condition in the minds of the jurors which shall exclude "the possibility of a doubt," whereas the law requires only a belief to that degree of moral certainty which excludes all reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. And this legal qualification of the doubt to be excluded implies the "possibility" of unreasonable doubt, which the requisite degree of belief need not exclude.

3. At the request of the district attorney, the court instructed the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be a felony or a misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, or, not being present, have advised and encouraged its commission; and all persons counseling, advising or encouraging children under the age of fourteen years, lunatics, or idiots to commit any crime, or who by fraud, contrivance, or force occasion the drunkenness of another for the purpose of causing him to commit any crime, or who by threats, menaces, command, or coercion compel another to commit any crime,—are principals in any crime so committed.” Appellant contends that there is no evidence of the hypothetical facts upon which this instruction was based; that the propositions of law therein stated are merely abstract propositions, having no concrete connection with the evidence; and that they probably had the effect to confuse or mislead the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. It is true that there was no evidence substantially tending to prove any fact stated in either of the propositions of which the instruction is composed, except that defendant alone committed the crime of which he was convicted; and the only question to be decided is whether or not it affirmatively appears from the record that the jury could not have been misled or confused by the instruction to the prejudice of the defendant, for, while it is well settled that such an instruction is erroneous, and therefore presumably injurious, yet the presumption of injury may be rebutted and overcome by an affirmative showing or appearance upon the record that the error was harmless, and I think it so appears in this case, since the jury was imperatively instructed that “unless the jury are entirely satisfied from the evidence that the defendant, and no other person, killed the deceased, they should acquit the defendant.” I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

SOBERANES v. SOBERANES. (No. 15, 462.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1895.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—CANCELLATION OF DEED—CAPACITY.

1. Evidence that is really and substantially conflicting will not be considered upon appeal.

2. The evidence showed that the grantor was an illiterate woman, and was ignorant of business outside of her household and domestic affairs, but had good natural intellectual faculties, and that, after the execution of the deed in question, she had given to some of the witnesses her motive for making it. Held, that the grantor had sufficient capacity to execute a deed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; James F. Breen, Judge.

Action brought by Benito Soberanes, guardian ad litem, to set aside deed given by plaintiff, Isabel Soberanes, to defendant, Abel Soberanes, on ground of plaintiff's mental incapacity to execute the deed. Tried by court without a jury. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. M. Delmas (Morehouse & Tuttle, of counsel), for appellant. Myrick & Deering and Alexander & Daugherty, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought in the name of Isabel Soberanes by Benito Soberanes, who, for that purpose, procured himself to be appointed her guardian ad litem, to set aside a deed of conveyance of land executed by said Isabel to the defendant, Abel Soberanes, on the ground of her mental incapacity and undue influence of said defendant. Judgment went in the superior court for defendant, and this present appeal is from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. There was also an appeal by plaintiff from the judgment, which was determined here in favor of defendant. 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910. The findings are very full, and on the appeal from the judgment the case was considered in nearly all its aspects in the opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Paterson, the law applicable to it declared, and the conclusion reached that the findings supported the judgment. Appellant contends that, upon an appeal from an order denying a new trial, a former decision on an appeal from the judgment does not establish the law of the case; but, however that may be, we are satisfied that the views expressed in the opinion on the former appeal are correct. The only question, therefore, to be considered on this present appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings.

To hold that the evidence does not warrant the findings would be to plainly violate the rule that we will not here weigh evidence that is really and substantially conflicting. That rule is, to some extent, founded on the fact that the trial judge has the opportunity of having the witnesses in person before him; and the advantage of seeing and observing, and to some extent at least knowing, the witnesses, is very important in such a case as the one at bar. Here was a family quarrel, and the members of the family were before the judge exhibiting their manners, tempers, interests, prejudices, and characters in forms which cannot be brought here in a printed transcript. We do not see anything in the evidence that would warrant us in disturbing the findings, and it would be a useless work to reproduce the evidence here. Indeed, the findings themselves show very fully what the evidence was; that is, no important or controlling fact can be deduced from the evidence that does not appear in the findings. In fact, the real question in the case is, and always has been, do the findings support the judgment? But that question was determined in the affirmative on the former appeal. In an elaborate opinion in which the whole case was fully stated and discussed; and, as we have said. we think it was correctly determined. The two main questions of fact were, was Mrs. Soberanes mentally capable of executing the deed? and was she fraudulently procured to do so by the undue influence of the respondent? And we cannot say that the evidence did not warrant the court in answering the former question in the affirmative and the latter in the negative. This is not a case where a woman had made a conveyance similar to the one here involved, and where afterwards she herself had asked to have it set aside on account of fraud or undue influence. Mrs. Soberanes did not bring this action; it was brought and has been prosecuted against her wishes. The execution of the conveyance to the defendant was in pursuance of an intention so to do long entertained by her, and she afterwards repeatedly expressed her satisfaction with it. Jose Soberanes, brother of her deceased husband, testified, among other things, as follows: "Sue said that when Francisco, her husband, died, the part that she would inherit of the property she would give to the son or sons who respected and took care of her. She repeated this at her house almost every time I went to visit her, both before and after her husband's death." This witness also testified that after the execution of the deed he asked her: "How is it that you have sold everything to Abel and given your other children nothing? What is your motive? And she answered that the reason she had for giving everything to Abel was because a long time before her intentions had been to give everything to Abel; that Abel was the one that always cared for her, and that Abel was her son, her father, her husband, and was everything in the world to her; and that her other children didn't do anything for her, and that she didn't give anything to her other children because they didn't respect her or attend her." About a month after the execution of the deed, when she was sick, her spiritual adviser remonstrated with her about giving nothing to the other children, and she said she would do the same thing "an hundred times." He testified that "in talking with the lady I told her, in substance, this: that before the judgment of God she ought to treat the children all equally, and what for you did so; you left everything to your son Abel, and not to your sons; and she gave me the reasons, and in consequence I found the reasons logic, and I considered as spiritual adviser I had no more to say." The evidence showed, as the court found, that she was an illiterate woman, and ignorant of business outside of her household and domestic affairs; but there was evidence that she had ordinarily good natural intellectual faculties, was of sound mind, and fully comprehended what she was doing when she executed the deed. Under these circumstances, we cannot interfere with the findings of the court below. Whether or not it was a proper and commendable thing for her to give all her property to one of her children is not a question for courts; that question was with her alone. The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SMITH. (No. 21,158.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 6, 1895.)

MURDER — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — EXPERT TESTIMONY — CAUTION TO JURY — EVIDENCE OF ANOTHER KILLING — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a trial for murder, it appeared that defendant, deceased, and another person lived in the same house. Two days after defendant left the house, the dead bodies of his partners were found in a river near by; deceased having been struck on the head, and the other having had the top of his head shot away. The door of the house was locked, and a piece of human skull and blood and brains were found on a platform in front thereof. There was a trail of blood from the house to the river, and also marks showing that a heavy body had been dragged to the river. There was evidence of an effort to hide the blood by covering it with dirt, and that the dirt was obtained with a tool with a protuberance on its back. In the house an ax was found, which appeared to have been washed since it was used. No bedding was in the house, though the men had beds. Defendant was arrested in another county three days after he went away, and with him were found a shotgun, a gold watch and chain, a shovel, six pairs of blankets, overalls, and half a dozen suits of clothes. The shovel had a protuberance similar to the tool with which the earth was dug, and there was a mark on it resembling blood. The overalls were smeared with human blood. Some of the clothing was too small for defendant, but might have fitted one of his partners. One key of the house was in defendant's pocket, the only other one being in the pocket of deceased. Held sufficient to warrant a conviction.

2. It was proper, as part of the res gestae, to admit in evidence the articles found in defendant's possession.

3. Defendant having testified that all the stuff he took when leaving the house was his own, and that all the goods of his associates were in the house when he left, it was proper, on cross-examination, to question him as to whether goods found with him did not belong to deceased.

4. Where, on a trial for murder, the expert testimony was that of a doctor, as to whether blood found on clothes was human blood, and his testimony was mainly as to the manner of determining the character of blood, and there was nothing to arouse suspicion as to his capacity or impartiality, it was not error to refuse to charge that expert evidence should be received with great caution.

5. In a trial for murder it appeared that deceased lived in the same house with defendant and another man, whose body, with the top of the head shot away, was found in the river along with that of deceased. Deceased was killed by a blow from an ax. Held, that evidence of the finding of blood stains, and portions of a human skull and brains, in front of the house, some distance from the river, was admissible to show that the person whose body was found with that of deceased could not have killed him.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Fremont Smith was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin Gwinford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SEARLS, C. The defendant, Fremont Smith, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to suffer the extreme penalty of the law, for the felonious killing of one Dolph, at the county of Colusa, state of California. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The first point relied upon by appellant for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury. The defendant was the owner of a span of horses, harness, and buckboard wagon. In the fall of 1893 he formed a partnership in the fishing business with two men, of whom but little seems to be known, except that they were fishermen, and that one was called "Charlie," and the other, "Dolph." The parties occupied a house in Moulton's pear orchard, adjoining the levee of the Sacramento river, county of Colusa. Charlie and Dolph did the fishing, and defendant, with his wagon, peddled the product about the surrounding country. On or about December 27, 1893, defendant left the house in which the parties had been living, and traveled with his team south. Two days after he left, the dead bodies of Charlie and Dolph were found in the Sacramento river, near the house in which they had lived. Charlie had been shot, a portion of his head being blown off, and Dolph had received fatal wounds upon and about the head, apparently from an ax or a similar instrument. The door of their house was found locked, and upon a platform in front of the house a piece of human skull was found, portions of brains, and blood. From near the house to the river there was a trail of blood, and evidence that a heavy body had been dragged, leaving a mark on the surface. The blood along the trail, and a pool of blood near the house, bore evidence of having been partially covered by earth being shoveled upon it. The small pits left in the ground, from which earth had been taken to cover the blood, showed that an instrument or tool had been used with a protuberance on the back of it. Upon opening the house, an ax was found within, which appeared as though washed since being used. No bedding was found, although the dead men were known to have had beds in the house. Defendant was arrested at Collinsville, Solano county, on or about December 30, 1893; and on his person and wagon a large number of articles were found, among which were a shotgun, a gold watch and chain, a silver or nickel watch, a broken-handled shovel, six pair of blankets, half a dozen suits of clothes, two pair of gum boots, overalls, etc. The shovel, upon being returned to the scene of the tragedy, and tested in the earth, was found to have a protuberance on its back making a similar mark to those found in the pits, and there was some evidence of a mark upon it resembling blood. The overalls were smeared with blood, which, upon being analyzed by Prof. Price, an analytical chemist, and examined microscopically, was pronounced to be human blood. A portion of the clothing was too small for defendant, but might have fitted one of the deceased men, who was much smaller. There were two keys to the house, one of which was found upon defendant, and the other in the pocket of the pants upon the body of Dolph.

The chain to the gold watch had been seen previously upon the person of Dolph. Upon a pair of old shoes found near the house, and admitted by defendant to be his, human blood was found. There were many other circumstances, of less importance, tending to point to defendant as the guilty person. Taken together, they are believed to be sufficient to uphold the verdict, and to stamp the defendant as the perpetrator of a most heinous murder.

Defendant asked the court to instruct the jury in the following language. The instruction was given as asked, except that portion included in brackets, which was refused, and such refusal is assigned as error: "When independent facts and circumstances are relied upon to identify the accused as the person committing the offense charged [and if together are regarded as sufficient basis for a presumption of his guilt to a moral certainty, yet] each material fact or circumstance necessary to complete such chain or series of independent facts, tending to establish the guilt, should be established to the same degree of certainty as the main fact which these independent circumstances, taken together, tend to establish,—that is, each essential and independent fact in the chain or series of facts relied upon to establish the main fact must be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt; and, if the jury should then have a reasonable doubt upon any single essential fact relied upon to complete the chain of circumstances, they cannot convict the defendant as long as they entertain such doubt." The instruction, as given, embodied the law relating to circumstantial evidence, and the necessity of the establishment of each independent fact essential to a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, with great clearness. The sentence eliminated tended to involve and cloud the instruction, without rendering it more favorable to the defendant. If the sentence in brackets did not conflict with the other portions of the instruction, it at least detracted from their perspicuity, and tended to draw the minds of the jurors from a careful analysis of the independent facts which it was the object of the instruction to invoke. The case of People v. Phipps, 39 Cal. 333, cited by appellant, fails to support his contention. In that case the court below refused to instruct the jury that in case of a reasonable doubt they should acquit. This court, in reversing the case, laid down the rule precisely in accord with the instructions given in this case. In this action of the court no error was involved.

Two errors are assigned upon the action of the court in eliminating from instructions asked and given for defendant upon expert testimony. In the first the jury were instructed, in substance, that in considering expert testimony they should "weigh it with all the other evidence in the case, but are not bound to determine any fact in accordance with the opinion of such expert, if not convincing to the minds of the jury. The jury should weigh it carefully, and, if convincing, they have a right to act upon it, but they have a right to consider the conditions under which the testimony was given." The portion omitted was as follows: "The facts upon which the opinion of the expert is based, and caution should be exercised by the jury in accepting the opinion of an expert as a fact proven in the case." In the other instruction, which was quite favorable to defendant as given, the court struck out the words, "such evidence should therefore be received with great caution by the jury," and inserted in lieu thereof as follows, "After considering all these things, and any other circumstances in evidence, you are to give to such testimony such weight as you, in your judgment, think it entitled to," followed by the words, "If convincing, and carrying with it a belief in its truth, act upon it; if not, you have a right to reject it." Grigsby v. Clear Lake Water Co., 40 Cal. 396, is cited as authority for the contention that the court should have instructed the jury that "such evidence should be received with great caution by the jury." In the case cited the court, speaking through Temple, J., spoke of the propriety of having expert witnesses selected by the court, of the necessity of their being impartial as well as learned and skillful, and dwelt upon the fact that such witnesses are often but adroit advocates of the theory upon which the party calling them relies, etc. That all of this, and much more that might be said of expert testimony, in the abstract, is true, cannot be denied. It does not follow, however, that all that may be said by this court in discussing the facts or comparing different kinds of testimony, and determining their value, is properly question of law to be submitted to a jury. The reasons for a rule are not the rule itself. There is a wide difference of opinion to be found in the cases upon the question of the propriety of cautioning the jury against the dangers and uncertainty of expert testimony. Under our constitution (article 6, § 19), "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." It may be plausibly argued that to direct a jury to look with caution upon a class of testimony, which experience has demonstrated to be subject to uncertainties, is not, in effect, to instruct them as to matters of fact, but rather as cautionary to the mode of reaching such facts. Rogers, in his work on Expert Testimony, at chapter 11, has collected and cited a large number of cases bearing upon this point. We need not refer to them at length, for the reason that whatever the conclusion reached might be the case at bar is not one calling for the application of the caution contended for by appellant.

Prof. Price was called as a witness for the prosecution, to prove that blood found upon the clothing of defendant was that of a human being. There was nothing apparent in the character of the witness, his relation to the parties, or his manner of testifying, calculated to arouse suspicion as to his capacity, skill, or impartiality. His testimony was mainly as to facts, viz. the method resorted to for determining the character of the blood; the means by which it was separated, and the corpuscles or globules measured; their size and shape; the size and shape of the corpuscles found in the human family, in a variety of animals, fishes, etc.,—showing that the measurements indicated the corpuscles to come within the size found in the human family. This evidence was mainly demonstrative of well-established scientific facts, which, with proper appliances and instruments, and perhaps some skill, are open to all. Conceding, then, without deciding, that in a proper case the cautionary instruction contended for by appellant should be given, there was nothing here to call for its expression.

Objection was made to the introduction in evidence of certain clothing and a great variety of other articles found upon the person of defendant, and upon his wagon, at the time of his arrest. They were properly identified, and were properly admissible in evidence. There was certainly some evidence tending to show that a portion of them, at least, were the property of the murdered men, and, under the peculiar circumstances, constituted highly-damaging circumstances against the defendant. They were so intimately connected with the case as to form a part of the res gestae.

The fifth error assigned relates to the testimony admitted in regard to the killing of the man known as "Charlie." The witness Jamison was questioned, and his testimony admitted, showing blood stains upon the platform in front of the house, a portion of the skull and brains upon such platform, and one lobe of a human brain, containing shot, where it had fallen through a hole in the platform. As Charlie was shown to have had a large portion of his head blown off, these vestiges tended to point to the place of his death. The contention of appellant is that defendant being charged with the murder of Dolph, and not Charlie, it was error to admit testimony of the murder of another man. It is true that, in a criminal prosecution, it is not permissible to prove that the defendant has committed crimes other than that with which he is charged. People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 271, 5 Pac. 240; People v. Barnes, 48 Cal. 551; People v. Hartman, 62 Cal. 562; People v. McNutt, 64 Cal. 116, 28 Pac. 64. There are exceptions to the rule stated, which arise in cases where the intent or guilty knowledge is an element to be established, as in the case of uttering forged bills, etc., but they in no wise alter the general rule. Another exception to the rule is said to be that where two persons are killed at the same time and place, and apparently in the same transaction, or approximately so, evidence as to the circumstances of the killing of one is admissible on the trial under an indictment for the killing of the other. Brown v. Com., 76 Pa. St. 319; Com. v. Ferrigan, 44 Pa. St. 386; Fernandez v. State, 4 Tex. App. 419; Heath's Case, 1 Rob. (Va.) 735; People v. Foley, 64 Mich. 148, 31 N. W. 94; People v. Rogers, 71 Cal. 565, 12 Pac. 679; People v. McGilver, 67 Cal. 55, 7 Pac. 49; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141, 32 Pac. 864. We have no doubt of the soundness of the exception last mentioned. There was, however, in the present case, a more cogent reason for the introduction of the proffered testimony. Dolph and Charlie were living in the same house, in apparently an isolated place, and were left there by defendant alive and well, according to his statement. Under these circumstances, it might have appeared quite probable to the jury that Charlie, and not the defendant, it was who killed Dolph, and threw his body in the river. This was met by showing that Charlie, too, was killed, and his body also placed in the stream. Conceding this to be true, Charlie might still have killed his partner, and then committed suicide. This last theory was met by showing that Charlie was shot at the house, one-half of his head blown off, a part of his skull and one lobe of his brain being found there; thus showing that his death occurred at that point, and hence that he could not have gone to the river, where the body was found. In this point of view the evidence was highly important, and eminently proper. It should also be remarked that the evidence went to show that Charlie was killed, and not that defendant killed him.

Defendant offered himself as a witness, on his own behalf, and, on cross-examination, was interrogated in regard to the articles found in his possession when arrested at Colinsville. This was proper. On his direct examination he had testified explicitly that all the stuff he took upon leaving the house was his; that the bed was his, the tent, the gold and silver watches, etc., and that he was particular to take nothing that was not his own; and that, when he left, the boys' (Charlie's and Dolph's) things were in the house. In response to this it was legitimate cross-examination to ask him any questions tending to show that the articles, or some of them, belonged to Dolph, or to sift him as to where he got them. There is no error in the record calling for a reversal, and the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to take the proceedings necessary for the enforcement of its judgment.

BILLS v. SILVER KING MIN. CO. et al.
(No. 13,406.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1895.)

CORPORATION—DEMAND FOR DIVIDEND—SUFFICIENCY—RUNNING OF LIMITATIONS—FRAUD.

1. An inquiry by an administratrix, at the offices of a corporation, as to whether all dividends on stock owned by decedent had been paid, which is answered affirmatively, is a sufficient demand for such dividends to put in operation the statute of limitations against a claim for all dividends then due decedent. Garoutte, J., dissenting.

2. An administratrix, in 1879, inquired at the office of a corporation in which decedent held stock, as to whether all dividends due decedent had been paid him, and was told that they had all been paid to A., decedent's agent. Without making further inquiry from the corporation or the agent, she and her successor administered the estate, and the estate was settled without reference to such dividends. An assignee of the next of kin's interest sued in 1886 to recover dividends due decedent, averring that he was not informed till 1885 that there were dividends due. Held, that the running of limitations was not suspended under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, providing that a cause of action for fraud shall not be deemed to have accrued till the discovery of the fraud by the aggrieved party. Garoutte, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco, J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Albert V. Bills against the Silver King Mining Company and others to recover dividends. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Crittenden and James P. Bowie, for appellant. Garber, Boalt & Bishop and F. A. Berlin, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The court below sustained a demurrer to the complaint, and, plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment went for defendants. Plaintiff appealed.

The court below correctly sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment for defendants. The demurrer was upon various grounds,—among others, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, that the action is barred by several sections of the Code about the limitations of actions, and that the plaintiff is shown to have been guilty of laches. The material averments of the complaint, which are made upon information and belief, are these: The defendant the Silver King Mining Company is a corporation, and during the years 1877, 1878, and 1879 one Benjamin W. Reagan was the owner of a large portion of the shares of the capital stock of said corporation, which were represented by a certificate in due form, No. 72, issued to one J. W. Anderson, who was the agent of said Reagan for the purpose of holding said shares, and collecting the dividends thereon. It was averred that between the 24th day of October, 1877, and the 30th day of June, 1879, the said corporation regularly declared dividends on its stock, and that upon said dividends "there became and was due and payable from said defendant the Silver King Mining Company to said J. W. Anderson, trustee, as agent of said Benjamin W. Reagan, on the shares of stock represented by said certificate No. 72," the sum of $224,932.50. Said Reagan died intestate on the 26th day of July, 1879, and his widow, Mary A. Reagan, was duly appointed as administratrix. She entered upon said office of administratrix on the 10th of September, 1879, and continued to be such administratrix until the 7th of November, 1882, when she resigned, and one Joseph Nash was then duly appointed administrator, and remained such until the 6th of March, 1884, when there was a final decree of distribution of the estate, and a closing of the administration. It was averred that, at periods before and after the said decree, plaintiff herein, who married the said widow, took an assignment from all the heirs and distributees of their interest in the property of said estate. It is further alleged that said administratrix, Mary A. Reagan, on or about the 10th day of September, 1879, "applied to the defendant corporation and its officers in the city and county of San Francisco for information as to said shares of stock, and as to whether any dividend which had been declared thereon prior to the death of said Reagan, or any part of such dividend, was unpaid, and as to whether any money was due from said defendant corporation to said estate, or to her as administratrix, for or on account of any dividend or dividends declared by said defendant corporation prior to the death of said Benjamin W. Reagan," and that the said corporation and its officers, for the purpose of defrauding said administratrix at said time, stated to said administratrix "that all dividends due on said shares of stock had been paid to said J. W. Anderson, and that no money was due or owing or unpaid on account of * * * any dividends declared on said shares of stock during the lifetime of said Benjamin W. Reagan." It is further averred that said administratrix believed said statements as to said dividends. It does not appear that said administratrix, or her successor, the said Nash, or any other person interested in the estate, ever made any further effort to discover any facts with respect to said alleged dividends. No demand was made for an inspection of the books or papers of said corporation, and no effort was made to discover from said J. W. Anderson whether or not it was true that such dividends had been paid to him. Said dividends were not included in the inventory of said estate, as property thereof, and said estate was distributed and closed without any reference to said alleged dividends. No reason is shown why inquiries were not made about said dividends of the said Anderson, the only averment in that respect being simply that he was absent from the state at the time of the death of said Reagan. There is no averment of any conspiracy between said corporation and the defendant Anderson to conceal any facts about said dividends, and no misconduct whatever is charged against said Anderson. It is merely averred that Anderson refused to bring this suit, and that, therefore, he is made a party defendant; there being also an averment, "on belief," that he asserts some right over said dividends. It is further averred that on the 10th of January, 1885, the person who afterwards became the attorney of record of plaintiff in this present action informed plaintiff that said dividends had not been paid, and that this was the first information plaintiff had of that fact. This action was commenced, as appears by an amendment to the record, on the 27th day of April, 1886. The complaint contains nine counts, each on a separate dividend alleged to have been declared as aforesaid during the said period above mentioned; and judgment is demanded for the said sum of $224,932.50, with interest. It is further averred that on January 10, 1885, the said Mary A. Bills (formerly Mary A. Reagan) demanded of said corporation the payment to her of said dividends, and that on or about the 10th of January, 1885, the said plaintiff demanded of said corporation the payment to him of said dividends, and also made the same demand on the 6th of January, 1886, and that the defendant corporation wholly refused to comply with any of said demands.

The action was clearly barred by the statute of limitations. If the alleged liability sued on is to be considered as one founded upon an instrument in writing, it is barred by section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If it be not an obligation founded upon an instrument in writing, it is barred by section 339 of said Code. And, under any view of the liability, it is barred by section 343. Appellant contends that an action cannot be maintained for a dividend declared by a corporation until a demand shall have been made for the same, and that, therefore, the statute of limitations did not commence to run in the case at bar until the time in 1885 or 1886 when the said demands last above stated were made. There is some conflict of authority upon the point whether such a dividend is a debt owing by the corporation to the holder of the shares, or mere property of the shareholder rightfully in possession of the corporation, and therefore a conflict as to whether a demand is necessary before suit. But in any event no particular form of demand is necessary; and therefore, waiving for the present the point above suggested, it is clear that what occurred between the administratrix and the corporation in 1879, as hereinbefore stated, amounted in law to a demand for the dividends. She was informed at that time by the corporation that there was no money due or owing or unpaid on account of said dividends; and it was a clear refusal of her request for the payment of said dividends, and a denial of any liability of the corporation thereon. The corporation then and there put itself in a state of hostility to the estate of said Reagan with respect to any alleged obligation in the matter of said dividends, and no further demand or refusal was necessary; and, if suit had been brought against it, want of demand would not have been a defense. Appellant contends, however, that he is entitled to relief on the ground of fraud, and that under subdivision 4 of section 338, Code Civ. Proc., the cause of action did not accrue until what he contends to be the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud in 1885. But waiving the question whether the averments of facts constituting the fraud in the complaint are specific enough, or whether such averments are sufficient if made only upon information and belief, still the statute of limitations cannot be avoided in a case where the facts are sufficient to put a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence on inquiry as to the truth. And in the case at bar the administratrix, Mary A. Reagan, was certainly guilty of the grossest laches in not making any effort to discover what she now alleges to be the real facts with respect to the dividends. She was informed that this large sum of money, amounting to nearly a quarter of a million, had been paid to Anderson, whom she avers to have been the agent of her deceased husband, yet she never made any inquiry of the said Anderson as to the truth of the statement that this large amount of money had been paid to him; and she went on to administer the estate, and, without any allusion to said large sum of money, she and her successor as administrator, and all interested in the estate, allowed it to be settled and finally distributed without any reference whatever to said dividends. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff in this case cannot be heard to say that his assignors were deceived for so many years by an alleged false statement of the defendant corporation, which, if false, could have been disproved so easily by the use of the slightest diligence. The foregoing views render it unnecessary to consider other points made by respondents,—as, for instance, that Anderson, being the holder of the certificate, could alone sue on it, and that the plaintiff is not the proper person to maintain an action
